MURRAY: I would think most consumers in this country would be pretty shocked to know how much asbestos in many products that they use every day and it's difficult. One of the challenges of course is letting people know once we have the exposure, but I think the other challenge and barrier really to understand is collecting information from people is not always easy and I would just share with the committee.

My father had multiple sclerosis and he grew up next to Hanford Nuclear Reservation during the time that that was being developed. He actually was picking asparagus in fields next to it. He was diagnosed with MS and I remember him going back to his high school for a high school reunion and there was something like 20 or 25 of his high school classmates who also were diagnosed with MS and he came home and made a comment about the number of friends that have that and I said, gee, do you think that had anything to do with the fact that you grew up next to Hanford Nuclear Reservation and he said my government would not do that to me.

I will not forget that because how do you ask people for information when they don't really want to know the answer, even with asbestos, where people don't want to really believe that the person who employed them and took care of their family and provided them with a paycheck, could do something like that to their family. So it's a barrier I think in all of these issues which we're trying to gather information. People sometimes don't want to know the answer.

FALK: This is exactly how our MS program actually started with similar concerns around the lead smelter in El Paso, Texas and similar concerns in the community about too many people seem to have, in that area where among high school graduates and that's led us to start these pilot tracking programs for multiple sclerosis. There's not the current subject but at ATSDR, we've been very actively engaged for a number of years in the Hanford community and maybe that might be something to discuss at a different time. But that's a very important issue for us at ATSDR as well.

MURRAY: Dr. Olden, you had (ph) a comment about collecting (inaudible)

OLDEN: Yes, we outreach to communities through town meetings and we let the local organizers determine what the agenda that we discussed for a day and a half are and as a consequence, the kind of issue that you raised about your father getting information about workplace exposures and so forth are just the kind of issues that we discuss at these town meetings and we have these town meetings four to five a year around the United States and most recently in Texas in L.A., Seattle, Washington, Tennessee, Ohio. And I think that's the way. In addition we have 40 centers that we support and we require all of them to outreach to the local communities and provide just the kind of information to lay people that you mentioned.

MURRAY: Dr. Jackson (ph).

JACKSON: Communicating around health issues is really very, very difficult in a lot of ways. You just reflected communicating around environment issues is also very hard. It's often very technical. You mix the two together and it becomes very difficult. One lesson we've learned is sometimes when people say communication, they have this vision of news things from on high that get out in newspapers and the rest. And what communication and environmental health is, is something you start out right at the very beginning. There's got to be a dialogue between that community and their concerns and the people that are working on it and swooping in at the end with some kind of communication strategy never works. It really has to be an ongoing process.

MURRAY: Thank you, very much appreciate all of you being here today. Thank you Madam Chairman.

CLINTON: Thank you very much Senator Murray and we're joined now I'm delighted to say by Senator Jeffords who not only serves on this committee, but chairs the environment and public works committee and Senator, would you care to make some comments?

JEFFORDS: Certainly would. I'm also supposed to be on the floor on the energy bill right now so just came from my own hearing. Busy day, which they usually are. But I just want to commend you for this hearing. There is such a close relationship between the environment and so many health problems that we have in this nation and that if we don't really take the time we should to try to find out what the impact is and how we can prevent those from happening, we won't be doing the job we're supposed to be and of course the same is true of the energy aspects that we have now with respect to pollution. And so I just want to commend you for holding this hearing and want to work closely with you in combining all the different committees as to how they look at these matters so that we can have a coordinated program and try to do that. But I commend you for the hearings and wish that I could stay.

CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you for your leadership Senator and I appreciate your coming and I think the senator's is really an important one because all of these issues interact. And back when Senator Murray's father was asked that question, we didn't know as much as we know now. you know, back when my mother smoked during World War II, she didn't know that it would cause cancer. We now know and therefore we have to act and that's what I want to try to stress is that if we continue to ignore and deny a lot of this information, whether it's on Senator Jefford's very important legislation about clean power or what we're doing here on health tracking, then we are abdicating our responsibility and I appreciate that we have the quality of leadership in our public health systems that these three witnesses have evidenced today and I thank them for being here.

UNKNOWN: Thank you very much.

CLINTON: We're now going to move on the second panel and I am delighted that we have such an extraordinary collection of witnesses for this next panel who have very specific concerns and recommendations about how we deal with the complicated issues that have been raised this far and as the panelists take their seats, I'm going to be introducing them so they can immediately get into their testimony.

Our first panelist will be Dr. John Harris. Dr. Harris is a very distinguished leader in the birth defects area where the March of Dimes has been involved for quite some time and I'm just so grateful that Dr. Harris is here because of course no one has done more over so many years to deal with issues about birth defects than the March of Dimes, starting back with President Roosevelt. So let me thank you Dr. Harris for joining us and I look forward to your testimony.

HARRIS: Thank you Senator Clinton. I'm a pediatrician and director of the California birth defects monitoring program and it's truly a privilege to be before the Senate. I'm here on behalf of the March of Dimes to urge you to support more surveillance and research in the causes of birth defects. I want to talk to you about the problem of birth defects. Birth defects are conditions like spina bifida, cleft lip and palate, congenital heart disease, missing limbs, mental retardation.

HARRIS: These conditions kill children, disable children and result in multiple hospitalizations. Every year in the United States, 150,000 children are born with a birth defect and if you take this 150,000 birth defects are three times more common than all of childhood cancer, all of pediatric AIDS, juvenile onset diabetes and (inaudible), cystic fibrosis and autism put together.

Out of the 150,000 children born with birth defects, 15,000 children will die every year. Now if four children die as a result of a violent crime, it's front page news. But every year 15,000 children die as a result of birth defects and there's no news at all.

The cost to treat children with birth defects, both for health care and special education, varies between $100,000 per case to $500,000 per case. This makes the aggregate cost every year in the billions of dollars. And most importantly, birth defects can happen to anyone. There's a belief that birth defects only happen to the poor, to people of color, to women over 35 and to teen moms. In fact this is untrue. Data from the California birth defects monitoring program shows that women of all ages, of all races and of all social classes have very similar risks of birth defects.

And in addition with birth defects, they have a special place in surveillance because they're a sentinel outcome. A fetus as you know is very small and is therefore likely to be affected at levels way lower than an adult. If you like, birth defects in terms of surveillance and tracking, are the canaries in the mine right now.

So what are we doing about this? Last year the Congress and the president signed into law, making a new center at the Centers for Disease Control, the National Centers for Birth Defects and Developmental Disabilities. These centers fund 28 states to do health tracking. But let me just give you some perspective about health tracking. Health tracking is merely a first step. It is a first step because it tells us who's at risk. It does not tell us why people are at risk.

So in addition, the National Centers for Birth Defects and Developmental Disabilities fund eight regional birth defects centers that do research about causes of birth defects. Let me just highlight some of the findings we have from California to tell you how research discoveries make a difference in this field. When I'm talking about environment, I'm talking about the broad definition. This can be a dietary factor, an infection, a chemical factor, a lifestyle factor, anything that the parents can come into contact with during conception or the mother comes in contact with during the first trimester.

As you testified, we were part of the research in the March of Dimes showing that folic acid, taken at the time of conception, prevented spina bifida. And that finding was the basis for the Food and Drug Administration fortifying the grains with folic acid and now we see (inaudible) spina bifida going down. Yesterday's research is today's cure. In addition, as other people have testified, we have also found that genes alone do not cause birth defects and in fact genes need to be triggered by an environmental factor.

The best example we have of this is that we have found that smoking in combination with a abnormal gene that's very common but harmless in the population, so smoking in combination with an abnormal gene causes a whooping eight fold increase in cleft lip and pallet. The analogy that I just want to leave you with is to think of genes as a windy road, by themselves harmless and think of an environmental factor like tobacco smoking as driving 80 miles an hour. You have to put the two together to have a lethal result.

In addition, in California recently we found that air pollution and specifically exposure to automobile exhaust in the Los Angeles area was associated with congenital heart disease and what was very worrisome about this is the higher the air pollution levels, the greater the risk of congenital heart disease.

But there's so much more to do. As I told you, birth defects can happen to anyone and as you yourself said Senator Clinton, the causes of 80 percent of birth defects remain unknown. So I'm here to urge you to fund those eight regional centers to increase, to double their budgets so that they can do more research to determine what the links are between the environment and birth defects. And the reasons for this are obvious. The family values argument says every child deserves a fair and healthy start in life. The financial argument says every dollar we spend on research prevention will save thousands of dollars in terms of both health care and special education costs. This is not a case where an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. In this case, an ounce of prevention, is worth a ton of cure.

The other thing that we all know is research works. March of Dimes certainly knows research works. They funded the research that developed the polio vaccine. Every scientist up here will tell you research works and of course the Senate knows that research works.

Finally, I told you that there were 150,000 children born every year with a birth defect. This, the overall risk then, is out of every 28 babies born, one child will have a serious birth defect. Now this is a very big number. This means that in every classroom in America, every single classroom, one of those children will in turn have a child with a birth defect.

So this means many of your constituents will have children with birth defects. Some of your friends will have children with birth defects. Perhaps my future grandchildren will have a birth defect and perhaps your future grandchild will have a birth defect. So my final thought is this. Children need to come first. I'm here on behalf of the March of Dimes to urge you to invest a modest $10 million into surveillance and research in the eight centers of excellence and in the eight birth defects research centers for excellence. Thank you.

CLINTON: Thank you very much Dr. Harris. I certainly appreciate the work you're doing and your continuing focus on it. Our next witness is Dr. Ed Thompson and clearly as we heard in the first panel, as all of us know, the states are the real crucial actors in our public health infrastructure and that's why I'm so pleased to have Dr. Thompson here to speak about the expertise the states have in health surveillance as well as the assistance and the resources the states need to have in order to do the job they want to do for their citizens. Dr. Thompson is the state health officer of Mississippi and the past president of the Association of State and Territorial Health Officers. He has also served previously as president of the Council of State and Territorial Epidemiologists and he served as Mississippi's state epidemiologist for 10 years. Thank you Dr. Thompson for coming.

THOMPSON: Thank you Senator Kennedy (sic). Members and staff of the committee. It's a privilege today to represent ASTO (ph), the Association of State and Territorial Health Officials whose members are the chief health officials of the states and territories they serve.

Let me begin with the two specific areas the committee asked me to address. Dealing with concerns sometimes from health care providers, but more often from individual citizens about possible exposure to some environmental contaminant or about the apparent spikes in disease occurrence is an almost daily part of public health practice. Cancer clusters are perhaps the most common example.

A 1996 survey by the Council of State and Territorial Epidemiologists identified 1900 cancer reports in 41 states. In other a tiny minority of these clusters is a real increase found and a specific cause pinpointed but it's this small group that we cannot afford to miss. One of the most difficult aspects of investigating a cancer cluster or a cluster of birth defects or an apparent upsurge in asthma is determining what the usual or expected occurrence of the disease or condition is. Cancer registries now operational in many states and birth defects registries as discussed by my colleague, can be a valuable resource of such data.

You also asked for state experiences where more data and Federal support would have been useful. Let me instead give you an example of a situation where that support was needed and was there. Late in 1996, the largest indoor pesticide contamination incident ever seen in this country was identified in seven states with Mississippi at its epicenter.

Methylparathion, an agricultural pesticide, had been used illegally indoors to kill insects. But the story begins over a decade earlier when as a young state epidemiologist with more hair and fewer wrinkles, I stood in a Mississippi delta tenant shack where two children had been fatally poisoned with methylparathion, brought indoors to kill pests.

I'll never forget the scene there in that dilapidated house with no screens on the windows and huge cracks between the boards yet where not a single insect flew or crawled. In the back yard, abandoned, set a garbage pail of food contaminated by the spraying rotting in the heat of the Mississippi summer untouched by insects or flies with a hog rooting nearby.

When we faced the 1996 contamination, we knew what methylparathion could do. We'd seen it before. A massive state and Federal effort was mounted. Initially every house with methyl parathion contamination levels above thought to be safe was evacuated and decontaminated. Families were relocated for weeks or months at a time and millions of Federal dollars were spent on decontamination. Then working with state public health workers, CDC's Center for Environmental Health began using a new technique to measure evidence of methylparathion exposure in Europe.

Now able to determine who was actually absorbing methylparathion and who was not, we were able to have many families remain safely in their homes with ongoing biomonitoring and reduce the number of homes requiring full scale decontamination. The result was a savings of roughly $50 million taxpayer dollars and avoiding enormous disruption to people's lives. Such support from Federal agencies must continue to be available.

Now let me offer some general observations about surveillance systems for chronic disease and environmental exposures. I'd like to single out several existing good resources on which we should draw as we develop this system. The first is the biomonitoring capabilities of CDC's Center for Environmental Health. As illustrated by the example of methylparathion, this technology is of immense value.

By the end of 2002, CDC will be able to test human tissue samples for over 150 chemicals. This needs to be expanded and built upon and in addition, this technology must be transferred to state public health laboratories.

The second is the national health and nutrition examination survey or INHANES (ph). This survey gives us hard data based in large part on actual examination and laboratory tests instead of self-reported data about illness. Expanding the size of the INHANES to allow at least for regional stratification will provide a powerful tool for exploring the prevalence of chronic diseases, and gauging environmental toxin exposures.

Two other resources are ASTO's affiliate organizations, the Council of State and Territorial Epidemiologists or CSTE and the Association of Public Health Laboratories or APHL. These are our nation's on the ground experts in disease tracking and public health laboratory services. To have a successful chronic disease surveillance system, the expertise and council of these two groups is indispensable.

An obvious resource is our existing system of surveillance that tracks acute infectious diseases. Although monitoring chronic diseases and environmental risks present some unique challenges, the knowledge, experience and technology from decades of infectious disease surveillance can be the foundation of our chronic disease surveillance system. In particular we should draw on our existing national electronic disease surveillance system, NEDSS. Our existing surveillance system for communicable diseases is a nationwide system, but it is in fact a system of systems, a coordinated network of individual state surveillance data collection with subsequent aggregation at the national level. Our chronic disease surveillance system will need to follow this basic model.

Finally, it's not sufficient merely to gather data on chronic disease and toxin exposure. We have to have adequate numbers of trained state and local public health staff, especially trained chronic disease and environmental epidemiologists to analyze data, to interpret those data and to communicate findings to the public and to policy makers. ASTO and the states look forward to working with the Congress, public health organization, advocacy groups and the public to continue this informed work. We thank you for the opportunity to present ASTO's views and I'll be pleased to answer your questions at the appropriate time.

CLINTON: Thank you very much Dr. Thompson. Our next witness is Dr. George Thurston (ph), associate professor of environmental medicine at the New York University Medical School Nelson Institute of Environmental Medicine where he is also the director of the community outreach and education program. Dr. Thurston is an expert on the health effects of air pollution and we were very fortunate to have his expertise at the recent field hearing in New York City on air quality issues at ground zero. Dr. Thurston has just published as a co- author, a very important study on air pollution and human health and I look forward to hearing more about that as well as the need for assistance to track such exposures over the long term. Dr. Thurston.

THURSTON: Thank you Senator Clinton. I would mention that the community outreach and education program that I'm director of is one of the programs that Dr. Olden was talking about that was funded by the National Institute of Environmental Health Sciences, NIEHS.

Today I would like to describe an example of how national health outcome registries can and do provide us with opportunities to investigate the underlying causes of disease and that is a major new NIEHS funded prospective cohort study that could not have been conducted without the nationwide death index registry that we used in this research.

This study was conducted under the direction of Dr. Arden Pope (ph) of Brigham Young University and myself and it provides the most definitive epidemiologic evidence to date that long-term exposures to ambient air pollution in the U.S. are associated with significant excess human mortality, including cardiopulmonary deaths and lung cancer deaths. This new study evaluates the effects of long-term exposure to particulate matter, particles in the air, air pollution on human mortality using death and cause of death data for a large cohort derived from over 100 cities across the U.S. by using a nationwide death certificate data contained in the national death index.

A key implication of this study is that long-term exposures to fine particle pollution are associated with about a 20 percent increase in the public's risk of dying of lung cancer which is roughly comparable to the lung cancer risk from passive smoke that's been estimated for a non-smoker who lives with a smoker. In the study, individual risk factor data for some 500,000 adults collected by the American Cancer Society were linked with air pollution data for metropolitan areas throughout the U.S. Cohort participants were enrolled in 1982 and vital status and cause of death were ascertained through 1998 using the national death index.

After taking into account other known risk factors such as age, sex, race, smoking, education, marital status, body mass index, diet, alcohol consumption, occupational exposures, etceteras, the extent to which air pollution still was associated with increased risk of death was evaluated. In this matter the mortality risks of air pollution exposures to sulfate and PM2.5 fine particulate matter, air pollution, as well as to multiple gaseous air pollutants were estimated.

Particulate matter air pollution is composed of both primary particles such as soot from diesel vehicles as well as secondary particles formed in the atmosphere such as sulfates formed from sulfur dioxide emitted by coal-fired power plants and in the eastern United States, certainly the power plants that were grandfathered under the original Clean Air Act and exempted from the requirements of the Clean Air Act is the singular most important source of these pollutants in the eastern half of the United States and now I did give an exhibit to one of your legislative assistants and I thought maybe it might give you a little idea about the progress that we have made.

If you look at the sample at the left, that's a pollution sample collected on a white filter and over day on sort of a typical day at the beginning of the study, sort of average pollution day.

CLINTON: What year was that?

THURSTON: That was 19, this would have been, the beginning of the study was 1982 and those levels of pollution would have been there. Now the one on your left and our right is a sample that's of a level typical at the end of the study in 1998. So you can see that we've made a lot of progress. As the study notes, we've reduced fine particle pollution by about a third over the last 20 years, but we have still a long way to go before that filter looks closer to white as we would prefer.

Overall this new cohort study confirms and strengthens the previously published evidence indicating that living in an area that experiences higher fine particle air pollution exposures is associated with a significant risk, increasing risk, of both cancer and cardiopulmonary deaths. Another study would not have been practical to conduct without the national death index used to determine the fate of participants over time. Without the national death registry to cause the following up on each of a half million participants considered in this study across more than 100 cities would have onerous and beyond the budget of NIH research grants such as the one that funded this research and that fund much of the basic health research in the U.S.

Thus the study provides clear cut evidence of the large advantages of national registries for determining the underlying causes of chronic disease. In my air pollution research, I face situations where my efforts to investigate the role of environmental factors and diseases have been stymied by the lack of such nationwide information for other health outcomes.

For example, the keeping of centralized hospital admissions records is highly variable across the nation. In New York, we're fortunate that there's a highly comprehensive and accessible statewide planning and research cooperative system that was started under the Carter administration called Sparks and which makes such health information available to researchers, but I must note only after a stringent review process that assures that patient record privacy is maintained. This has proved very useful in my research investigating the nature and extent of air pollution effects on the health of New Yorkers. However, when I have tried to access such information in other states, it has sometimes been entirely unavailable in the form that I needed or available in (inaudible) forms that are not comparable across states minimizing the usefulness of such data to conduct powerful national studies.

When such health information differs in content and quality across the nation, it makes it more difficult or impossible to use for the investigation of the underlying causes of disease. There's clearly a need for a standardization across the states in the way that health data are gathered and reported if we are to have the information to evaluate and then to compare the environmental and other factors that cause ill health, thereby allowing us as a society to make the best choices as to how to avoid disease and improve the public's health.

In conclusion, I feel that health studies like the one that I have conducted make clear there's an important role that the Federal government could play in support of such investigations through the establishment of a national network of health and environmental outcome surveillance data.

The development of guidance and setting of minimum standards for states to use in their data collection and the provision of further tools and resources the state will need to gather and report health and environmental data in a more useful and effective manner. Thank you for this opportunity to testify on this important matter.

CLINTON: Thank you very much Dr. Thurston and thank you for the visual display of what has been accomplished and what we still have to do when it comes to air pollution. Our next witness is Dr. Thomas Burke, professor at the Johns Hopkins University Bloomberg School of Public Health, Department of Health Policy and Management. He has joint appointments in the Department of Environmental Health Sciences and the School of Medicine, Department of Oncology.

Dr. Burke is also the chair of the advisory committee to the National Center for Environmental Health at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. His research focuses on environmental epidemiology and the evaluation of community exposures to environmental pollutants. And I thank you Dr. Burke and I just have to notice in passing that you have an appointment in a school named for the new mayor of New York City. So I appreciate doubly your being here. Dr. Burke.

BURKE: Thank you. Well, first I want to tell you what a thrill it is to be here. I've worked my entire career on these issues and I want you to know how deeply the public health community appreciates your attention to this very important aspect of public health which indeed can reshape the future of public health.

I also wanted to mention that I'm not a typical academic. I've spent 13 years of my career both on the environmental regulatory side and as deputy commissioner of health in my native state, New Jersey and in that position was the primary responder to many of the nation's most notorious hazardous sites unfortunately, chemical emergencies and clusters.

And I want you to know that despite the scientific advances you've heard about, we have made very little investment in improving and translating these advances to the public health practitioners out there in the trenches. So today, I want to focus on three aspects of environmental health tracking. One and the primary reason that we're here today I think is to better respond to community concerns about exposure and disease.

Second is bridging that gap, that great divide that exists between our regulatory community and the public health community. Thirdly, I'm also a member of the board of environmental studies at the National Academy of Sciences and we have to grapple with some of the nation's toughest environmental health issues and I think tracking is a very important component of strengthening the scientific basis of our national environmental policies.

As was mentioned by others and the senator asked a question about this, I also want to talk about the training of our future leaders whose support is not there by the way. And then finally as coordinator of the School of Public Health's efforts in response to terrorism, I want to talk about seizing the tremendous opportunity we have now of this unprecedented investment we're seeing in public health in response to terrorism.

First on that community response aspect, truth be told, we know remarkably little about the health of our communities. Except for a very few end points, basic information about the incidence of disease and disability is still unavailable. Unfortunately, our infrastructure, our environmental response has been often to drill wells when people are concerned about a problem, because that's where the funding is. That's not necessarily bad, but the EPA, the regulatory responses, monitoring and well drilling and the people having been there responding to that, really want to know about their health. Tracking is essential to responding to those questions.

Next I want to talk about the great divide. Throughout the '70s and '80s and I worked a lot on crafting some of the early national environmental legislation, being in the hot seat in New Jersey and working on things like Superfund and the Clean Air Act, the Clean Water Act and although the fundamental goal of these laws is protection of public health, these same statutes provide virtually no support for public health agencies. They have failed to support the core functions of environmental health and that core function has helped tracking.

Particularly at the state level, our public health agencies face diminished authorities and grew detached from the environmental decision making and I think public health tracking has the ability and your legislation that you intend to introduce I think can bring together and gap this divide.

Third I want to talk about strengthening the scientific basis for environmental policies. Since the reg reform movement of the 104th Congress, a lot of our environmental regulations, our environmental statutes, have really been questioned. Are they based on sound science? Are these policies really protecting public health? Are the costs justified? We still see this with the current administration. Through my activities with the National Academy of Sciences, I've been directly involved in evaluating the science behind many of these issues.

BURKE: Many of our past policies were based on animal experiments, quite frankly. More increasingly important to our public health efforts is as we heard from the study on air pollution and health is the human factor. As we look at the current examples of mercury and arsenic in air particulates, PCB dredging and clean up of the Hudson, it is essential that we improve this human health data. Tracking will help reduce these uncertainties and is important to our effort to move towards sounder science and a better public health basis for our national environmental policies.

Fourth, you heard the question about training. Frankly the success of environmental tracking, the success of our efforts in environmental health really will depend upon the talents of our future leaders. I would hope that any effort in environmental tracking will help us establish that pipeline for leadership, develop those centers of excellence and support the educational process which is so sorely needed right now.

And then finally, I want to close with what I think is an unprecedented opportunity. I never in my life thought that I would hear such political clamoring for strengthening the public health system. We are hearing that at the highest levels of government. Terrorism brought that home to us. Sound public health system is important to our national security and we're witnessing unprecedented investment. It's the time to rethink how we do that.

I want to urge you to seize this opportunity. Much of what we're doing with terrorism is about environmental health. It's about community health surveillance. It's about understanding exposures and threats. We have this unprecedented opportunity to really provide efficiencies in design and implementation that can result in sustained public health benefits well beyond the pressing immediate needs of terrorism response.

And then finally, I want to talk about public health. Tracking of health in our communities is the cornerstone of effective public health. Our failure to invest in this function has eroded our infrastructure, undermined our laws and credibility and impeded our progress in understanding disease and left us unable to respond to community concerns.

I think legislation to advance environmental health tracking may be the most significant environmental legislation we've ever seen. It truly has the potential to change the practice of public health and it's an important component of the future safeguarding of our country's health. Thanks.

CLINTON: Thank you very much Dr. Burke. We've been joined by my colleague and leader, Senator Reed. We've had just a tremendous set of witnesses and we've learned a lot about what the government is doing which has been ably presented by the first panel and now we're talking more about what additional resources and authority can be given to accomplish the goals that you and I have set out to make the environment and health said in the same sentence because they go together and we need to both track the environment and track the impact on health and then take preventive and curative actions and we're about to hear from our last witness who you will remember from our time (inaudible) and you want to make a statement now?

REED: Senator Clinton, Madame Chairman, I apologize for being late. I wanted to be here. In fact I had every intention on my schedule to be here. But we got into a cat fight on the floor dealing with the energy bill and it's taken all this time to kind of get it worked out to the point we are. So I appreciate very much your (inaudible) when I'm not supposed to be here. But I do of course remember Dr. Hearne and Dr. Falk who were in Fallon (ph) with us and I want -- the main reason I came here today is to applaud you for carrying forward on this. But for you we wouldn't be in the point we are.

I believe very strongly in what we're trying to do to develop this tracking. The people in Fallon (ph) have really suffered. Since we were there we've lost children. Kids have died. This is something that is still a mystery to what is going on there. Fallon is a very small community as Dr. Hearne and Dr. Falk remember and as you know and as a result of your coming, Madame Chairman, we had national attention focused on Fallon that would not have happened.

As a result of that, we've had among other things, I think about $17 1/2 million from Senator Harkin last year, Senator Harkin and Senator Specter to help us in our initial work that needs to be done on this. We don't have a tracking system to tell us how many other Fallons there are out there but there probably are other Fallons out in America someplace. We don't have a system that allows us to correlate possible connections between a chronic disease like leukemia and pollution and we don't have a Federal rapid response team to help communities like Fallon when it becomes apparent that they have been hit with a cancer cluster of a chronic disease outbreak.

In the case of Fallon, the Centers for Disease Control I think has done an excellent job, helping to investigate possible causes and connections. So too has the Agency for Toxic Substance Control and Disease Registry, (inaudible) small public health department they have what most state departments has just been overwhelmed with this work. But I think the Federal agencies have been involved have done good work, but keep in mind this is the first cancer cluster investigation CDC has conducted since the 1980s.

If we had a nationwide tracking system and a Federal response team, we could focus on resources of the CDC and other Federal agencies. We could perhaps find some answers. More important we could help other communities avoid the anguish that has befallen the people of Fallon, Nevada. And these are the main reasons why you, Senator Clinton and I have every belief that our bill will bring a new national commitment to understanding the role that environment plays in chronic diseases.

It's why we worked hard to have our bill help communities track chronic diseases like childhood leukemia to help them correlate disease with pollution, help them respond to a tragedy like cancer cluster hits. It's interesting today. There's news all over America. A report that's out had a very nice piece on public radio among other places, about how breathing the air in cities like, I don't need to mention any cities, but big cities, causes lung cancer and it's the stuff we can't see that causes the damage.

So environment has an impact on our health. I hope that we can introduce a bill within the next week or so so that our nation can benefit from our experiences that we've had in Fallon and Long Island and other communities around the nation to help establish networks to monitor, track and correlate chronic diseases. States will get grants to do this work as I've indicated. We're very happy with the $17 1/2 million down payment to help states take the first steps toward building these networks. That sounds like a lot of money but we have 50 states and that $17 1/2 million is so important we need more.

The bill would require the Federal government to synthesize the information to a nationwide network. What's the benefit of that network to a community like Fallon, Nevada or Long Island, New York. If it existed today, investigators from CDC would be able to identify other places in the nation with higher than normal incidence of childhood leukemia. This would let CDC focus on possible causes. It could help answer some questions about cancer and other chronic diseases, help us find the underlying cause.

This is so important. I can remember work in this committee years ago where we determined that substances they were putting on fruit made people sick and because of the Federal law at the time, it was very, very difficult to get the chemical off the market and one reason we were able to get it off the market is through public relations. We embarrassed them into removing Alar from spring fruits, apples, cherries, principally and now they don't use that anymore. They found something else.

So we need to change the law. Our legislation will allow us to do that, allow us to have our Congress and our country recognize that environment plays an important part in what happens to people's health. Senate Chaffee and I have worked on legislation dealing with breast cancer and the environment. We've introduced that legislation.

So anyway I appreciate very much your work and your leadership, Madame Chairman. I apologize to the members of the committee for coming late and leaving early, but...

CLINTON: Well, I thank you Senator Reed for being able to come. I know how difficult your duties are on the floor. Senator Reed runs the floor of the Senate which is kind of like herding cats. It's a pretty difficult task and he does an absolutely superb job and I know that his commitment on this issue runs very deep. Certainly what's happened to the children in Fallon is something that he just carries with him in his heart every day and I also appreciate greatly his leadership along with Senator Chaffee on the breast cancer and environmental research act which is furthering the work that was started a few years ago principally focused on the Long Island breast cancer project where we began to try to unpack some of the connections between breast cancer and the environment in that particular part of my state.

So Senator Reed, I am just delighted you could be with us and I hope that as we work together going forward on this health tracking legislation, that we'll be able to call on these witnesses who've been so helpful to us and to make sure that what we're recommending really does fit in with what they see as the great need ahead and the air pollution study you mentioned, the co-author of that is Dr. George Thurston there on this panel who has had a chance to tell us about the extraordinary work involving 500,000 participants, 100 cities, looking at the national death index to really make the conclusions about the connection between air pollution and lung cancer, heart disease, other diseases that we're concerned about. So I thank you.

With that I'd go on to Dr. Hearne and I really believe that as you know from Dr. Hearne's testimony in Fallon, Nevada, after hearing what we need the work that she's done for the trust for America's health through the Pew Foundation give us a road map of how we need to be proceeding to come up with solutions to the problems that all of our witnesses are grappling with and that each of us care about. Dr. Hearne.

HEARNE: Thank you Senator Clinton and thank you Senator Reed. And unfortunately Nevada does have a point here on the map that I'll talk about a little bit later. But it's a pleasure to be here to speak today on the importance of investing in our public health system and particularly our nationwide health tracking network.

My career as a public health professional has been filled with challenges of how to better protect the public's health and I got that lesson in the mid '80s when we desperately needed better health information to, if we were going to more effectively protect communities. This happened when I was investigating a Superfund site which posed little risk to the surrounding neighborhoods according to our limited data on air, soil and water samples.

When I saw the site however, it was a very different story. This hazardous waste site looked more like a moonscape and the water there was just colors not found in nature. The shocking thing was all of a sudden a pack of kids came flying over a dirt pile while we were standing there, splashing into those iridescent puddles and then took off as soon as they saw us.

I was stunned then and I still am now. I can't tell you what the actual exposure of those children had and I certainly don't know what their health outcomes were. We didn't track it then and we don't track now that kind of critical data, things like asthma, birth defects, neurological disorders and that's part of the tragedy here.

You know where we get some of our best analysis on community health today, it's actually from these, push pins. As a sidebar, I had to convince the security guards that these were critical public health tools. But I've been in Toms River, New Jersey and stayed in a kitchen with parents with a sick child and looking at their map, their map with push pins of other cancer cases in the neighborhood and just a few months ago, we had the same story in Wellington, Ohio as you can see a dot there, where there's a town meeting on an MS cluster. We were just doing the same thing last year in Fallon where you saw Senator Reed did, Senator Ensign (ph), this very same scenario and it was parents who put together that story.

The problem is that each and every one of those dots that we have on this map displayed here, these were all stories that were discovered by parents, nurses, doctors. They were not discovered by health officials. These communities are actually asking the very same questions that have emerged in New York City following September 11th. The environmental contaminants that have been released from the wreckage of the World Trade Center may have a lasting health impact on those around the site, including the first responders.

The good news is that Congress did appropriate funds to do health tracking for rescue workers. And we heard also about CDCs currently analyzing blood and urine samples from fire fighters. They're actually looking at the exposures to the potential 110 different pollutants. But we're establishing this all after the fact. That's the problem. We should have this public health capacity in every community for every member. The trust for America's health recently released two reports that highlight the country's ability to track and prevent chronic diseases. Asthma is an epidemic today and what we found is that less than half of the states actually track asthma. Tracking is the key to understanding why we have this substantial rise in asthma and what are the clues as to how we're going to solve this.

We are just released last month a report card on birth defects in the country and unfortunately we found that the majority of states received poor grades on their efforts to track this number one killer in the country. Dr. Harris' program in California scored an A, which was one of eight states to do that. The bad news is, I'm concerned actually if it's going to be able to stay that way because his program just got cut in half.

The September 11th attacks have made the gap in our public health knowledge more dangerous than ever and while Congress is considering how to be better prepared and that's whether it be in our concerns about disease clusters or the unforeseen threats from biological or chemical terrorism, we have to make sure those investments are done in the right way and that it's part of a long-term commitment.

To meet this dual need, we need to modernize our crumbling public health infrastructure and I'm going to make three recommendations here. First and foremost, what we've been talking as a group is about the need for a nationwide health tracking network and that would strengthen our public health systems to be vigilant for all of today's health threats. This includes an early warning system that could detect a terrorist or accidental chemical event. It's the tracking of diseases and monitoring environmental exposures and just as Senator Reed was pointing out, it's about a rapid response and an investigation of clusters or emergency incidents.

Second is while Congress and the administration is taking a look at those long-term investments and I'm very appreciative for that critical $1 billion investment that was just made, this is an opportunity to make sure that we do it right and that we combine all these efforts so that we build a system on existing platforms and we do it right.

I finally also want to take this opportunity just to make the pitch that we need strong and qualified leadership at the helm of our public health agencies. I'm dismayed that our top Federal agencies do not have their leaders in place. I can go right through that list. It's CDC. It's FDA, NIH, HRSA, even the office of surgeon general. We need leadership now and cannot afford to have this gap go further.

Let me just wrap up saying that Congress has made an important investment in starting up nationwide health tracking. That $17.5 was a critical starting point, but we need to make this a clear mandate and a reality with the long-term commitment of $275 million per year. Common sense, it's cost effective; it's long overdue for the families of Fallon or Wellington or Toms River. The rest of this country wants and needs a modern public health system and we can certainly do a lot better than a box of push pins. Thank you.

CLINTON: (inaudible) Thank you very much Dr. Hearne. I just can't overstate the importance of the work that the trust has done. Without the trust, without Pew supporting the trust, I wouldn't be sitting here and I don't think any of us would have moved this issue the way that you've helped to galvanize us.

I wanted to start Dr. Harris by again thanking you for what you've been able to do with the March of Dimes and the California birth defect register, but I just heard Dr. Hearne say that your budget has been cut. Is it state funding that has been cut?

HARRIS: Yes, Senator. The state funding's been cut.

CLINTON: And I assume that that cut in budget will cut back on the services you can provide.

HARRIS: It cuts back on research. I think in our state as in most states, research is looked at as a luxury, not as a necessity. But if we're going to find causes of birth defects, it's absolutely a necessity.

CLINTON: Have you calculated the costs that you were referencing earlier with respect to the 10 percent deaths of the 150,000 children born with birth defects and then the continuing care that so many children require within your state in terms of how much money it will cost to take care of these children compared to how much money you're being given to try to understand what causes it.

HARRIS: Yeah, the cost data that I cited earlier was actually produced by the University of California. They took into account medical care costs, special education costs and actually lost wages and so the cost for cases between $100 and $500,000 per case. We looked at the investment in research as literally, it's many thousand times fold we'll spend in terms of treatment than if we spend in terms of research.

CLINTON: Well, I know that you've given us some of that information, but any additional information that we can get into the record to make the case about the cost benefits of this kind of research, it's always important.

HARRIS: I'd be happy to provide you with a publication. It's very easy.

CLINTON: Thank you very much Dr. Harris.

HARRIS: Thank you.

CLINTON: Dr. Thompson, I thank you for your testimony and your very vivid recollection of that day having spent so many years in Arkansas and being very familiar with the delta, I can sort of see it in my mind's eye and your life long commitment to public health is to be commended. As you think about what we're discussing today with the national health tracking system that Senator Reed and I believe we should be implementing in our country, is there any specific advice you can give us to ensure that states participate, that the state governments support this effort, that we provide a combination of incentives as well as some disincentive if necessary to make sure that every state is fully participating.

THOMPSON: Several things come to mind. First, it's going to be important to provide resources and as you may be well aware, many, many states around the country right now are experiencing revenue downturns. They're forcing them to cut back and those cuts aren't always made wisely. They're often made in places where they shouldn't be cut. Resources are people for this issue. In public health it's not hardware. It's not software. It's human beings who carry out these functions. That's going to be critically necessary. Another important consideration I think that's part of the recognition of this panel and also with me is that a system of surveillance for ongoing occurrence is important and we discussed how that would need to be an amalgam of state-based systems which feed into a national system as is the case with our existing system for communicable diseases.

But also that alone won't do the job and such other sampling techniques as the INHANES (ph) and others that can give us far more detailed information about certain subsets of the population are also going to be necessarily a critical part of this and in time I think the issue of how this should be steered -- this is a system. This is a major undertaking. It's going to take us many years to get to the point that we're willing to be satisfied that we've achieved what we want in terms of the system.

It's important to have involvement of the right voices. I mentioned a couple, the Council of State and Territorial Epidemiologists really are the nation's body of experts on how you track all diseases. That group needs to be part of it as does, do other public health groups. I think there's a clear understanding that's going to be the case.

So those are the main things that I would suggest in considering how such a system should be crafted.

CLINTON: What about also the inclusion of the environmental council of the states? I guess ECOS, all of these acronyms are hard to keep up with. Could there be a closer and better working relationship between the health agencies and the environmental agencies, because we've heard how difficult it is sometimes even in the same state for their to be much understanding and cooperation.

THOMPSON: There certainly is a lot of opportunity for better interaction between ECOS on the one hand and organizations like ASTO on the other. Right now most of our interaction depends on the relationships that we've cultivated in our own states. My good friend Charles Chisholm (ph) and I talk on a regular basis. He's our environmental regulator in the state.

In most states, in fact in all but about four states, the environmental regulatory agency and the state's health protection agency are separate. There are a few states that combine them together. There are reasons why this is a good idea and reasons why it's a bad one. But it's important for those groups to interact with each other, talk with other. Many states have good relations. Others don't. I think leadership from national organizations such as ASTO and ECOS in bringing these groups together would be an important part of addressing this issue.

CLINTON: Well, that certainly came home to me at our field hearing in lower Manhattan a few weeks ago. Dr. Thurston was testifying there. We had a very straightforward honest accounting from the gentleman who heads the department of environmental conservation in the city who just said, we don't do air. We do water and sewage and nobody did air it turns out, because everybody kind of assumed that the Federal governments or the EPA did air. And the EPA doesn't do indoor air.

So we saw some very big gaps in cooperation and understanding which I was very proud that everybody just kind of owned up to it and said, you know, we got to do better than we're doing and I'm very grateful that EPA and the city are now working on an indoor air quality task force. But it just illustrates your point that in most cities as well as most states and of course New York City's as big as most of our states, that the environmental authorities and the health authorities don't often interact unless there's some kind of emergency and then even within each of their departments, they often don't have overlapping expertise to be able to match air to air or water to water or whatever it might be. So we've got some work cut out for us. I think your suggestions are very helpful. I appreciate that and I hope we can come back to you and ask for your review of what we're doing and make sure it makes sense and your experience.

Dr. Thurston, I want to again thank you and appreciate greatly your being here. I know you've had a very busy 24 hours with the release of your study in the AMA journal, but it's a tremendous step forward in our understanding and I really hope you'll convey my appreciation to your co-authors and the colleagues who worked on this.

In your testimony, you talked about how you used individual risk factor data collected by the American Cancer Society in combination with air pollution data and the national death index to draw your conclusions. How difficult was it for you and your researchers to acquire and integrate that data using the existing state and Federal systems and databases and do you have any recommendations for us as to how we can from the very beginning of this health tracking effort, try to encourage more compatible and integrated data systems.

THURSTON: Well, it was actually accomplished with a great amount of ease actually because the American Cancer Society already had an infrastructure set up under their cancer prevention study and the network is available. So that -- and it was -- and it's being made available to researchers with obviously great efforts to ensure that privacy of data is maintained which I think is always foremost.

I guess I don't really have any administrative suggestions but I guess that it would be important to keep in mind the possible research uses of the data and to set it up in a way such that researchers, independent researchers, can apply to utilize the data. Some of the states that I've dealt with trying to get hospital admissions data, they'll say sure. We'll sell you the data and it's at exorbitant prices that I could not afford.

I gather that they set these prices because health maintenance organizations and people who have money unlike researchers, use that data in the way that they, I don't know, in the way they decide on how to pay back to recipients and so forth. So they actually have money to help pay for the system and (inaudible) but on the research and they say well these are the prices.

And so I mean I don't -- they do have expenses and they have to cover them to maintain the system. On the other hand I think that if someone's using it for research rather than profit, there should be some difference there. So I guess I would just interject in the interests of science that researchers be kept in mind when setting up these systems.

CLINTON: That's very helpful and I wasn't aware of that so you brought it to our attention. So I thank you for that. Can you comment on how the administration's recent clear skies proposal would impact on the particulate matter pollution issue? Are you aware of it?

THURSTON: I'm not familiar with the details.

CLINTON: One of our challenges is the -- and I think this goes to Dr. Burke's and Dr. Hearne's points is that there has been a steady erosion of a lot of our standards over the past year or so in an effort to erode them even further and to deregulate even further which would make the collection and assessment of such standards even more difficult. So we're kind of -- we've got some conflict here.

I mean some of us are trying to improve and expedite the collection of data and the analysis of it for the use of regulatory and legal purposes and then there are others who want to turn the clock back on the Clean Air Act and on the efforts to keep information slowing about pollutants. So it would make your job much more difficult I guess. We would be, there would be less access and frankly less information collected and certainly fewer consequences owing to that.

THURSTON: Sure. Any information to do the monitoring. I would, just as an aside. I know something that you're interested in, that some of the things that some Canadian researchers can investigate to their population, they have national health care and so that they have a very extensive information about just regular, for example doctors' visits and information about contributing causes so they can do far more investigations of the underlying causes behind disease because they have this comprehensive health care system. And so I think that such a system is very good for a number of reasons and that's just another benefit that these people.

You know, if you look at sort of the pyramid of effects of air pollution, this study's looking at mortality. You have to remember that that's just the tip of the iceberg and there's a much broader part of the pyramid or of the iceberg beneath that point and that there are many more effects if you have one death, you have many more hospital admissions and then you have many, many more emergency room visits and many doctors' visits. But we -- I'm frustrated in trying to figure out for example, doctors' visits.

There's just no record keeping of this in the United States and other countries, England, they've looked at this and found the effects there are much broader than you see just looking at the hospitals and also you see a different clientele. When we look at hospital admissions and I guess I digress a little bit here, but when we look at hospital admissions, you're looking and the hospital visit, you're looking at a specific population that uses the hospital as their physician sort of. But what you're missing is all the people who have let's say health insurance, who got to their physician. And there may be significant effects in that population, but we're not really able to study those people, because we don't have any records of that. So anyway I think, just as an aside, this kind of system -- other nations have much more comprehensive information available for investigations because they have national health care.

CLINTON: Thank you and you know, I would appreciate it perhaps while the record in this hearing is still open for another two weeks, that it would be helpful for you to look at some of the data about power plant pollution and the impact of that. I know you mentioned several different reasons for the particulate matter, diesel, soot and power plant emissions and one of the big debates that we're engaged in here is what to do about power plant pollution, particularly because our big challenge is that in the northeast, in New York for example, the impact of the pollution comes from other states, because that's where the plants are with the wind patterns that bring (ph) emissions and so they're not even necessarily plants in our backyard that we're suffering the increased pollution from.

THURSTON: Yeah, about half of the pollution into New York City is local and about half is transported in and certainly a big chunk, probably the largest single source of that pollution of this uncontrolled power plants in the midwest and if Senator Reed were here, I would have liked to have just pointed out to him that in setting energy policy, I think it's important to remember and I think this study and other studies like it point out that when you set energy policy, you're also setting environmental and health policy.

CLINTON: That's exactly right. Thank you very much Dr. Thurston. Dr. Burke, another issue of great concern to me and you, with your work in New Jersey, you're well aware of the superfund sites. And the administration has just come out with a proposal to relieve polluters from the financial burden of helping to clean up these superfund sites to a great extent and it is especially troubling because we've not really reauthorized the superfund law for a number of years. We have been stuck in this political gridlock as some people don't want to either acknowledge the health impacts and the environmental impacts from superfund toxic sites and don't want to be responsible for cleaning them up.

Now the biggest superfund site in the country is the Hudson River and there was thankfully, just a very good decision from the EPA with respect to dredging and the PCBs that are in the bottom of the river due to long industrial use from General Electric. Do you have any thoughts based both on your experience in a state health agency now at Johns Hopkins and the work you're doing, about how we can number one, better educate the public about what we now do know, what is irrefutable about the environment, the connections with health and certainly the most intense toxic sites that we have to deal with. And number two, any thoughts you've got about the legislation that we're doing that would help on the regulatory side, make the decisions that need to be made with respect to these sites.

BURKE: That's a great question. First of all, as you probably know, superfund had many of its origins in New Jersey in response to the then orphan sites, abandoned landfills and things that we began to discover were devastating communities throughout the state. It's certainly a national issue and continues to be a national issue. Despite the efforts to move forward with brown fields and voluntarily clean up, there still needs to be that backstop there. There still needs to be a superfund to address not only community concerns but the incredible environmental impacts of contaminated aquifers and ongoing environmental degradation at these major sites.

One disappointment, frankly, having been involved in the development of superfund and the discovery and assessment of so many of those early sites, is the fact that we failed to invest in the public health side of that. As I mentioned in my testimony, the response of superfund unfortunately, when there's a public health concern, is to drill wells or to contain things in place, because that's what it's funded to do. And in some ways superfund has missed the mark. The creation of the Agency for Toxic Substances and Disease Registry is perhaps the greatest public health legacy of superfund, but really it was not funded appropriately.

The amount we spend on clean up is so vastly greater than the amount we spend on public health which is after all the reason why we're cleaning up those sites. So I think your proposal to move forward with legislation to strengthen tracking, to strengthen exposure monitoring in those communities, to understand what people are exposed to, would be a great way to approach this issue of environmental health around these sites. We have lived it. We have seen those impacts, those of us who have conducted those investigations and I think you can provide us with a tool to move forward and put it in perspective, because I don't think that necessarily regulation is always the only answer to an environmental problem and sound public health can be a very effective way to responding to the true concerns.

CLINTON: I would love to pick your brain on that at greater length because I think that's a very interesting perspective. You know, this is a real dilemma because certainly the arguments that are interposed against any effort with respect to the environment or health and its relationship to source of economic activity, particularly industrial, manufacturing, utility sites, is that we're going to diminish the economic well being of the people who work in the communities that are served. And I think that was an argument that, if you look at that argument on kind of a scale, you know, you had to weigh more clearly in that direction earlier when we didn't have the information which we could really use to rebut the very legitimate economic concerns that people have.

But if you look not only at this map, but at more detailed maps that I've seen of cancer clusters and disease clusters, I mean it follows the industrialization of American and there's a correlation that's clear. Many other parts of the country are certainly now facing the same kinds of issues that you faced in New Jersey, that we faced in New York, that are faced in Libby, Montana, even.

But at some point, there has to be a shared responsibility. Investors and stock holders and corporate leadership along with the public, has to share the responsibility because now we know what we're doing has environmental and health impacts and it's just a fair question to figure out how to allocate the responsibility and the resources, but I hope we can continue that conversation Dr. Burke.

And finally Dr. Hearne, I thank you so much for your persistence and your absolute determination that we're going to do better by our public health in the future. You know, we did have a great investment in public health, primarily focused on communicable diseases, but we've let it atrophy. We have not paid it the attention it needed. It certainly hasn't been kept infused with the resources commensurate with what we've learned should be the proper province of public health as we've gone through the years. So I hope that this 21st century effort to try to bring us back to speed both in response to bioterrorism and with respect to chronic diseases will be a good base to build on in the future.

Now I know that from Dr. Harris' testimony with respect to birth defects, from the previous panel, we're talking about a lot of state- based asthma and cancer registries. You have recommended that a nationwide network really should replace our at least if not replace, build on and subsume these disparate tracking systems so that we have a national tracking system that is in place that's combined Federal and state and local resources. Can you give us specific suggestions about how to build on and coordinate, rather than replace the good work that's being done by Dr. Thompson and other health officials around the state?

HEARNE: Absolutely. I think it's important to recognize the call for nationwide health track is not about reinventing the wheel. It's truly understanding what we do well out there, where the gaps are and trying to shore those up. And that is particularly important to consider while we're making that investment in increasing our infrastructure for terrorism response, we really have to be smart in looking at the full range of health stress out there and do this in a strategic and collaborative process.

I was struck by Dr. Thurston's research and his comments in recognizing well, he was able to do and get the data for the mortality aspects of his study. Wouldn't it have been great if he could have done his research and also included the full breadth of respiratory problems out there. He can't do that research and it was relatively simple, only a few years, right, for the mortality side. But we should be looking at that full iceberg. We truly are just getting the picture at the top as he noted. But we should know the asthma. We should know respiratory conditions that are disabling. People may not have always died from, but there's many great health threats.

This is about building on those platforms. It's about connecting the dots. We do track infectious disease. It's how we learned, in fact one of the battles of the epidemics in the 1800s. We're doing a kind of OK job there is getting strengthened. But let's take many of the infrastructure and Dr. Thompson was very good in laying out a number of those pieces, be it, I can do the list of acronyms here, public health loves that, but be it NEDS (ph), be it the cancer registries, be it birth defects, this is unfolding, creating that base and doing it right.

It's not rocket science. It's about making the commitment, giving the mandate to CDC to work in partnership with ASTO, the state partners, with communities who have a right to know about this data and putting that infrastructure in place. It's doable; it just has got to be mandated, authorized and empowered to be that kind of commitment to a 21st century public health system.

CLINTON: I thank you. I just have one final question because Dr. Thurston made a very good point about how energy policy is health and environmental policy. Well to a certain extent, I think education policy is too. And one thing that has gotten very limited attention up until now is the relationship between environmental exposures and our staggering increase in children labeled as in special education needs.

And do any of you have any particular comments you want to make on that, because we are going to be reauthorizing the individuals with disabilities education act and it is the single biggest cost in school budgets and again, we could save a lot of money if we had a better idea of how to prevent birth defects, developmental disabilities, the kind of challenges that children face which then require more intervention and yes Dr. Harris.

HARRIS: Basically you're dealing with a huge set of problems. Just in California, the children who are mentally retarded, so I'm talking about IQs under 70. These are severely disabled children. That's 1 percent of all births, that alone. And in general we do not understand the causes of developmental disabilities. We don't understand what environmental links there are if any. So this should be a major focus because you will spend literally tens of billions of dollars on special ed on these kids if you don't understand what causes it. You're exactly right.

CLINTON: Well, I think for all those and many more reasons, particularly the personal pain and anguish that so many individuals and families deal with because of chronic diseases, I thank all of you for being part of this hearing. I am so grateful for your help. We'll leave the record open for two weeks. Any additional thoughts, not only from the panelists, but I know there are many interested audience members. Please submit any additional information to the record for this hearing. Thank you very much.

The hearing's adjourned.

"Inside Politics," CNN, 3/7/2002

CROWLEY: "On the Record" this Thursday, New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. A little while ago, Mrs. Clinton was on familiar turf at the White House, where she joined the president and other New York lawmakers for a ceremony marking the government's $20 billion aid package for New York City.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Last September, when Chuck and I were in the Oval Office, you never promised us a rose garden. But you did promise us $20 billion. And today we're getting both -- the rose garden and the $20 billion. And we thank you.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

CROWLEY: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton joins me now from Capitol Hill. A good day for you, Senator Clinton. Is that going to be all of the money New York City needs to get back on its feet?

CLINTON: Well, it was a very good day for New York and America. And all of us are grateful that the president's promise has been put in writing and specifics, and we're looking forward to getting that passed and getting the money flowing.

Obviously we don't yet know all of the costs that it will take to rebuild New York. But this gives us the chance to do the kind of planning, to take care of the needs that have arisen in the last six months, and to get prepared for whatever else we need to do to keep businesses downtown, to keep residents downtown. So that the entire city, state and country will benefit from a revitalized, rebuilt New York.

CROWLEY: I couldn't help but notice your high praise for President Bush's help for New York City, and contrast that with some of the complaints we've been hearing from your fellow Democrats, in particular the majority leader, about the conduct of the war. Do you have any problems with the way this president is conducting the war in Afghanistan?

CLINTON: You know, I think there isn't any doubt that all of us are united behind our president and the men and women in uniform who are serving us so well in Afghanistan and elsewhere. I also think that we are all united behind our belief that, out of the many voices that make up America, we come to a decision through debate and discussion. I think that's all to the good.

Among the values that we are defending in this fight for freedom is the value of being able to express our opinions. And I think that it's a good sign, a very healthy sign, that while we are absolutely united behind our men and women in uniform, it's appropriate and proper for the Congress to discharge its constitutional obligation by asking the kinds of questions that are on everyone's mind.

CROWLEY: Let me move you into pure politics. I understand you're going to be doing a fundraiser for Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts next week. Are you going to be helping a lot of the people who would maybe like to be president in 2004, or is it Senator Kerry that's caught your attention?

CLINTON: You know, I'm going to be helping all of the Democrats. And I've done that. I will continue to do that, because I believe that the Democratic Party and what we're fighting for -- a lot of the positions on domestic issues -- are in the long-term best interests of our country. I'm very pleased that I'll be going to support my colleague from Massachusetts with the other women Democratic senators.

But I am ready and very eager to help all of the Democrats who are running for reelection, running to serve for the first time. And I will continue to do so.

CROWLEY: Senator Clinton, as you know, Robert Ray issued his final report yesterday on the Starr investigation. He said in it that he had enough evidence to charge the former president. I wonder if you think that conclusion was appropriate or true?

CLINTON: Well, I had a statement about that yesterday. It's in the past. I think history and the American people are the final judges of all of that.

CROWLEY: Do you think it was an appropriate conclusion, though?

CLINTON: Well, I'll leave that to others to decide. Right now I'm just working as hard as I can to do the best job possible for preparing New York for the future. And today we got a big boost from the president and the administration, in supporting our request for the money that we need to rebuild New York City.

CROWLEY: One last question. We're coming up on the six-month anniversary of the attacks on the World Trade Center Towers and the Pentagon. What have you learned about New York City residents? What have you learned about the country in those six months?

CLINTON: Well, I have been just reinforced in my rock-bottom belief that this is the greatest nation in the history of the world. And Americans are resilient and courageous, and no one more than New Yorkers. I don't think there is a city anywhere in the world that could have responded as well as New York City did, that would have shown the courage and just the sheer gutsiness that it took to deal with the horrific attack that we suffered on the 11th.

Obviously, we are still trying to pick up the pieces of broken lives and broken buildings, and trying to get people back to work. But the resolve that New Yorkers and Americans have shown, and the support that America has given to New York, is in the best tradition of our country.

And as we fight for freedom and to defend ourselves and the values we believe in, around the world right now, I think it's only fair to stop and reflect how six months ago, there were a lot of New Yorkers who demonstrated, unequivocally, their commitment to each other, to their fellow man and to the overriding goal of freedom. And I just am awed by what I know of and what I have learn about our city, our state and our country.

CROWLEY: Mrs. Clinton, we have about 15 seconds left, I think, until the president comes to the Rose Garden to announce that he's sending an envoy back to the Middle East. You were just in the Middle East. Do you think it's appropriate that the U.S. get involved at this point, while the violence is flaring?

CLINTON: Yes, I do. I'm very pleased that the president has decided to send General Zinni back to the Middle East. I think it's imperative that we do whatever we can to try to bring enough pressure on Yasser Arafat and the Palestinians, to end the violence so that we can try to get back to a discussion of how to implement Tenet- Mitchell, and maybe even pursue the overtures made by the Saudis and others, towards some final resolution of these terrible problems.

CROWLEY: I'm sorry to interrupt you. We are seeing the president now. Thank so you much.

CLINTON: Thank you.

REMARKS BY PRESIDENT BUSH AND OTHERS AT EVENT TO MARK RELEASE OF FEDERAL NEW YORK RELIEF FUNDS, 3/7/2002

LOCATION: WHITE HOUSE, ROSE GARDEN

SECTION: WHITE HOUSE BRIEFING

SEN. CLINTON: Well, thank you so much, Mr. President, for convening this opportunity for us to be told in specifics how the promise to New York is being kept. And it's especially reassuring to all the New Yorkers who are still concerned about their futures and the future of the city.

You know, last month, in the Budget Committee, when I asked Mitch Daniels about the aid for New York, he responded by saying that the president's commitment was inviolate. Well, Mr. President, last September, when Chuck and I were in the Oval Office, you never promised us a Rose Garden.

PRESIDENT BUSH: (Chuckles.) (Inaudible.)

SEN. CLINTON: But you did promise us $20 billion, and today we're getting both -- the Rose Garden and the $20 billion.

PRESIDENT BUSH: (Chuckles.) (Inaudible.)

SEN. CLINTON: And we thank you. And we look forward to working with you as additional needs arise for our workers and the rebuilding efforts stemming from the attacks.

You know, Mr. President, thanks to Charlie Rangel's efforts, we're hoping to have a joint session of Congress in New York. I was delighted that the speaker threw his support behind the idea. Certainly the leadership of the Senate has also come on board. And perhaps you'll consider coming up and speaking to such a joint session about America's commitment to rebuilding New York and America's commitment to fighting for freedom that you are leading today.

I think all of us remember that famous newspaper headline back in the 1970s, when another president was asked to help New York City.

PRESIDENT BUSH: (Chuckles.)

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I don't write newspaper headlines, which should be obvious to everyone -- (laughter) -- but maybe tomorrow's headline will be, "Bush to New York: Help is on the way."

And so, Mr. President, we say thank you. We say thank you for your commitment made to Chuck and me. Thank you for staying with us. Thank you for translating that promise into the specifics that have been presented to us today. And we look forward to continuing to work with you to rebuild New York, so that it is better than ever, provides even more opportunities, symbolizes the American dream, and stands for the freedom that we fight for today. Thank you so much, Mr. President. (Applause.)

PRESIDENT BUSH: Great job.

U.S. SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA) HOLDS HEARING ON MEDICAL PRIVACY REGULATIONS, 4/16/2002

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I very much appreciate Senator Warner's comments, because I think all of us are looking for the appropriate way to handle this new world of information that is out there and to protect people's right to privacy, especially the most personal and intimate information and details about them.

So, I'm grateful for the recognition that this is probably a moving target to some extent, that we will evolve a response to, because I feel very strongly about the right to privacy and I also understand the need for health related organizations to have access to good information.

But, I must confess, Mr. Allen, I am confused and it may be that this is such a complicated, difficult area that it's hard to follow, but I just wanted to run through a couple of issues.

As I understand what the Administration is proposing, we no longer will require affirmative consent, but instead an acknowledgement that information about privacy rights has been provided. Is that correct?

ALLEN: It's correct in the sense that we do not require that a written consent be given.

ALLEN: It does not preclude an entity from seeking consent as far as --

CLINTON: Well, that's what interesting to me, because as I study what you're proposing, on the one hand, we no longer have an affirmative consent process, but you do permit entities to go ahead and voluntarily seek consent.

ALLEN: And there's a good reason for that, and the reason is this, is that in some cases you may have, for example, a hospital that already has consent --

CLINTON: Right.

ALLEN: -- for treatment --

CLINTON: Right.

ALLEN: -- which is what we call informed consent.

CLINTON: Right.

ALLEN: They may want to go ahead and still have consent for using that information that will be consistent with treatment. And therefore, some entities may choose to seek a written consent from a patient, but what we haven't done, is we've not required everyone to do that.

CLINTON: But, what you have done is when an entity does choose to require consent, you have eliminated many of the consent requirements that would apply to the voluntary requests for consent.

ALLEN: And again, the reason for that is because we're trying to maintain flexibility --

CLINTON: But, you're trying to have it both ways --

ALLEN: I don't think you've let me answer --

CLINTON: (inaudible)

ALLEN: (inaudible)

CLINTON: Mr. Allen, let me finish because I'm trying to --

ALLEN: Because you asked me a question and you let me answer the question.

CLINTON: No, but let me pose the question. You're trying --

ALLEN: I thought you already did.

CLINTON: No, I didn't, Mr. Allen.

ALLEN: Okay. Well, go for it.

CLINTON: Thank you, dear. Now, if you are on the one hand, not requiring consent and then on the other hand, when someone voluntarily pursues consent, you eliminate what the original rule had in for the provisions of consent, seems to me you're going after consent from both ends. Either you offer it or you don't offer it, but when it is voluntarily chosen you undermine it and I think if you look at what you've done to eliminate that in the name of flexibility, you've essentially vicitated (ph) consent, even if someone voluntarily chooses to pursue consent.

ALLEN: And your question is?

CLINTON: Why have you done that?

ALLEN: First of all, I would beg the question that we have not done that. I think what we have done is we have strengthened the process by, one, when we removed mandatory written consent, in terms of the rule, we have now enabled a patient to get care. Plain and simple.

But, at the same time, we have enabled a patient for the very first time, under this rule, to have information about the practices of the provider, to have opportunity to review those practices and engage in a discussion about those practices and seek to restrict the uses of that information.

That is all essential for protecting and providing protections for an individual in terms of how that information is used. That does not happen. That will now happen under this proposed rule that did not happen under the former rule.

Beyond that, we have also provided, again, we have not precluded entities from seeking to get a written consent and that written consent, we're not dictating the confines of that, because, again, it's voluntary. It's something that some providers may seek. Others may not.

But, what we can guarantee is, is that that patient will get information and notice of the practices and procedures of that entity. And that is what we think is essential to the decision making of the patient, but also to the continuity of the care that that patient will receive from that provider.

CLINTON: But, you're also eliminating the requirements that the covered entity inform the patient it's receiving remuneration for making the communication. You're eliminating the much more restrictive definition of marketing so that very often a poor patient will receive information and won't know that there's a financial interest in the entity providing it.

ALLEN: Okay. What we've done is a couple things. Again, Senator, is one, in terms of consent, it only relates to what we've eliminated the consent for is for treatment, payment and operations. Anything beyond that, you must get the patient's consent for the use of that information.

In terms of remuneration, what you're discussing, is how we address the issue of practices that, for example, I cited the example earlier, what we were concerned with is we have circumstances in which providers participate and continuing medical education conferences, those conferences may be paid for by "x" company. What we don't want to have happen is having to have providers having to toil over whether or not they receive immunoration (ph) from a company simply because later on they prescribe a product that they think is in the best interest of their patient.

But, because they had been given an option to participate in this conference, we did not want that to have to be considered as marketing, because that is consistent with that provider's treatment of the individual. So, therefore, we have broadened what we look for in terms of the definition of marketing, but we have limited it to that which is outside of the treatment, payment continuum.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Allen, I have to confess that I'm very disturbed by some of these changes, because I think the practical effects is to substantially weaken the privacy rule. And I appreciate some of the difficulties that were brought to our attention in a hearing that we held last year, and I certainly believe we should have targeted effective measures for dealing with some of those issues, like the one that the pharmacists raised.

But, you've thrown the baby out with the bath, the best I can tell and opened up a huge loophole for nearly any use of information without any effective check on it, because we won't have any proof that the patient has ever been adequately informed.

And, I think that it's unrealistic to believe that many patients are going to be that well skilled in the nuance of these rules to even know what the questions are that they're supposed to be asking and I think we have an obligation to air on the side of privacy.

And I think that this rule, the recommended changes to the rule really go the opposite direction. So, I will be very interested in following what you're proposing on this, but I think that the witnesses who will be coming to appear before us in the next panel have some very specific issues, and I hope that you and your colleagues will listen very carefully, because I think it would be quite useful to take another stab at trying to figure out how to do what you're trying to do in the name of flexibility without undermining privacy.

ALLEN: Senator, and I take your point very, very seriously. We are here to listen. We are in a comment period and we expect to get many comments. In fact, we expect, probably will get -- particularly after this hearing -- a lot more comments. And we welcome that.

But, I think from the perspective that we have taken, we've tried to approach this from the patient's perspective. While you may think the privacy rights are the most overriding issue, we stepped back and thought that it was far more important that in seeking to maximum an individual's right of privacy, that it was far more important that we ensure that we do nothing, that we do absolutely nothing to impede their access to care.

Because having a right to privacy means very little to a person who is desperately needing care. Whether it be the mother who is care --

CLINTON: You're not going to --

ALLEN: -- for her child --

CLINTON: -- get any argument from any of us about that, Mr. Allen, we are all in favor of care. It's just that we're concerned that in the name of care, profit has a very big role in a lot of the efforts to use information available to health entities and there's got to be a line drawn and you've ended up on one side of the line, I think some of us are more comfortable on the other side of the line, but, that's to be worked out and discussed and I appreciate your willingness to listen to the comments that will be coming to you.

ALLEN: Certainly.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA) HOLDS HEARING ON WOMEN'S HEALTH, 4/25/2002

CLINTON: We're going to go ahead and get started. As many of you probably know, we have a lot of activity occurring today with respect to the energy legislation that we've been dealing with for quite some weeks, and there will be a series of votes starting around 3 o'clock. A number of my colleagues are tied up in that, as well as some other pressing business, and so I'm going to get started because we have a very large interested crowd here.

This is Take Your Daughters to Work Day, so this is a particularly apt subject for a hearing on this day, and it's a real pleasure to welcome all of you.

You know, less than 10 years ago, the Office of Research on Women's Health was created at the National Institutes of Health. I personally think that was one of the earliest and best decisions of the Clinton administration. And at the time, we recognized that women's health issues needed and deserved more attention. I believe that we've come quite a long way in fulfilling that recognition and awareness, but we still have a lot of work ahead of us.

I want to thank Senators Harkin and Kennedy for calling this hearing today. They clearly recognize, as I do, that our business is unfinished. I also want to thank Senators Snowe, Harkin, and Mikulski for introducing a bill to establish an office on women's health in every major federal health agency.

We have some unfinished business and then some new business. Among the areas of new business, I think we have to pay particular attention to the intersection between women's health and the environment.

I held a hearing on Long Island because we have a higher than national average rate of breast cancer on Long Island. There are other places in our country where that is also the case. We don't know whether there's an environmental link or cause that we're missing, but we're now committed to finding out what the answer might be. I've introduced an environmental health tracking bill, and I also appreciate greatly Senator Chafee's Breast Cancer and Environmental Research Act.

We know that many of our young people face challenges in developing healthy eating and exercise behaviors. Obesity is increasing in our country, and minority women are particularly affected, dying far too early from diabetes and heart disease. We also know that women continue to suffer from eating disorders, constantly striving to be excessively thin, defining their values based on their dress size and too often dying in the process.

Senator Bingaman and I are introducing a bill that would attempt to prevent the serious array of eating and health related problems by supporting research to identify the best ways to help young people, particularly young women, develop healthy eating habits.

Although we tend to focus on diseases that afflict women, we also have to remember the special roles that women play as our caregivers, both in our families and in society. We are particularly concerned about the large number of women who find themselves in the so-called sandwich generation. Twenty-six million Americans care for an adult family member who is ill and disabled. The vast majority of them are women.

Eighteen million children have a condition that places significant demands on their parental caregivers, again mostly caregiving mothers. Four million Americans with mental retardation or a developmental disability live with their families.

These numbers are very high, and I think not well known among the general public. We often in America tend to think of the individual challenges facing our families as not shared necessarily by the larger society of which we are a part.

I know that there are many people who are concerned about the health effects that flow from the emotional and physical demands of caregiving. And Senators Snowe, Mikulski, Breaux, and I will be introducing the Life Span Respite Care Act next week that we hope will begin to both define and deal with these challenges.

So there's a lot that we have to talk about today. We're going to try to get through all of our distinguished witnesses before what is called the vote-o-rama starts. That's where you have votes about every 10 minutes, and you stay right there until they're done.

So I want to begin with the first panel, and we have with us Dr. Eve Slater, the assistant secretary for health at the Department of Health and Human Services. She is responsible for overseeing the Office of Women's Health at HHS.

We also have Dr. James S. Marks, who is also a master in public health. He's the director of the National Center for Chronic Disease Prevention and Health Promotion at the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. He oversees all CDC chronic disease prevention programs, including the Wise Woman Program.

Welcome to both of you, and thank you for taking on these public responsibilities.

Dr. Slater?

SLATER: Senator Clinton, thank you very, very much. It's truly a pleasure to testify before you on behalf of this committee. I will state that this is actually my very first testimony before the Senate committee, and I'm especially pleased to be testifying today on the topic of women's health. I think it's very appropriate and, again, my pleasure.

My colleagues, Dr. Marks, my team at HHS, and, of course, the secretary are very dedicated to improving women's health and to developing a platform working with this committee in order to make some of our objectives, in fact, as many as we can, achievable.

In 2002, the Department of Health and Human Services will spend almost $70 billion on women's health. As you are well aware, just three agencies expend nearly 97 percent of these funds, the NIH, HRSA, and the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services. They are responsible for over $61 billion in spending.

Doing the math, we can conclude that the majority of federal expenditures on women's health support medical and public health services and research on diseases and conditions important to women. The remaining 3 percent of this year's budget for women's health is divided among eight other offices and agencies, and those, of course, include the CDC, the Indian Health Service, FDA, and, of course, the Office of Public Health and Science, which I oversee. In 2002, the Office of Public Health and Science has budgeted over $68 million for women's health.

With strong support from this committee and others in Congress, the Department of Health and Human Services has contributed to a number of important successes in women's health over the past decade. For example, in 2000, nearly 85 percent of women over age 18 received a PAP smear in the previous three years, and 75 percent of women over 50 received a mammogram.

These numbers not only represent the successful achievement of the Healthy People 2000 benchmarks for these preventative services, but, most importantly, they represent saved lives. From 1992 to 1998, the rate of breast cancer mortality declined by an average of almost 2.5 percent each year, and a similar rate of decline was seen for cervical cancer.

SLATER: Programs such as the Breast and Cervical Cancer Early Detection Program at CDC have made important contributions to meeting these goals for low income women across the country. Additionally, the secretary's and CMS's focus on approving Medicaid waivers for treatment services mean that low income women now in 39 states have access to services that they didn't have just two years ago.

Women are not only living longer. They are living more healthy and productive lives in their later years. Importantly, women today are becoming more informed and are appropriately asking for more details about the health issues that affect them.

Our department of women's health and the office of the secretary have encouraged this trend, and with support from this committee, they established the National Women's Health Information Center, the NWHIC, which targets public outreach with communities through neighborhood participation. The NWHIC actually has received in the order of 3,000 hits per month, which is, I think, a very impressive track record for that site.

We all know, and you, especially, know there is still much work to be done. Chronic conditions such as cardiovascular disease and diabetes are among the most prevalent, costly, and preventable of all health problems.

Cardiovascular disease and its manifestations, heart attack, stroke, are the leading cause of death for U.S. women, and deaths alone understate the burden of the illness of cardiovascular disease. Heart disease remains the leading cause of disability among working adults. Stroke alone accounts for disability among more than one million Americans, and almost six million hospitalizations each year are due to cardiovascular disease.

Diabetes, often linked with obesity, has reached epidemic proportions in this country. It is the fifth leading cause of death among women. More than one out of every 10 women in the United States displays signs of pre-diabetes or diabetes.

According to recent data from the NCEP ATP-3 study, approximately one-quarter of all U.S. women display signs of the metabolic syndrome, which is a condition that predisposes to developing diabetes and cardiovascular disease. That number stands for 35 percent of Hispanic women. And in African-American women, women outnumber men 57 percent in the metabolic syndrome, and among Hispanics, 26 more women than men have signs of this very serious risk prone condition.

Among African-American and Hispanic women in their mid 60s, nearly one out of...

MIKULSKI: Dr. Slater, excuse me. I've just been advised that there are going to be votes throughout the afternoon. Could you summarize your testimony?

SLATER: Absolutely, Senator.

MIKULSKI: And I'm going to ask unanimous consent that this very informative full statement be included in the record.

SLATER: Thank you very much. It's a pleasure to get to our focus. The focus of our department within HHS would be to focus on preventing the truly preventable killers and debilitating diseases that affect women. These are chronic diseases.

We will focus on cardiovascular disease, in particular, stroke, with attention to lowering blood pressure and cholesterol; on cancer, with attention to increased screening and decreased smoking; on diabetes and obesity, with attention to improved diet and exercise; and HIV-AIDS. The conditions were selected, first, because they represented the leading causes of morbidity and mortality in women, but, second, disparities exist between men and women for these diseases, either in treatment, incidence or prevalence, and, finally, they are all preventable.

Additionally, as you are aware, the next surgeon general's report will focus on the topic of osteoporosis, a disease that affects women disproportionately.

The mission of our office, to paraphrase Senator Frist, who published a recent editorial in JAMA, is after establishing goals and research priorities -- and we agree with the senator here -- we must, quote, "move beyond input means and anecdotal evidence to develop new metrics to measure scientific advances and their causal relationship to improved outcomes." The focus is on prevention, on developing metrics to determine what works, and to translate the best of science into improving these particular conditions that affect women.

Thank you very much, Senator, and I'll conclude there.

MIKULSKI: Thank you, Dr. Slater. We could spend all afternoon just with you. And thank you for that excellent testimony.

I'm also going to follow my own encouragement and not make my opening statement and just ask unanimous consent that it be included in the record. I know you'll find (OFF-MIKE) mesmerize themselves. But we'll put me aside.

Dr. Marks, we welcome you with your excellent background in the Center for Chronic Disease and Prevention and Health Promotion from CDC. The CDC has been a very good friend to the women of America.

MARKS: Thank you, Senator.

MIKULSKI: And I am going to ask you to summarize as well, Doctor, and I ask unanimous consent that your full statement be in the record.

MARKS: Thank you very much. I'm pleased to be here, and I do want to thank you and other members of the committee for their long history of support for CDC's work to improve the health of women. I will summarize my remarks.

First, it is well established that the chronic diseases cause most of the deaths among women in this country. So this hearing really could not come at a more opportune time.

Among the CDC programs that deal mostly with the health of women, probably foremost in that is the Breast and Cervical Cancer Early Detection Program, which has now supported over three million screening exams for women with no health insurance, and it detected over 10,000 cancers. We have seen large increases in the screening rates for poor and near-poor women and have begun to see, as you've heard, the mortality from breast cancer decline, as treatment for cancer detected early has become increasingly effective. We hope to see the numbers of deaths, now about 50,000 a year, decline over time.

Heart disease and stroke are often thought of as disease that are more common in men, and, actually, they kill more women than men, nearly 500,000 a year. This led us to develop the Wise Woman Demonstration Program.

The Breast and Cervical Cancer Program -- they identify women who really have no connection to health care in selected states. The Wise Woman Program works with those women to determine if they have high blood pressure, high cholesterol, other risk factors for heart disease and to see that they get screening...

CHAIRWOMEN: Diabetes is in that as well, isn't it?

MARKS: Increasingly, diabetes, and in some states, osteoporosis as well, so that they can get treatment, if necessary, and screening and lifestyle intervention. We have been excited by how the states have responded to this. We know that there are still challenges with it, but it's an important program because it does help women who have no other source of health insurance to get treatment for the other conditions, not just the screening for breast and cervical cancer.

There are unique health risks that women are subject to in pregnancy and delivery, and they have shown little or no progress in the last two decades in death and serious complications. We sponsored a summit on Faith Motherhood last year to bring together researchers, clinicians, and policy makers to raise the visibility and concern about this lack of progress.

The concern has increased because there are large disparities between majority and minority populations. African-American women are three to four times as likely to die as white women during pregnancy. And we've begun a series of research projects in collaboration with state health departments to better understand the causes, the severe complications, and to begin to provide them support for getting local data and looking at emerging issues like postpartum depression.

Dr. Slater has already commented on the twin epidemics of obesity and diabetes. They are more common in women than they've been in the past. They are increasing rapidly, and they're increasing even more rapidly among minority women.

We have, just this past year, with partners like the American Diabetes Association, the state and territorial health offices and others, launched a new initiative for diabetes and women's health to focus attention on the large and unique impact diabetes has in women. In some of the state programs, New York being among those, they have developed networks in rural areas to reduce amputations, to improve the quality of care for people with diabetes. And in the New York project that's based out of Syracuse, they have seen a reduction of about a quarter to a third in amputations and hospitalizations among people with diabetes.

I can only mention a few of the areas where CDC is working with states and communities to develop these responses. And make no mistake, it is important that we deal with the conditions of chronic illnesses that are either unique to women, more common in women, or are major causes of death and disability and suffering among women in the U.S.

Effective measures exist today to prevent much of the chronic disease burden and curtail the consequences. Another generation of women should not suffer unnecessarily or die when there is so much that we already know that we're not getting out. And we at CDC and others in the department are working to minimize this delay.

Thank you for the opportunity to testify, and I'll be happy to answer questions. I'm sure Dr. Slater will as well.

MIKULSKI: Thank you for that excellent testimony.

Senator Clinton, do you want to go first?

CLINTON: Well, I want to thank both of you, and I think that your testimony is very helpful in raising the visibility of some of the challenges that we confront. I believe that adult onset, Type II diabetes has not been given the attention that it needs, and I was struck by Dr. Slater's statement that it's the fifth leading cause of death among women. I can guarantee you that there aren't many of us who knew that before your testimony.

Dr. Slater, in your written testimony, you also talked about the role of violence in the lives of women. And that, too, is an area where we need to look at it as a health issue, not just as a law enforcement issue and a cultural concern.

Could you give us some information about what you're doing to address domestic violence and the health impact?

SLATER: Yes, it's a pleasure, Senator. Again, because of the limited time, I concluded the presentation.

I believe you're familiar with the Healthy People objectives for the year 2000 and again the year 2010, which is a very important way of tracking our progress in terms of interventions in public health. Twenty-six of the Healthy People 2010 objectives relate in some way, shape, or form to domestic violence.

This administration is very, very committed to this very important problem that you're aware of. It's a problem that, again, appears to disproportionately affect women. The statistics -- you're well aware that one-third of women are murdered by individuals with whom they are quite familiar. Roughly a million women report being stalked per year. So there is really great difficulty.

Health and Human Services has a Violence Against Women Steering Committee, as you know. That committee is chaired within my office and reports to the National Advisory Council on Violence Against Women, which is presidentially mandated and co-chaired by the attorney general and Secretary Thompson.

HRSA is responsible for a large number of domestic violence training programs. They have an 800 number, or perhaps it's an 888 number, at HRSA, and one can log into information regarding their many programs, which primarily are focused on training the health care professionals who need to be more sophisticated in recognizing the signs of domestic violence. I think this is in some ways a reiteration of the issues of childhood abuse, and it was largely learned that training the health care community, the interface, to recognize the signs and symptoms is how we, hopefully, will be able to make the first set of inroads.

Another topic that is sad to recognize for me, but one that we are also taking interest in is the apparent increase in elder abuse. It's subtle. It's often missed. It's often unrecognized. But it's something, again, that unfortunately is rearing its ugly head. It needs to be a concern of all of ours, as we develop programs to deal with that.

There's an intimate partner fact sheet, I believe, that CDC -- Dr. Marks, my colleague, has on his web site, which, again, is a very useful resource for the statistics. And, again, we share your concern about that issue.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER SMITH (R-NJ) HOLDS HEARING ON ANTI-SEMITIC VIOLENCE IN EUROPE, 5/22/2002

CLINTON: Well, thank you very much.

I apologize for not being able to get here earlier. And I look forward to reading the transcripts of each of your testimonies. And I commend the commission all of its members, from both the House and the Senate, for holding this hearing.

It's unfortunately quite a timely topic. And over the last several months as I'm sure you have detailed, there has been an alarming increase in anti-Semitic violence throughout Europe.

And it is something for which all of us have to not only be vigilant but prepared to take action. And I am hoping that today, as the president heads toward Europe, that will provide an opportunity for him to raise this alarming issue with the European leaders and the European publics that he will have a chance to address.

At the NATO Russia summit in Italy and during visits to France, Germany and Russia, where some of the worst outbreaks of anti-Semitic violence have occurred, the president has the opportunity to give voice to American concerns over this recent increase in anti-Semitism.

I know that we all share a deep concern about the reports we've been receiving from throughout Europe. I've personally spoken with a number of people who have raised those concerns directly with European leaders. And I would urge the president to call on European leaders to acknowledge publicly and without reservation the anti-Semitic character of these attacks as violations of human rights, and further to call upon these nations and governments to utilize the full powers of their law enforcement tools to investigate the crimes and punish the perpetrators.

We know that Europe has, in the last decade or so, unequivocally condemned anti-Semitism and pledged to take effective measures against it and to protect people from anti-Semitic violence in the OSCE Copenhagen concluding document. So I hope that this is followed up by action.

And because of these recent disturbing attacks, I recently introduced a resolution with Senator Gordon Smith, another member of the Helsinki Commission, as well as with Senators Schumer and Hatch, that expresses the sense of the Senate regarding anti-Semitism and religious tolerance in Europe, calling on European governments to use their full power of law enforcement to investigate and punish anti-Semitic violence.

And I hope that we will not only pass this resolution in the Senate and that the president will very directly raise this important matter in Europe, but that we will begin to hear more than a deafening silence from European leaders. And that is a very important role for the Helsinki

Commission to be playing in this, because clearly there can't be anymore terrible potential for the violation of human rights in Europe or elsewhere than the resurgence of anti-Semitic violence, as we have seen.

So, Mr. Chairman, I submit my entire statement for the record.

SMITH: Without objection, Senator, your full statement will be made a part of the record. Thank you.

We now go to some questions on the part of the panelists. And I'd like to ask you, Dr. Samuels, you mentioned a number of things -- very extensive statement. A travel advisory -- extreme caution has been sent out to Jews visiting France. Has the United States State Department, to the best of your knowledge, in any way picked up on this heightened threat to Jews, in this case American Jews, who might travel to France? Have they issued any similar advisory, as far as you know?

SAMUELS: As far as I know, no. I don't think so. I think that what we did was, in a way to take a line of least resistance where some organizations were -- and many individuals calling us regarding the imposition of the boycott -- we felt that a boycott would be ineffective, also the Jewish people have been the victim of boycotts for so long. Therefore, travel advisory was the minimum that we could do.

This is not only a warning to Jewish visitors to France and Belgium, but also to Americans. And I think that it would be correct on the part of this committee, perhaps, to raise with the State Department the possibility that it should be broadened.

I would like to draw from that, the other proposal that you mentioned, Congressman, and that is, the heightened role for the OSCE at the Berlin meeting. I think that this is important because of the knock-on effect on East European countries, which are not members of the EU, but are candidates in the enlargement process. Through the OSCE there is a very important means to influence those countries and thereby have a feedback effect also on the West European members of the OSCE.

So I would endorse that in particular. And I think that not only in Berlin, but the fact that the presidency of the EU moves to Copenhagen, I think there should be some emphasis there, too.

SMITH: I appreciate that.

We plan on drafting language. And I would hope to offer it as an amendment or perhaps even a free-standing resolution in Berlin. And I know that we'll have the full support of our delegation. It'll require other delegations to co-sponsor to make it an order, and I think we can get that as well. But it certainly will be a timely intervention on the part of our delegation to very aggressively assert our concern about this alarming, rising tide of anti-Semitism in Europe.

CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, would you yield?

SMITH: Yes. I'd be happy to yield.

CARDIN: I think that we should really work that as a free-standing resolution. I think the point that Mr. Jacobson made that this is not business as usual is important for us to underscore in Berlin. So I would just encourage our staff now to explore other delegations that may want to join us as a free-standing resolution.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

VOINOVICH: Mr. Chairman, I'd like to comment also that we ought to get hold of the executive director of the OSCE and share with him our real concern about this growing anti-Semitism and ask if possibly we could have a special session of the OSCE that deals with this issue.

I mean, if we go with just a resolution, it may just be one of several things. I think that we ought to say it should be the most prominent thing that we discuss at this meeting in Berlin. And I'd be glad to join with you and others with a letter to him, urging him to come up with some ideas on how we could accomplish that.

SMITH: I appreciate the gentleman's -- again, the main reason why we wanted to have this hearing, one, was to get expert voices who know this issue intimately and have lived and fought for human rights so valiantly to come forward with your best recommendations, your best insight as to the state of affairs as of right now, and also where you think we're going in the future.

LEVIN: Mr. Chairman, can I just add a recommendation...

SMITH: Sure.

LEVIN: ... based upon our experience over the last 20 years in different OSCE meetings? And that would be to work with the NGO community in advance of the Berlin meeting and to find out which NGOs will be represented there and to enlist their support in meeting with the various delegations. It's something we did very successfully when confronting the Soviet Union on issues related to the release of refuseniks and anti-Semitism.

JACOBSON: I just want to add my support. I think it's terribly important that a separate session be devoted to this so it's not just thrown into -- because I think that will really highlight that it's not business as usual. If it's thrown into other discussions, then it'll just get lost. And I think the importance of it is that some kind of session be separate on the subject of anti-Semitism.

VOINOVICH: I think that idea of NGOs is a good one also. When we were in St. Petersburg, we -- you recall, Mr. Chairman, we met with the NGOs there. And it's one way of getting some real information what's really going on.

CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, if you may yield just one more second, if I might just make a very brief point, another tool we have available are our bilateral meetings. We do meet with others delegations during our visits on the Parliamentary Assembly. And I would just suggest it may be appropriate for us to meet with the French delegation.

SMITH: As we have. And I think it's a very good recommendation because the drift, obviously, is very alarming. The numbers cited by Dr. Samuels were devastating.

Let me just say this so it's clearly on the record. The Berlin meeting's focus is terrorism. Supplemental at this point would get the issue prominent front and center. Back in St. Petersburg when we had that meeting, I actually offered a supplemental on trafficking in women. And we were met with disbelief and people saying, "What are you talking about? That sounds like, you know, hyperbole and exaggeration." And obviously, it was not. But that began a dialogue with those delegations.

I think what we ought to be doing, and taking up Mr. Voinovich's recommendation, is to be looking for perhaps a special session of our Parliamentary Assembly, whether it be a several-day meeting or a weekend, to focus on this terrible and alarming trend of anti-Semitism. And do it there -- you know, really assert it very aggressively in Berlin and say, "But this isn't the end of it." Because it's too late, really, to change the main focus of this upcoming meeting.

CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, if you would just yield on that point, I would just suggest that I think the rise of anti-Semitism is directly related to terrorism. And I think we're going to find that we'll have an opportunity during this meeting to underscore our alarm in the context of international terrorism as to what's happening with the rise of anti-Semitism.

I think Senator Voinovich's point about a separate opportunity is important also. But I think we need to do both. We need to take advantage of the Berlin meeting as well as stress the need for a separate...

SMITH: Frankly, I think we're saying the exact same thing. And again, that's why this hearing is being held today, to launch that renewed effort.

We've had hearings before -- a matter fact, we called it the "Rising Tide of Anti-Semitism", particularly as it related to the break up of the Soviet Union. And what we saw was an alarming trend there.

But now we're seeing it in Western Europe with a virulence that portends very, very terrible things, not to mention the victims that are being created now.

Yes, Dr. Samuels?

SAMUELS: It may be useful as a point of information for Congressman Cardin, the Weisenthal Center wrote, prior to the presidential elections in Paris, to every member of the senate and the national assembly asking them their positions on the anti-Semitism wave in France and what they might be able to do in their respective parliamentary committees. We have since then, and certainly just before the first round of the parliamentary elections in a couple of weeks, received over 50 responses.

Now, many of those parliamentarians who expressed an interest in responding to us are members of the parliamentary assembly who will be going to the Berlin meeting. I would be happy to share those names with you so that you could contact them directly.

SMITH: That would be very, very helpful, Doctor.

VOINOVICH: Mr. Chairman?

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman? Go ahead.

VOINOVICH: I'm going to have to leave in about five minutes. But I am going to go to Bulgaria to the NATO meeting. And I have the information that was prepared about the various countries.

But I think, Mr. Levin, you prepared that.

I would -- if you have any really outrageous situation in one of those countries, or several, I'd like you to bring them to my attention, get it to my office, because I will be there talking to -- and they all want to come in. And just as we did when we were in Rumania, we talked to them. The problem there was church property and a lot of other things. It seems to me that it would be a wonderful opportunity for me to must confront them with it and say, "Hey, you're interested in coming into NATO and you know, what are you going to do between now and when it's considered in Prague to remedy the situation that has arisen in your country?"

So I really would welcome you or anyone else to provide that with me, because this is going to be a great opportunity to bring it up to them.

(UNKNOWN): Senator, we can certainly do that.

BAKER: This is with specific reference to Bulgaria...

VOINOVICH: No, it would be...

BAKER: ... or to all of the NATO...

VOINOVICH: We've got -- I mean, we've got the Balts. And I notice there's some stuff in Lithuania where something's happening there in one of the examples here. But it's the three Balts, it's Slovakia, Slovenia, it's Bulgaria, it's Rumania. I mean, those are the ones really that...

BAKER: Yes in this document, we had detailed the situation in each of those countries.

VOINOVICH: You're the one that prepared this thing.

BAKER: Yes. And I'm happy to be in touch with your office to give your staff any updates since the end of March when this was prepared.

VOINOVICH: I'll have Joanie (ph) contact you today because we're going to be leaving on Friday, so...

BAKER: Then I'll be happy to do it this afternoon then, sure.

VOINOVICH: OK, thank you.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, too, I wanted to follow up on the NGO mention, because it would be very helpful to get ahead of time the names of NGOs that might be receptive. Because we should lay the groundwork for that. Because the NGOs play a major role, not only within the Helsinki Commission's ongoing processes, but within the media of various of these countries. And we need to know who might speak up and be, you know, very supportive of our concerns.

So if you could help us with that too, that would be...

(UNKNOWN): Absolutely.

SMITH: Let me just ask a couple of additional questions and then go to my colleagues for any questions they might have.

The European integration and the, obviously, the one Europe, does that raise serious concerns about this becoming more manifest, this whole anti-Semitism, rather than pockmarked throughout the continent? Or does it offer an opportunity perhaps of having a stronger, more centralized reaction to try to end it, that is to say, anti-Semitism?

BAKER: Can I speak to that, Congressman?

I think it offers clear possibilities, but it poses some serious problems as well. As I mentioned, I think one of the elements that various of the nationalist populist forces in Europe seem to have in common is playing on public disillusionment and trouble with regard to European integration and enlargement.

Frankly, minorities in Europe, Jews being one of them, feel I think a more easy opportunity to be patriotic Europeans, to fit under an umbrella in which you have a diverse group of nations, minorities, ethnic and religious communities. The extent to which that works and that umbrella is increased and strengthened, I think it makes them all feel more secure. So if enlargement and integration happens smoothly, it will be positive.

But we how even slight tremors of concern in the common economic, common currency and so on in Europe has created backlash in various member states that has bolstered these nationalist forces, then that's a source of trouble. So the extent to which you are in discussion with your European counterparts and can really emphasize the seriousness here, and as Senator Clinton said, the silence that we seem to hear, the fact that many people in Europe, European leaders simply do not take this as a serious problem, will really be critical.

JACOBSON: I would just add that it seems to me that you have the situation where Europe is moving together, and yet there are two forces at work that really challenge the identity of individual Europeans. On the one hand, you have the question, "Am I still a Frenchman or Italian when there is a European Union? What does that mean?" And at the very same time, you have an issue of multi- culturalism and diversity.

Whenever we've gone over there with our programs, we went to Germany, for example, the early '90s after neo-Nazi skinhead attacks. And we said to the Germans, "You have a great democracy in Germany, but not much of a sense of a pluralistic democracy; what does it mean to be a German?"

So at this point when there are all kinds of immigrant groups coming into all these countries, you have the average European, kind of, feeling that they're a little bit under attack in terms of identity on two levels. One in terms of the European Union, and secondly, in terms of they're being told that to be a good Frenchman doesn't mean only that you have to be of French blood, that there have to be others integrated. Those are major challenges.

And I think what all of us are saying is that's where the leadership role really becomes critical. The leadership role and the education programs at the same time.

Because it's not going to be a smooth path. We see the reactions of both levels. But I think if there is a -- what happened in France in the second round of the election was that basically people began to take responsibility. And I think that's what all the role that we can play as well.

LEVIN: Mr. Chairman, we've seen this happening in the successor states of the Soviet Union already, particularly in Russia and Ukraine, where you have this push and pull where they want to be integrated into the larger continent but, at the same time, maintain their distinct identity.

As far as dealing with the issue of the right wing, people such as David Duke from the United States, but also European right-wing personalities have tried, in some cases successfully, to infiltrate into Russian society and spread their message, and that's -- not to repeat everything that's just been said, but that's where, as I said earlier, the bully pulpit becomes important; where leadership -- this is where leadership is needed and is necessary.

ARRIAGA: If I might just add as well, not only leadership in education -- I agree with you all on the panel -- but also implementation of local laws, including acknowledgement of hate-based crimes and actual prosecution of those crimes.

SMITH: If you could hold that thought just for a minute, Senator Clinton does have to leave.

CLINTON: I am so sorry. We have a vote. I just looked up there. I was so interested in what all of you were saying.

It would be extremely useful as well -- and this probably goes beyond the confines of the jurisdiction of this committee, Mr. Chairman -- but I am concerned that there are -- it's not just the leadership that's not saying anything. There are no voices. There are, you know, maybe a few here or there, but by and large, it is an indifference that is very frightening, because it provides, kind of, fertile ground for what we're seeing and worried about.

And perhaps you could also give us some suggestions about how we could reach out, even before Berlin, to various people, to see whether we could get more public reaction, more words of concern coming from elected officials, opinion leaders, et cetera -- academics, whomever. Because I worry that this is obviously rooted in both very ancient hatreds and biases, and some new phenomena of the modern world. And then there are items in the news that seem to fuel it, and kick it off.

So we need a multilayered strategy, if you will. But I would like to know whether there are people we could individually reach out to, to try to be more encouraging of their taking action now -- of saying something now.

Yes, Dr. Samuels?

SAMUELS: Yes, this is exactly the point I wish to raise, Senator Clinton. I think that integration is a problem from one point of view, as we've just heard, but it can also be part of the solution.

I was elected to the board of something called ENAR, European Network Against Racism. It is an umbrella for 660 anti-racist organizations. This is a board of 32 members, two from each of the 15 countries of the European Union and two from the pan-European organizations. In fact, I was elected by the Muslims of Europe, quite ironically, three years ago, and re-elected last August, because we shared common problems: of the extreme right, of fascism in football, of hate on the Internet, skinheads, et cetera.

Today, those same people, perhaps more delicately, tell us that we share another problem, and that is fundamentalist Islam, which is also extremely threatening to their situation. And I think that this gives us the possibility to reach out.

The Wiesenthal Center has attempted to propose some programs, some projects, of common ground. For example, we started, multilaterally with the Council of Europe, and also bilaterally with some European countries, to propose that political demonstrations that march by houses of worship, be they churches or mosques or synagogues or temples, be outlawed unless with the prior agreement of the administration of that house of worship. We have found that many NGOs are interested in this proposal, of all faiths. And I think that that's one example.

Rabbi Cooper (ph) today brought the latest CD-ROM of the Wiesenthal Center on digital hate, "Digital Hate 2002," which shows that hate is totally indivisible. It's not just against Jews, it's against Christians and women and Muslims, et cetera. It is also an introduction to terrorist sites, and not only hate sites.

And this also is an issue of common ground. And I think that using these types of instruments, we are able to rebuild some of the alliances with NGOs that was ravaged at the Durban meeting, in order to try to raise a consciousness that we're dealing on the same page on these issues.

SMITH: We have another vote, regrettably, on the House floor, and Mr. Cardin and I will have to leave. But I'd like to just ask, and then ask him perhaps to ask a few additional questions as well. The recommendation to convene a real conference on anti-Semitism, I think, is a good one. Not only should we pursue that track with the OSCE Parliamentary Assembly, which is obviously separate from the OSCE itself, although we talk to each other within the OSCE confines itself -- that's something, I think, we should recommend following up on your recommendations, Mr. Jacobson, to the president, to Colin Powell, to Condoleezza Rice and the rest of the foreign policy team as something they need to use as an action item, especially in light of the hate fest that occurred in Durban.

SMITH: You know, as you pointed out, the violence of silence of traditional human rights groups not being involved the way we traditionally know they should have been and could have been and have been. And so, I think your point is very well taken, especially given that Europe should lead on this, as we should lead on this, especially given the Holocaust remembrance, that never again.

So I do have one additional question, you might want to comment on that very quickly. UNESCO; there was a vote in the House of Representatives recently for the United States to rejoin UNESCO. I, frankly, voted against it. I think the U.N. has its good organizations, like UNHCR and UNICEF and the Security Council has played a key role on some very important things in the past, and there are other organizations, as well that do a good job. But UNESCO traditionally has not, at least in my view. Your view, whether or not we should join it?

And then, Ben, you might want to throw out some questions right now, just so they can...

CARDIN: I want to hear the answer on UNESCO, and I want to give you as much time as you need.

I just really wanted to thank the panel. I thought this was extremely helpful.

And, Dr. Samuels, we are going to call upon you to get information to help us. And your organization has been extremely reliable in opening up that black box. So we want to get as much information as possible.

And I just want to compliment all five of you on specific recommendations. I think the codification of hate crimes is something we need to proceed on. I believe education is key. We've seen in some of these countries, some of these states, that they've actually been counterproductive in their educational programs. I think having a positive aspect to the education support of the states would be helpful here. And I think some of the other recommendations about the government officials being more open and visible in their consistent efforts against anti-Semitism is important.

But I want to give you as much time as possible to answer the UNESCO question.

SAMUELS: I'd like to congratulate Congressman Smith on his vote. I think that the United States -- and I can document this -- has much more influence from outside UNESCO than from within. And although the previous director general did make certain steps and gestures in order to try to show that UNESCO had changed, I think the present administration shows that it has not in any way.

The organization has been hijacked. In fact, one of the best committees of UNESCO, which is the World Heritage Committee, only last week came out with a biased attack on Israel on the question of Israel being a criminal, practicing crimes against cultural heritage, which is quite out of place. And I only hope that when the World Heritage Committee meets in Zurich, it will reverse that. Perhaps it will, due to pressure from the United States from without.

SMITH: Thank you.

Any final comments before we conclude?

Again, I think Mr. Cardin summarized it very well. Your recommendations will not only be read, they will be studied, analyzed and acted upon. This is, I think, a crucial crossroads point and we need to lead, and the president needs to lead. And President Bush certainly has a tremendous amount of following and credibility, even in Europe, and even though they like not to acknowledge that.

So I would hope that, going forward, you will continue to provide us with the best possible insights so we can be more effective on behalf of those who might otherwise.

Thank you so much for being here.

U.S. SENATOR JAMES JEFFORDS (I-VT) HOLDS HEARING ON SECURITY AT NUCLEAR FACILITIES, 6/5/2002

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thank you and Senator Smith for holding this important hearing. Certainly, I agree with the statements of both Senators Smith and Inhofe that as we try to educate ourselves and more importantly, educate the public, we do so with full awareness of the sensitivity of some of this information.

I am also very pleased that Congressman Markey is here. I hope to have a chance to hear from him in just a few minutes. I would also like to thank Dr. Irwin Redlener, the president of the Children's Hospital at Montefiore in the Bronx and president of the Children's Health Fund for being with us today.

Both Dr. Redlener and I live in Westchester County. It's one of the most beautiful places in the country and it is also a place where we have nuclear power plants. So, unlike some on the committee, I live about 15 to 20 minutes from one of our 104 nuclear power plants.

This is the principle subject that the people I live near in my town and in neighboring communities talk to me about every time, whether I'm going to the store, stopping to get a cup of coffee or just taking a walk in the neighborhood.

And I think it is understandable, because the unthinkable did happen on September 11 and therefore, it is incumbent upon us as unfortunate an exercise as it may be, to think like our adversaries -- to imagine the unimaginable and to work together with the appropriate officials in our government to be as sure as one can be in such human endeavors that we have thought every unthinkable thought, we have taken every possible preventive measure, because there is no guarantee in life of anything, but unless we've done all that we believe we should do to protect ourselves, then I think we are going to be found not to have fulfilled our responsibility.

Certainly in my specific situation we have more people, about 20 million, in the Catchman (ph) area for Indian Point. It is in the most populated area of any nuclear power plant of our country. We have other nuclear power plants in much less populated areas. I visited the nuclear power plants at Indian Point and at Oswego.

Certainly, Oswego, which is in a much less populated area doesn't pose the high level of public concern or, frankly, as inviting a target as Indian Point does. Nowhere in our country do we have the same concentration of population and clearly, those who sought to inflict the most public, high visibility damage on our nation chose our most populated city.

It's a terrible thing to contemplate, but I think we have to. I don't see any alternative. And instead of being paralyzed by fear or being divided on different points of view or ideologies, we all have to work together. I think that what this committee is attempting to do.

We have to close whatever loopholes exist legislatively or regulatorily. We have to strengthen any weak links that we find and we have to be unafraid to ask the hard questions. This is not pointing fingers or placing blame on anyone. We didn't have to think like this before September 11. Now, we have to and therefore it is imperative that we know what steps have been taken, are being taken to protect our nuclear power plants.

You know, according to news reports -- not in a classified briefing, but on the front pages of newspapers around America, just last month, the NRC again put the nation's nuclear power plants on a heightened state of alert because of information gained by our intelligence community.

Well, you can imagine what that does to mothers and fathers in Westchester County and throughout America who have particular concerns because of their proximity to our nuclear power plants.

Now, since 9/11, the federal government, state and local government and nuclear power plant operators and owners have taken action -- and I applaud those actions -- to improve security.

But we have the responsibility to ask, "Has enough been done"? This is what we are going to try to find out in part today. The NRC has previously told this committee that it has the statutory tools necessary to ensure that any security deficiencies are corrected in a timely fashion. Yet, at the same time, I know that the NRC is strongly supporting S. 1586, which I think has a lot of very good provisions in it.

As we sit here today, we know that the NRC still has not yet revised its rules regarding what kinds of threats nuclear plants must protect themselves against. And the NRC has not completed vulnerability assessments on individual plants. Moreover, it is my understanding that the NRC still has not determined, or at least has not told us either in a classified briefing or in public, what the real threats posed by modern, fully loaded airlines cause to a reactor containment vessel.

Now, that decision, of course, could drive a series of other decisions about how to best safeguard these plants, such as whether and when to impose no fly zones, whether or when to have Naval or Coast Guard support.

Now, we know that the NRC is working on these issues and I do appreciate everything that the commission has been doing. But I think it is important that we hear from other well informed voices as we will at this hearing, in public, people who have experience in the nuclear industry, who have expertise with nuclear energy so that we can make a judgment about whether or not those tools in that tool box for security at our nuclear power plants are sufficient.

That's why I did join with Senators Reid, Jeffords and Lieberman in introducing legislation to start a dialogue, to begin a discussion. I think that part of what we should be working on in this committee is how we determine what of the many additional steps that could be taken would appropriately be taken by national legislation.

We need to guarantee seamless security and we need to do it as quickly as possible. And any legislation should ensure that new higher standards are met through revisions to the design basis threat.

We have to be more realistic about this. You can't give notice ahead of time to the guards of these plants so they can put on their flak jackets, get their weapons out of the lockers in which they are kept, to look as though they are ready to take on whatever possible attack may occur.

This has to be a much more well thought out and constant assessment of the security at each and every one of our facilities. Exercises have to be conducted regularly and I believe, as someone who certainly lives within a rather immediate proximity to a plant, that we've got to have more realistic evacuation plans.

CLINTON: If you come up to Indian Point, which is in a beautiful part of Westchester County, you'll be on two lane roads for most of that trip. You're living in a highly populated area. The idea that you could evacuate people -- the idea that people are supposed to leave the evacuation would even be able to get where they are needed strikes most of us as quite implausible.

Now, we are stockpiling potassium iodide in New York. The bill that I worked on with Senator Reid and others requires that stockpiling be required and that the pills be released to the public on a regular basis.

Now, finally, I also think, since the NRC does have jurisdiction, that in addition to exploring the security of power plants, we have to raise the issue of so-called "dirty bombs". We have to know more and protect more against the use of radiological dispersal devices. That has to be on the agenda as well as our concern about nuclear power plants since the sources of such material are obviously accessible, easily so, in many parts of every community in our country.

So, Mr. Chairman, I thank you for holding this hearing and I look forward to working with you and all of our colleagues to come up with answers to some of these questions.

JEFFORDS: Thank you.

Senator Voinovich?

VOINOVICH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I agree that the topic of today's hearing is very important, so important that I believe our time could be best spent in a closed hearing in which the members of our committee can discuss the security issues openly with the witnesses without fear of revealing information that could put those who work in the facilities and the public at risk. I agree with the sentiments expressed by Senator Smith and Senator Inhofe.

Considering the importance of this topic, we need to hear all relevant information with regard to security, including future needs, if we're to pass legislation that will enhance the security of our nuclear energy infrastructure.

I believe it is impossible to get all of the information we need to determine if legislation is needed through public hearings. Last August I visited Davis Besse nuclear facility in Oak Harbor, Ohio for the purpose of reviewing the operation of the plant.

I was extremely impressed with the security measures in place to gain entrance and access to that facility. Just this last April, I had the opportunity to spend a half day at the Perry nuclear power plant in Perry, Ohio, which, by the way, is a 25 minute drive from my home, to specifically review their security systems. I wanted to see first hand just what was happening at that facility.

In fact, the entire visit was dedicated to security. I received a classified security briefing at the facility, which I highly recommend to all of my colleagues. In addition, I participated in personnel and vehicle searches and I reviewed the external security systems, including meeting with the Coast Guard, which patrols Lake Erie off the coast of the Perry facility.

My tour of the security operations confirmed for me that every security measure is being taken to protect our energy supply from terrorist attack and the members of the surrounding community and they should be very comfortable with the level of security that protects them and the facility.

If I were a terrorist, the last place I would try to take over in an attack would be a nuclear power plant. I know the security reviews are currently being conducted at nuclear facilities across the country, but I hope they are all as secure as our Ohio facilities.

I think it is important that we don't throw the baby out with the bath water, trying to change things legislatively. In my opinion, the private sector is getting the job done and we do not have to federalize security understanding that any system can be improved and that's the responsibility of the nuclear regulatory commission, and there may be other things that are being suggested by members of this committee that will enhance those security operations in our facilities because of things that have happened -- because of 9/11.

Recently, I visited the EU headquarters at The Hague and Brussels. I was told and warned the security there was the best in the world. I tell you, I was impressed with the security required to gain entrance to that facility. But it didn't compare -- it didn't compare with the security at Perry and Davis nuclear.

Because this is an open hearing and though I think it would be helpful, I can't go into the details about how they determined who gets in, where they go and how they can get access. It's incredible.

I also visited the Lima Tank Plant in Ohio where they make the M1A1 Abrams tank. Now, that's another place that the federal government is securing. I met with the people from the Defense Department that are involved in security. I reviewed what they are doing there. I said to them, "If you really want to secure this place, get in a car and go up to Perry nuclear and you'll find out how to really secure a facility". That's the way I felt about that compared to what I saw at this federal facility that is something that we should be very concerned about.

Before we move forward with any new requirements, I think it is imperative that members of this committee spend time carefully reviewing the existing security controls at our nation's nuclear facilities. I believe the preparation for each and every committee member should be to include some closed hearings, or at least one, and classified briefings as well as site visits to the facilities in order to see the security measures in practice. Get out there and get into these places and see what they are doing.

I look forward to working with my colleagues on this important issue and to the testimony from today's witnesses. Mr. Chairman, I really hope that the legislation that's been introduced and this hearing is really aimed at determining the security at our facilities and not an effort by those who are opposed to nuclear power to discredit nuclear power's contribution to our nation's energy needs.

Nuclear power plays a vital role in maintaining our energy independence in providing a clean energy source.

I look forward to the witnesses' testimony. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: Thank you, Senator.

Senator Boxer?

BOXER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I first want to address the point that this is not a hearing about the future of nuclear power. Of course it isn't. That decision is made by the marketplace and the people who live near the plants and there hasn't been a new plant in 20 years and maybe there will be a change on that.

People will decide that in a democracy like ours. That's good. For myself, I have no bias except to say when the private insurers are ready to insure these plants, that will give me much more confidence. Right now, it is the taxpayers that have to pick up the tab.

So, I think those are important points. I also want to address the issue of closed hearings versus open hearings. I just must say that the comments that have been reiterated by a few of my friends on the other side, I find to be disrespectful of our chairman. That's my own personal view.

And that saddens me, because this is a man who really understands what belongs in a closed hearing. He had one and all my colleagues who said they want one never went. And he knows what belongs in an open hearing. I would remind everyone that there were lots of closed briefings before 9/11 and we had a disaster.

So, in and of itself, what is important is, what we discuss. And I want to send a signal to the would be terrorists in this country in cells around this country and wherever they are that we are doing everything we can to stop them. I think Senator Voinovich is right. There are some plants that are moving way ahead on this.

But there may be some problems and the reason I think an open hearing, Mr. Chairman, is so important, I commend you for your leadership and I commend Congressman Markey for his on the House side, is that we need to speak with one voice to those that would harm our people and say, "We're on to you. We're on to you because the president of the United States, as you said, Mr. Chairman, in the State of the Union address told us that nuclear power plants were a target". This isn't some secret. The president announced it.

We are here today with some of our colleagues who have drawn up some good legislation here to say, you know, take it somewhere else. Take it somewhere else.

I would say for me in California, where we have four power plants, that this is a very important issue. Now, the NRC views this as such a serious problem, perhaps more serious than my colleagues, some of my colleagues, that they've offered free potassium iodine pills. I have urged that those be distributed to the people in my state. I have urged that the National Guard be deployed to nuclear power plants just to make sure that it is safe.

So, Mr. Chairman, I'd ask that the rest of my statement be placed in the record. I want to commend you and I feel that your statement -- I read it -- is so balanced and so fair. You praised the NRC for steps they have taken.

But frankly, I have been around here a long time, both on the House and the Senate side. And I know it is hard to bring action to a bureaucracy. It's just the way it is. It's even hard to bring it to a big business and so, when we put pressure on, that's a good thing. I think this hearing is a good thing and I thank you very much.

JEFFORDS: Thank you.

Senator Warner?

WARNER: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief.

I just call upon my own experience of having served on the Armed Services Committee for 24 years (inaudible) to be chairman. We handled matters such as this on a regular basis with open and closed hearings -- most often at open hearings followed immediately thereafter with a closed. I would hope such procedures would be viewed again by the chair and ranking member of this committee as an appropriate way for us to proceed.

I'll not further discuss this matter, because I am anxious to hear from our witnesses.

JEFFORDS: Well, thank you very much, Senator, and I would just alert you that arrangements have been made and the minority staff is aware that we intend to have members to be able to meet in a confidential situation to discuss the matter.

WARNER: But would you not have that in a formal hearing status. Is there some reason not to do it?

JEFFORDS: Well, it's a matter of convenience of the members, trying to make sure they can be there. As we said, last time we had one, no one showed up except me and Senator Inhofe. Whatever the minority wants to work out, we will make the accommodation. We will just work together and whatever Senator Smith...

WARNER: We both have gained a different perspective of the seriousness of the problem, as our colleague from California has pointed out in the period between that briefing and today.

JEFFORDS: My only goal is to make sure every member has every opportunity to place themselves in a position where they can do their job.

SMITH: Mr. Chairman, would you indulge me for 30 seconds in response to Senator Boxer.

I made a comment about my feelings towards you. I just want to say that I think Senator Boxer knows me well enough to know that I don't deal in personal attacks at other members. This is a disagreement, that the chairman has every right to make the decision he made. I disagree with it and others have. It is not a personal attack and I regret that you made that charge here, but I will rebut it.

Let me also say that there has never been a classified hearing -- there is a difference between a hearing and a briefing -- there has never been a classified hearing and there was a briefing in October. A lot has happened since October. And so, let's just make sure that we are dealing with the facts, here.

JEFFORDS: Sir, we've never had a request from you for a hearing, so I will take that as a request.

SMITH: We requested a classified hearing today.

JEFFORDS: Oh. Today. Fine. I appreciate hearing that and I can assure you that the arrangements will be made.

Congressman Markey, I am pleased to have you here. I know that you have been holding hearings in some closed hearings, as would seem to be and I commend you for that. You have been a leader in this area and I appreciate having you here. If you have an opening statement, please present it.

MARKEY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much.

I appreciate the opportunity to be able to testify before you. I think that at this stage we've already invoked the old Mo Udall axiom that "everything has been said but not everyone has said it". So, I begin with that as the premise to my testimony.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and you, Senator Smith, for the invitation to testify here today. I have introduced on the House side the same legislation that Senator Reid and yourself and Senator Clinton and Senator Lieberman, Senator Boxer, Senator Corzine, have introduced on this side dealing with security at our domestic civilian nuclear power plants.

Senator Boxer just dealt with the question of whether or not a discussion of this subject in some way or another deals with the future of nuclear power. For the record, there has not been a new nuclear power plant ordered successfully in the United States since 1974 -- 28 years ago.

The reason that that is the case, as Senator Boxer pointed out, is that Adam Smith (ph), in his posthumous wisdom, has decided that nuclear power plant cannot gain investment from Wall Street Republican investment bankers. Instead, what they have decided is to put 95 percent of their money into natural gas generated -- electrical generating facilities. That is not a discussion that has anything to do with the question of what is the level of security around the 104 existing operating nuclear power plants.

MARKEY: Similarly, you have the question of the decommission plants, that is, those plants that have already retired and what kind of security should be around those plants pretty much in perpetuity.

So, these are not questions that we seek to put out in the public in the way that Al-Qaeda could gain new information, because neither the chairman of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission nor any of the witnesses are going to betray any classified information, but in the same way that the CIA and the FBI and their procedures before September 11 must be examined -- the public demands that -- so, too, must the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and its procedures be examined so that the public knows the changes are going to be put in place.

I think they understand and want some of that information to be classified, but nonetheless, the discussions have to be conducted in a way that ensures that security is enhanced.

Going back to 1991, I began writing to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission about the potential of truck bomb attacks at civilian nuclear power plants. At the time, I was told not to be concerned about the issue. Only after Oklahoma City did the commission begin the process of upgrading. However, even that upgrade does not deal with the level of threat, which is obvious in the aftermath of September 11.

So, let me go down, if I could, a number of the issues, which I think we have to deal with. The reason -- and Senator Clinton focused upon this -- the reason that we have to do so is that we've learned from the caves of Afghanistan, on the computers which have been confiscated, in addition to the interviews which have been conducted with captured Al-Qaeda members, that nuclear power plants, civilian nuclear power plants are at the very top of the list of targets that Al-Qaeda would attack if they could successfully do so.

That's why we're here. These are the statements of Al-Qaeda. So, the 280 million Americans who see these headlines have a right to know that changes have been made.

So, what are the issues? Well, we began with something called the "design basis threat" -- that is, what is the level of protection, which is built into the design of a nuclear power plant in terms of its security.

Now, the bill which has been introduced by Senate and House members calls for the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to begin a new rule making -- a brand new rule making, to reexamine the design basis threat -- that is, what kinds of threats could be posed against a nuclear power plant. Up until September 11, power plants were only protected against several terrorists who would arrive in an SUV, who would be relatively lightly armed and who would be non-suicidal.

Now, that's all public. Since September 11, it's quite clear that they could arrive in numbers of 19 or more, be coordinated in their attack, have advanced degrees from European or American universities, be suicidal, arrive with a tractor trailer and have more insider help than perhaps we had thought previous to September 11.

So, what the bill says is, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission should go into a new rulemaking, a formal rule making, to deal with all of those issues. Nine months after September 11, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission still has not gone into that formal rulemaking.

Now, we believe that the very fact that on a formal basis, a federal agency dealing with the security of our country is forced to reexamine all of these questions is a good thing and something, which the American public wants. The Nuclear Regulatory Commission has not done that. We do not believe that that is an unreasonable request of a federal agency dealing with such a sensitive question.

Secondly, the question dealing with the level of security that actually is at any one of these power plants -- what is the mechanism by which we test its efficiency. Well, it's something called an "operational safeguards response evaluation", that is, these are mock tests, force on force tests which are given by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to determine whether or not any civilian power plant can withstand a test.

Now, before September 11, at that relatively low level of challenge that would come from a terrorist group -- now we realize historically, it's kind of an elementary school level security exam, they were flunking at nearly a 50 percent rate nationally -- nuclear power plants -- before September 11.

Now, we know that post-September 11 that nuclear power plants have to be protected against college level security exams. And so, what the bill does is call upon the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to upgrade, again, the testing, the force on force testing against these nuclear power plants, to conduct it not just every eight years against each individual plant, but every two years so that there is an ongoing evaluation of the security around these plants.

Thirdly, we call for federalization of the force around these plants, not an unreasonable thing, at airports across the country. The public, I think, feels a lot better that the federal government is now going to provide the security at facilities at which we know Al- Qaeda has targeted -- airports, as they have nuclear power plants.

Unfortunately, right now, at civilian nuclear power plants, some of the guards are paid less than janitors. They are not equally trained. They are not equally equipped. They don't get the same whistleblower protections that federal employees would and as a result, it's not unreasonable to assume that the level of security is not as high as it would be if we had full time federal employees who had that responsibility.

And so, the Nuclear Security Act, which was introduced, calls for a federalization of the guard forces at nuclear power plants. Let's deal with the issue of National Guard. What should be the role of National Guard at these facilities?

In some states, National Guard are deployed. In some states, National Guard are not deployed. In some states National Guard have weapons with bullets already in them. In some they don't. In some states they are authorized to shoot to kill, in other states they are not. Is it unreasonable for the American people to ask that we have a uniform policy across the country that everyone can understand is present at their nuclear power plant. I do not believe that that is an unreasonable request.

And with regard to the decommissioned reactors, that is, when a nuclear reactor has completed its life, the reactor still remains there, as does all of the spent fuel in the facilities that will be stored there until at some point, in the long distance future, there is a place, somewhere in America, that we could move all of that spent fuel.

But while we wait for that date to finally arrive, we need some security around it. So, what happens at the decommissioned plants? Well, amongst other things, sometimes they are stored in areas that do not have clearly the same security that domed reinforced facility does around the reactor as it operates.

The cask used to store the spent fuel are not tested to ensure that they can withstand long, hot fires such as that fed by a full tank of a commercial jet liner. There are fewer guards on site at decommissioned reactors and security isn't tested using force on force exercises. Let me say that again. Security is not tested using force on force exercises.

So, there you could create, as Senator Clinton pointed out, the dirty bomb using a large or a small plane attacking those facilities. It's a good question to ask. We know that on September 11, the jets that were scrambled to protect the World Trade Center were in eastern Massachusetts. Was there enough time given for them to arrive over that distance in order to shoot down what was at that point known to be a hijacked airliner.

So, in other words, a lot of people think the plane would just be hijacked at an airport that was only two or three minutes away from the nuclear power plant. What if the plane was hijacked 30 minutes away and now it is clear that there is enough time to shoot it down, to have planes be scrambled or to have anti-aircraft weapons on the ground.

Is it unreasonable to ask that there be some national policy, which is established, which has to be put in place on a coordinated basis? I'll just mention two other issues. Senator Clinton mentioned one, which is the dirty bomb, which can be created from the lower level radioactive materials, which are stolen or lost around the country. There have been 1,500 reports of those over the past five years and 50 percent of the cases still remain unsolved.

And, there's also a question of foreign nationals employed at nuclear reactors. We require a security check dealing with their criminal background, but there is no requirement that they pass any background check intended to identify terrorist links prior to their employment.

So, these kinds of issues all would be dealt with if the NRC was forced to go into a formal rulemaking rather than temporary upgrades that are made on an ad hoc basis, but not on a permanent basis and not as part of a full, formal national set of hearings that would have to have been conducted and were necessary on a classified basis.

So, I thank you, Mr. Chairman, very much for the opportunity of testifying before you and I'd be glad to answer any questions.

JEFFORDS: Thank you. I understand that you also have a telecom hearing that is scheduled this morning that you have to attend, so I will be -- no questions.

Senator Smith?

SMITH: No questions, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: Thank you. Questions?

CARPER: I don't have a question. I just want to say its great to see my old friend. Bienvenido. He and I used to travel to Central America during the Contra wars and fighting other battlefields at that time. It's always a pleasure to be with you and we appreciate your being here with us.

MARKEY: It was disconcerting to us to arrive in El Salvador, the country we were supporting and be put in a secured van with Uzi submachine guns to protect us against being killed and then to arrive in Nicaragua and for Congressman Carper and I to go on a two mile run and have the people be patting us on the back in the country we were trying to overthrow.

So, it was a very disconcerting trip in 1983 to witness the asymmetry of our policies at that time.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: Thank you for excellent help and we will work with you as move forward to make sure that we're sort of on the same page.

MARKEY: Thank you. I appreciate it.

JEFFORDS: The first witness and the only witness is the Honorable Richard A. Meserve, chairman of the United States Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

Thank you for testifying for the committee, Mr. Chairman. It's a pleasure to be with you again. I've enjoyed the working relationships that have evolved and commend you for your forthrightness in getting us the information that we requested and needed.

So, you may please proceed.

MESERVE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am pleased to appear before you this morning on behalf of the United States Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

My written testimony discusses the current status of actions that the NRC has taken in response to the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11 and outlined some of the work that lies ahead.

I believe that the NRC's response to the attacks has been appropriate and thoughtful and that the NRC's current programs continue to provide a very high level of security.

MESERVE: Let me briefly summarize my written testimony. Before September 11, nuclear power plants were among the best-defended and most hardened facilities of the nation's critical infrastructure. In the aftermath of the attacks, security has been enhanced even further. On September 11, the NRC advised our licensees to go to the highest level of security, which they promptly did. Our licensees have remained at that level since that time.

Moreover, we have maintained a steady flow of information to our licensees through over 30 updates to our original threat advisors. In light of the continuing threat condition, we issued orders to our reactor licensees to establish the security requirements within an established regulatory framework. We have continued over the months to work with the intelligence and law enforcement community, the Office of Homeland Security and others to ensure that adequate protection is maintained at our civilian nuclear facilities.

In short, we are comfortable with the security at our nuclear power plants. We are not aware of any significant credible threat that is directed at the power plants, although they obviously are plants -- facilities that are of concern.

We had strong security at these facilities before September 11 and that security has been significantly enhanced since that time. Moreover, the NRC is open to change. We are in the process of revising our design basis threat. We are reexamining how and we should reinvigorate the process of conducting exercises.

We are examining the processes by which people are cleared into the facilities. All of this is part of the comprehensive review of security that is underway at the NRC.

Many members of Congress have asked the NRC how they can help to improve security at nuclear power plants and other facilities. In response, the commission has requested that Congress enact several specific legislative proposals that would amend three sections of the Atomic Energy Act.

Most of these provisions are contained in S. 1586, which was introduced by Senators Inhofe and Smith at the end of last October. I should note that all of our proposals have been coordinated with the executive branch and enjoy strong support from the administration.

One of the proposals would provide federal authorization for guards to carry in used firearms at NRC regulated facilities designated by the commission and to protect property of significance to the common defense and securities located at or being transported to or from such facilities.

This amendment could provide some protection for licensee guards from state criminal prosecution for actions taken during the performance of their official duties. At the present time, state laws govern the use of weapons by guards at NRC-licensed facilities.

In some, state laws do not permit guards to use weapons except to protect against an immediate threat to their own lives or to the lives of others. In such states, it may not be possible to shield the guards at NRC-licensed facilities from state prosecution.

In addition, some state laws make it difficult for licensees or security contractors to use more effective weaponry. To alleviate this problem, the commission has developed an additional provision, not included in S. 1586, that would authorize the guards to carry and use such weapons as the commission may require.

A copy of the original proposal with additional language to address this concern is attached to my written testimony.

Another provision would make it a federal crime to bring unauthorized weapons and explosives into NRC-licensed facilities. Although the NRC may impose sanctions against licensees for violations of its security regulations, there is no federal law permitting the imposition of criminal sanctions against the person responsible for bringing the weapon or other dangerous instruments to the site.

Our final proposal would make federal prohibitions on sabotage applicable to the operation and construction of certain NRC licensed and certified facilities. We believe that these legislative changes that I have described will contribute to enhancing the security of nuclear facilities and material.

The commission opposes S. 1746 which would federalize the security forces at commercial nuclear facilities. We see several fundamental difficulties with this legislation. First, the bill separates the strategy for the security of nuclear facilities from that of all other types of sensitive facilities, such as chemical plants, refineries and dams.

We believe society's defensive resources should be allocated in accordance with relative risk and that the separation of nuclear facilities from all other types of sensitive facilities will fragment the overall consideration of risk inappropriately.

Second, the requirement that the NRC establish a security force for sensitive nuclear facility addresses, in our view, a non-existent problem. The private guard forces that exist today are qualified, trained and tightly regulated. Unlike the situation at airports, there is no need to federalize security.

Third, the bill would bring about a fundamental shift in the responsibility and mission of the NRC and could have the unintended consequence of detracting from the commission's focus on protecting the public health and safety.

Fourth, NRC's role as an independent regulator would be compromised by the bill's requirement that the NRC design security plans for all sensitive nuclear facilities to implement the plans with NRC employees, but then also conduct evaluations of the efficacy of the plans.

Fifth, the bill would create command and control difficulties, because it would establish two classes of employees -- both of which would be responsible for safety in the event of a terrorist attack -- licensee personnel responsible to the licensee for safe operations and federal employees responsible to the NRC for security.

In an emergency, these separate lines of authority could lead to a diminution of the capacity to ensure safety. These fundamental difficulties in S. 1746 argue against its adoption, but there also are many other concerns raised by the bill which are detailed in my written testimony.

In closing, we look forward to working with the Congress both on the enactment of the NRC legislative proposals I have discussed and on continuing to ensure adequate protection of the public health and safety.

I appreciate being here today to discuss the NRC's programs and am prepared to answer your questions.

Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Well, thank you for an excellent statement.

I have stated that I commend you and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for their comprehensive, top to bottom review of security measures, which you are undertaking. I know this is a complex process and one that must be carefully considered. However, we also must be diligent in quickly putting into place appropriate measures to both provide protection and to give the public the confidence that we are doing so.

I have been told that the other agencies have set specific time frames for completing their agency reviews, such as a national nuclear security agency within the Department of Energy, which has committed its fiscal year 2003 budget request to establish a new design basis threat for the security of the nation's nuclear weapons facilities by September of this year.

Do you have a date certain for completion of your design basis threat in other security revisions?

MESERVE: We don't have a date certain by which to complete some of these tasks, although these are very much activities that are fully engaging the commission.

Let me say that for the interim, we have established what we call "interim compensatory measures" at our facilities, which are significant enhancements on the requirements that the licensees must meet in order to ensure safety.

That gives us the comfort that we are in an appropriate position to deal with the situation today.

We are in a somewhat different situation than the Department of Energy in that it has the authority to make the changes, doesn't go through a regulatory process in doing so, so there is a somewhat easier situation that they confront in bringing about changes in the security environment than at the NRC.

But nonetheless, we have serious security that is in place and we are examining where we should go in the long term in terms of regulatory changes.

JEFFORDS: Well, it's important that you communicate with us if there is anything we can do to make sure that there are no roadblocks that are making it difficult for you to meet these time demands.

MESERVE: Thank you very much, sir.

JEFFORDS: We want to help in every way we can to make sure it can be done expeditiously.

REID: When do you anticipate completion of the evaluation and can this committee anticipate we will fully share in your findings?

MESERVE: Explore what, sir?

REID: The actions that you are taking now.

MESERVE: Let me say it's been a -- we are prepared at any time to share the actions that we are undertaking. Let me say that they range over a wide variety of areas and we're not holding up steps in one area to await actions we might take in the other.

As an example, Mr. Markey had raised the question about dealing with the possibility of foreign nationals who might be employed at nuclear power plants. We have worked with the Immigration and Naturalization Service to complete the screening of employees at nuclear plants to satisfy ourselves that there are appropriate people who are employed.

We have revised the mechanisms for providing access, particularly temporary access, to facilities to upgrade the security. So, that's a step that we have taken. There are a multitude of different areas in which we have taken steps as which the circumstances then arise.

I don't see and I can't commit to you exactly when the whole package of steps will be completed. I see this as an ongoing effort that is going to be one that is going to consume this commission and I believe some aspects of it may affect the entirety of the infrastructure and may consume the Congress for an extended period.

REID: I just want to make sure that we have a relationship where you can freely come to us if you are having anything that is holding you up for which we can assist you.

MESERVE: I very much appreciate that, sir. We would not hesitate to seek your assistance.

REID: It is my understanding of the past that you have conducted force on force training exercises against individual facilities no more often than once every eight years. Do you intend to increase that and what additional resources do you anticipate for that if you do?

MESERVE: Well, let me say I think there has been some confusion about the way exercises were conducted before September 11. It is the case that on average the operational safeguards response evaluations, which was the OSREs, which is the terminology we use for these exercises, were the actual force on force drills were conducted on an average of once every eight years.

That doesn't mean the security at the plants wasn't subject to continuing scrutiny. We have resident inspectors who are at every site. There is evaluation that is undertaken at the sites as part of the ongoing inspection efforts to satisfy ourselves that the security requirements were being met.

It is, in fact, that these were very hard tests and there have been some assertions made that we found problems at some of the sights at which these tests were undertaken and that, in fact, is the case.

But it's what you expect that in conducting the tests, the attacking force knew the entirety of the defensive scheme. In fact, the tests were designed to probe those areas where based on a full evaluation of the defensive scheme, our experts has some questions about the adequacy of the defensive strategy.

So, they probe exactly where the sensitivities were.

I think it is very doubtful that an attacking force would have that level of knowledge about what is going on at the nuclear plants to be able to design an attack in that way.

But nonetheless, we are undertaking a reexamination of the entirety of the way in which we are doing exercises, that is something that is -- there is a staff paper that is on the resumption process that is expected to the commission later this week.

We will be starting the table top process, I would anticipate, in the summer, then go to the full force on force exercises and resume them later this year. Our commission has not had the opportunity to examine the yet budgetary implications of increased frequency, but I think it is very likely the frequency of the exercises will be significantly increased.

REID: What is your budget request for fiscal year 2003 regarding additional security measures and how do you anticipate it will be used?

MESERVE: We do have a supplement for fiscal year 2002 of about $36 million. My recollection for fiscal year 2003 is that it was on the order of $29 million or $30 million for our security efforts. That would involve our continuing work on evaluation of vulnerabilities and enhancements of communications capabilities and our own capacity to deal with confidential information and things of that nature.

I think that -- I know you are accustomed to hearing about billions of dollars in the security area, and I think it is important to recognize that we are a regulatory agency and the substantial part of the cost associated for security are born by the licensees, and of course, don't appear in our budget.

Our licensees have spent many millions of dollars since September 11 dealing with the requirements that we have imposed.

REID: Well, thank you.

(CROSSTALK)

JEFFORDS: ... sure we have some additional questions, which we'll submit to you for you and your staff to answer.

I now turn to Senator Corzine.

CORZINE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I appreciate the testimony. But I have some concerns about how your arguments flow with regard to S. 1746, particularly the federalization of security. Quite frankly, I have a hard time understanding how defensive resources that might be dedicated to preserving the safety of our nuclear power plants would undermine, on a relative risk basis, other activities in our society.

It just strikes me that one has to assess the kinds of problems that could occur -- speak about Indian Point with 20 million people in the immediate area. I don't understand the flow of that logic with respect to chemical plants or other kinds of issues. It's either a priority and a serious risk to the public, which I think the public believes it is, or it isn't. And I don't think we're talking about relative risk here, we're talking about a risk of something that, generally, is accepted as something that could be extraordinarily dangerous both by identification by our enemies and also by our nation, itself.

And then I add to that your third argument that somehow or another the unintended consequence of detracting from the mission of protecting public health and safety -- nothing would be more seriously detracting or contributing to public health and safety than a terrorist attack that tries to use our infrastructure as a weapon.

I'm not sure where I come out on the federalization of security forces, but I don't see those arguments holding any weight whatsoever in the context of a major issue with regard to public health and safety.

First of all I'd like to hear comments on that.

MESERVE: Well, you've flagged a few of the arguments that I presented. Let me say with regard to the comparative risk issue -- is that what I'm suggesting is not that we all should not take the risk of security at nuclear plants seriously. What I am suggesting is that we have a societal issue, in fact, it's one that you raised in your opening statement that we have other types of facilities that at which their security issues exist. And you mentioned the issues of chemical plants, which could have consequences that are equally as severe as a nuclear plant if there were a successful attack. And somehow or another, we need to develop a strategy for how we defend critical infrastructure of all kinds.

And the argument here is suboptimizing and dedicating a certain approach to just nuclear plants may greatly enhance the security in one area and we may be missing other areas of vulnerability. And we need to have some sort of a comprehensive strategy. That's not the NRC's responsibility in that our responsibility is for the nuclear plants.

But I think as a society, we have an issue of recognizing that we have limited assets to be able to spend on security, and somehow we need to allocate those in some rational way.

And it's a policy issue which I think is ultimately one for the Congress.

With regard to the third point on the deflection...

CORZINE: You could agree with your presumption that there are other assets in this society that need security, and maybe are not even meeting the kinds of standards that we're now meeting with regard to our nuclear power plants, and still argue that federalization is a good thing because it would provide even enhanced security on those relative merits. And I don't know why that would dismiss it as an initiative.

MESERVE: I think that's a fair comment. But I think it does lead you on the path of federal -- if you're federalizing security for nuclear plants to look around the corner about the implications of that -- of whether you want to do that for the entirety of civilian infrastructure. And it does set you in a certain mode of how you're going to deal with these problems. And you might want to suggest it might be appropriate to think as to how we deal with the integrated set of issues, rather than just one sub-part of the total problem that we confront.

The third point which I raised was the possibility of the deflection of the NRC. And this is just to recognize the reality that if we were to have responsibility for over 5,000 security guards and implementing security plans and assuring the adequacy -- putting in the equipment that's necessary, that we would have an activity that would involve employees that are over twice the number that are current NRC staffers. We would become an agency that would have new and demanding responsibilities in the security area that we have not held in the past and something we would have to fight against. And I wouldn't want to suggest that we wouldn't succeed in fighting against.

But one of the things we would have to fight against is that we would not devote the time and attention to the ordinary safety issues that are ones that we have to deal with and have been ones that we deal with on a day-to-day basis.

CORZINE: It might come with some of the advantages that Congressman Markey talked about, though: whistle-blower protection; greater consistency across the nation; a number of other elements that I think are possible. And since the fundamental issue is protecting the public from the hazards, as you talk about -- radiological hazards -- I'm not sure that that isn't a stronger argument for federalization, to make sure that we have a common approach to protecting security.

Let me ask one other question about spent fuel issues, which are certainly a topic of the day. The idea that there aren't force-on-force tests with regard to decommission plants, is that something that is one of the options that you are considering? Where are you with regard to that?

Is that similarly -- is there an intention to work on the dry cask storage of spent fuel, which, whether it's decommissioned or it's not decommissioned, in the current world, seems to be one of the few options that we have that's available. And certainly we've got a major controversy going on in the State of New Jersey about Oyster Creek storage of spent fuel and dry cask next to one of our major thoroughfares, being an issue. Would you give us some comment on both decommissioned plants and protection with regard to dry casking?

MESERVE: I'd be glad to.

Let me just note before I turn to that, however, that things like whistle-blower protections are things that we do provide to the -- in that if there's an allegation of a problem at a nuclear plant, we provide protection to those people. So it's a very important channel for communication.

CORZINE: I'll just give anecdotal information. I did, as Senator Voinovich, spent time touring one of the nuclear power plants and spent time with individual guards. And they did not -- and it was the only weakness that I actually saw in this whole process is that they did not feel that they were plugged into the structure of protection as securely as they might in other ways. So I'm concerned about that.

MESERVE: It is, in fact, the case that since September 11, the concern about spent fuel and the possible vulnerability of spent fuel has been something that has received a great deal of attention by the NRC. One of the consequences of that is that as part of these measures that I've described, since September 11, is that we have significantly upgraded the security that is provided for spent fuel in that we're -- this has been an ongoing process. But there is significantly enhanced capacity today, as compared before September 11, that's targeted on protecting spent fuel.

We have not worked out all of the implications of that in terms of how that would affect future exercises. But I would anticipate that our approach to dealing with future exercises of our security plans will encompass a variety of aspects of a nuclear industry that were not so much the focus before, and that would include spent fuel.

JEFFORDS: Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you, Chairman Meserve. As I've listened carefully to both your testimony and the answers to questions, there were two statements you made that caused me some concern. And it's not a reflection on the NRC, so much as it suggests some of the continuing challenge we face to preparing for whatever might happen.

The first is your reference in your written testimony, and in response to Senator Corzine, that we have to make hard choices because we have limited resources for security.

I think that's the wrong way to go about this issue. We ought to figure out what is it we need, not only to secure nuclear power plants, but chemical plants and the rest of our critical infrastructure that might be vulnerable to any kind of attack or even accident. And we ought to say to ourselves, "OK. That is the cost of security in the 21st century."

Now, I understand that there are budgetary constraints that are imposed. But I certainly don't believe we should be limiting ourselves before we even understand completely what our functional needs are and then put price tags on them. And that's not an NRC issue, that's a larger congressional issue.

But I believe it's imperative that we do an analysis that is as honest and straightforward and as clear about the cost as we possibly can. Then it's up to the Congress and the American public to decide whether they want to bear the cost. But I don't think anyone in any agency should be, you know, in any way constrained about what is needed before we get to that final point.

The second concern I had is, in response to a question by Chairman Jeffords, you were talking about the force-on-force exercises and made the statement that it was doubtful that attackers would have such intimate knowledge of the nuclear power plants.

I just think that's a false assumption. I don't think that's an assumption we can make today. I don't believe any of us should be assuming any limited knowledge or capacity on the part of our adversaries.

So I would reverse the presumption and start from a basis that we have to presume that our adversaries know everything there is to know, and, therefore, we have to take actions to protect ourselves against that presumption of knowledge.

Now, with respect to the design basis threat time line, which, apparently, has been pushed back, it's already been nine months. Can you give us an estimate today as to how much longer it will take on the design basis threat re-evaluation?

And then, after the DBT is revised, how long will it be before we see new security plans at plants? Will it be a matter of months? Will it be a matter of years? Can you give us some ballpark estimate as to when whatever you eventually decide is the new design basis threat will be implemented at plants across the country?

MESERVE: Let me respond, if I may, first to your concerns because I think there may have been some misunderstanding of what I at least intended to say.

My comment about the need for an allocation of resources was not that this has been a constraint on how the NRC has examined the security issue. We have looked at what we have thought has been necessary to provide adequate protection of public safety, and we have imposed those requirements without concern about any examination of the cost implications of those actions.

My comment was really a broader societal one that it is -- and it was in the context that Congress is going to have to decide about how much our society, on the broad sense, should spend on security as a whole. And it wasn't that I was purporting to make that as a decision or a factor for the NRC to be made.

Secondly, my comment about the force-on-force exercises may also have been misunderstood. Our pre-September 11 DBT did include, and does include, inside assistance to the attackers. And we conducted the exercises, therefore, assuming detailed knowledge of the details of the security plan.

You and I may differ as to our sense of how likely it is that a terrorist attacking force would have that knowledge, but we have assumed that that knowledge does exist, as it's obviously, a conservative approach to be taken.

With regard to the design basis threat, this is something that is subject to evaluation by the commission now. I think that we're talking about the period of months for us to, sort of, chart off onto a new course. There are implications for the DBT in terms of how, in fact, we put it in place. There are some components of it that, obviously, have to be classified.

MESERVE: Some components may require some regulatory changes so that there are some details that certainly will have to be worked out. And how, exactly, we proceed I think is going to be guided by the deliberations that are underway before the commission now.

CLINTON: In other words, we don't know.

MESERVE: Now, in the meantime, however, I think a most important point is that we have not waited all these months to make sure that we have put in requirements at the plants to significantly increase the security. And we did that on a prescriptive basis in that we put demands for additional guards and additional weapons and additional patrols and additional modes of attack and dealing with larger truck bombs and things of that nature. Those are all in place at nuclear power plants today.

CLINTON: Well, let me, then, just clarify, Mr. Chairman, because in your written testimony you state that requests have been received by the NRC for extensions of the deadline to submit a schedule for implementation of the new orders that were issued back in February. How many such requests for extensions of time were received by the NRC? And how many requests were granted?

MESERVE: There may be some misunderstanding in the testimony on that. We have probably 30 requirements, in that order of magnitude, that we imposed on the licensees. We asked them to come in within 20 days and give us the schedule for completion of implementation, and set an absolute deadline of August 31 for the completion of everything.

Some have come in and asked for an extension of the 20-day period within which they would give us the schedule for the completion of all of the activities because it was focused on one particular area that required some detailed analysis of blast effects in order to determine what engineering changes would be needed. And the licensees made the case that it was going to take them longer than 20 days to be able to complete that work.

We have not had a request for anyone to extend the absolute outer limit of completing the work, which was August 31.

And I apologize if there's some confusion in the statement.

CLINTON: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Senator Boxer?

BOXER: Thank you.

Mr. Chairman, I am a little concerned about a few things here. And I just, perhaps, want to make a couple of statements and ask a couple of questions.

I am asking you, as one Senator who has four nuclear power plants, please don't spend your time on the issue of the broad question of how much we want to spend protecting our people. That is a decision that will be made by the president and by the Congress as we do our budget.

Your job is to tell us what you need to do to protect the people from the disaster that would follow an attack on a nuclear power plant. And I want to stress that. We need you to tell us that.

I, frankly, don't need to hear that you don't think you should federalize employees. You know, to me, that is an issue that I can go any way on. I just want to make sure the people we hire aren't coming from the cells of Al Qaeda, whether they join the federal government or they join a private security force. OK?

So I am worried.

And then I put that together with your point -- we need to look at all the threats, you said. Don't just do something special, you know, for the nuclear industry. And you oppose this legislation, which is your right. I respect that. But why don't you want to be a model of safety?

Listen to what happened in New York, as our colleague, Senator Clinton well notes. "The World Trade Centers were designed for fire protection, but according to the engineers, much of the fire protection materials were displaced after the plane hit the building."

Now, you have said in your testimony that nuclear power plants are designed to withstand tornadoes, hurricanes, fires, floods and earthquakes. As a result, the structures inherently afford a measure of protection against deliberate aircraft impacts.

I would suggest to you, in the light of what we learned from the World Trade Center, that kind of rationale doesn't sit well. Are you -- let me -- I'm not going to ask this question because I think I have to ask other questions in a closed briefing, which I will attend.

But I'm just going to say that I trust that you are doing computer modeling to see whether the lessons that we learned after the World Trade Center would not apply to this situation. So I'm not going to ask you a question here about that. I am just assuming you are doing this.

But I guess my point is then you say you don't know of any particular threat against nuclear power plants, but yet you made these pills available to the people, which I am very grateful you did that. So I hear mixed messages. And I think the best thing that we can do is to send a very clear message to everyone in the world that we are doing everything we can, as you say, that we are acting conservatively. I agree with that. That means you do more, not less.

And, you know, the president announced that the nuclear power plants were listed as targets. We've all seen the actual documents that came out of the search of the caves by our brave men and women in uniform. So we know that. So you're not suggesting that nuclear power plants are not a target, are you, in saying you have no information? That's one question.

And secondly, are you briefed by the FBI and the CIA on a regular basis? Do you feel comfortable with the type of briefings that you are getting, given all the news that is coming out?

MESERVE: Let me respond to several of the points you've made.

I think that maybe we've gone off on a direction I had not intended -- that I was not purporting that we are making the judgment as to how much society should spend. That's not -- that is clearly something for the Congress.

With regard to the aircraft, that is something that we are undertaking. And that's a very major effort to examine the engineering features...

BOXER: Good.

MESERVE: ... of the aircraft. And that is something at a closed session that I'd be prepared to comment...

BOXER: Good.

MESERVE: ... give you briefing on. But that has been a very major activity for the NRC, and our contractors, in the period since September 11 -- to assess the vulnerabilities and discuss -- assess mitigation measures that should be taken.

We have very close coordination with the FBI and the intelligence community.

BOXER: Good.

MESERVE: We have analysts who are intimately connected with assisting those agencies and evaluating threat information. And as part of our advisory system, when a licensee observes something that is occurring at the plant, they report it to us. We coordinate with the FBI and the intelligence community for its evaluation. And there is a very close connection involving security experts at the NRC working with their counterparts in these other agencies to assure that we have detailed information and that we share with each other in assessments.

And my comment that they're not aware of a credible threat directed at a nuclear power plant is consistent with the advice that we have been receiving from the intelligence community.

Your comment about the federalization -- I very much agree with your notion that the nuclear industry should be a model for society in security. I think, in fact, we are.

I would invite all of you to visit a nuclear plant and to see the level of security that exists at these facilities. I think it would be very reassuring to you to visit a plant and see, on the ground, all that is in place. I can't, obviously, describe it in this session, but I very much welcome -- help and assist you in a visit if that were necessary.

BOXER: Mr. Chairman...

MESERVE: I want to assure that...

BOXER: ... I know my time is up, but I just want to make one point. I want to join with you and other members.

We want to work with you for, you know, if there is a time when you don't feel that you're getting the information. These are the kinds of things we can help with.

And I wanted -- and I will in written questions -- ask you about -- I have 100,000 people, far less than Senator Clinton, living within a 10-mile radius of my plants. But I have many, many more living within 50 mile. So I'm going to ask you to answer in writing, if you will, what measures you're taking beyond the 10-mile rim.

I thank you very much.

JEFFORDS: Thank you.

Senator Carper?

CARPER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I just want to say to the Chairman, thank you for joining us today and for your stewardship and for your testimony.

In your written testimony and also, I think, in part of your oral testimony, you talked about what we can do to help you and your colleagues to enhance the security of our nuclear facilities. And you talked specifically about legislation introduced by several of our colleagues, which has been introduced in this Congress, which has not yet been acted on. And in your testimony you discuss several of the provisions of that legislation.

Can you just tell me what is the status of that legislation today, with respect to having held hearings, scheduled markups -- what is the status?

MESERVE: The NRC legislative proposals, which was ones that passed the Senate last year, but did not succeed in passage through the House, were reintroduced here, again, by Senators Smith and Inhofe...

CARPER: Which Senator Smith?

MESERVE: Pardon me?

CARPER: Which Senator Smith?

MESERVE: Senator Smith from New Hampshire, who was with us earlier.

And we have suggested an additional provision to that legislation, which was added to the testimony. We have not had an opportunity of a hearing in this session of the Senate to discuss this. So there has not, yet, been an opportunity for a hearing or a markup on that legislation.

CARPER: Is the committee of jurisdiction for the bill this Committee?

MESERVE: I will defer to you as to the jurisdiction of the committees, but I believe that the jurisdiction is this Committee.

CARPER: Mr. Chairman, is that correct?

JEFFORDS: I believe that's -- we always claim it, anyway.

(LAUGHTER)

CARPER: Let's talk about the legislation that has been assigned to this Committee over which we have jurisdiction and take several pieces of it and talk with me about why they are necessary and also, what criticisms of those proposals that you might be aware of that we should be aware of.

Don't go into great detail, but just give me an overview -- the key pieces of the legislation...

MESERVE: Sure.

CARPER: ... maybe why they're critical and any opposition or criticism of those that you're mindful of.

MESERVE: Well, I think that the -- I've described in my testimony the NRC proposals and why we think that those are wise and how they would be supplemented. And so, those are things that -- and they've also -- we have solicited and obtained the support of the executive branch for those components of legislation. So those would be the three parts that were in Senator Smith and Senator Inhofe's bills as supplemented by the additional component, which is the attachment to my written testimony.

The other testimony that is before this Committee is the legislation that would govern the federalization of the guard forces. And my testimony discussed why we have the concerns that we have with regard to federalization.

There's one aspect of that that, perhaps, I should emphasize that may require some amplification. And that is that there's a command and control issue that we take very seriously that would arise if the troops were federalized at the commercial power stations. And the reason is that it is the obligation of the licensee to assure the safe operations of the facility. And so all of the control room staff and so forth are licensee employees, taking instructions from the licensee, within the regulatory environment that we establish -- is subject to our orders. But nonetheless, it's the licensee that has the fundamental obligation to assure safe operations.

The legislation would take security and rip that out of the responsibility of the licensee and make that a federal responsibility so that some of the employees at the site would be ones that would work for the NRC, as our employees, responsible for security. And the people responsible for safe operations reporting to the licensee.

I can imagine in an emergency that were to arise -- that, heaven forbid, there were a terrorist attack on a facility that took out some equipment -- and you can see that, in those circumstances, I believe that we would need clear command and control as to responsibility as to what action is to be taken. And the licensee actions to assure bringing the plant to a safe condition are ones that would have to be coordinated with the security actions.

And fracturing the chains of command for -- in those circumstances, we think would be a serious mistake -- that should be integrated. And having that responsibility integrated together in the licensee organization, we think, is an important factor.

CARPER: I want to go back to the legislation that you mentioned at the outset, and that is the legislation that is cosponsored in part by Senator Smith of New Hampshire. And part of my question was what are the criticisms -- maybe the legitimate criticisms of the legislation? And how would you respond to those criticisms?

MESERVE: I must admit that it has been a complete puzzle to me in that I have -- the NRC, for years, has been pursuing this legislation. It passed the Senate last year and I have not heard any criticism of the legislation, but we don't seem to be able to get it done.

CARPER: Why do you think that is?

MESERVE: I have no idea. I think that part of the concern, maybe, that it is not seen as dramatic enough or something. I don't know.

Seems to me that they are changes that are ones that are appropriate steps to take and they're ones that I would urge that the Congress enact.

And I'm not aware of any criticism of them.

CARPER: I just say to my colleagues, we've talked a lot and seen a lot about reports that came out of the FBI and -- I guess it was in Minnesota and Phoenix and things that we're mindful of and, in retrospect, we should have paid more attention to. And someone should have done something as a result of that. And I would just hope here, in this case, that we would not be guilty of not pursuing an agenda. Once we've discussed it and decided it's worth pursuing, that we not be negligent.

Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Thank the Senator for his words.

And I commend you for your testimony and it's been an enjoyable experience to work with you. You and your members have been very forthright. And we will be having another closed session so that any questions that the members have that they didn't feel appropriate to ask can be answered.

Thank you.

And we'll move to the next panel.

I also ask unanimous consent that this Nuclear Security General Aviation is not a Threat document, by Senator Inhofe, be made a part of the record, without objection.

Now, please...

MESERVE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: ... thank you, Mr. Chairman. I enjoy working with you. We'll be back with you soon.

MESERVE: Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Our next panel consists of five witnesses. Our first witness is David Lochbaum, a Nuclear Safety Engineer with Union of Concerned Scientists. Our second witness will be Mr. Jack Skolds, Chief Nuclear Officer at Exelon Corporation. Next, we will have Danielle Brian, Executive Director of the Project on Government Oversight. After Brian, Donna J. Hastie, a specialist in emergency preparedness will testify. And, finally, Dr. Irwin Redlener, President of the Children's Health Fund, will finish our Committee's testimony this morning.

Each witness is requested to keep his or her testimony to no more than five minutes.

After the conclusion of all testimony, members will be free to ask questions. And please speak clearly into the microphone, to all of you, so as it's difficult to hear from here sometimes.

We greatly appreciate all of your time and your willingness to share your expertise with the Committee. And thank you for being here.

Mr. Lochbaum, please proceed with your testimony.

LOCHBAUM: Good morning, Mr. Chairman, and members of the Committee.

My name is David Lochbaum. I have been the nuclear safety engineering for the Union of Concerned Scientists since October of 1996. Prior to joining UCS, I worked for over 17 years in the nuclear power industry.

The issue before you today is the security of our nuclear facilities. As with many nuclear power issues, we have firmly staked out middle ground on this one.

We disagree with industry representatives who contend that nuclear power plants are hardened structures virtually immune from attack and who claim that the health consequences from a successful attack would be insignificant.

But we also disagree with those who contend that nuclear power plants are an undue hazard that can only be dealt with by immediately shutting them down.

We view nuclear power plants as being vulnerable to sabotage and advocate taking all reasonable steps to reduce the chances of a successful attack and to minimize the harm from a successful attack. We are, therefore, pleased to support the legislation proposed in S. 1586 and S. 1746. Once enacted into law, these bills would provide millions of Americans with greater protection against nuclear sabotage.

The Price-Anderson Act proves the need for adequate security. Price-Anderson was created because the liability from a nuclear plant accident could be so large as to prevent private insurance companies from underwriting that risk.

Congress is in the process of renewing Price-Anderson because nuclear power plants remain immense risk hazards. The chemical industry and other industries do not receive comparable federal liability protection.

The 1975 fire at the Browns Ferry nuclear plant illustrates their vulnerability. A worker checking for air leaks with a candle started a fire that burned out of control for nearly seven hours. The blaze disabled all of the emergency core cooling systems for unit one and nearly all of these systems for unit two. Only innovative efforts by workers to cobble together a make-shift scheme for adding water to the unit one reactor prevented a core meltdown.

It is not far-fetched to think that one or more attackers, armed with explosives or a large aircraft fully loaded with jet fuel, might be able to cause more damage than one worker with one candle.

While all provisions of both bills have merit, the most valuable portion of the proposed legislation is Section 4 of the Nuclear Security Act. This section requires the Nuclear Regulatory Commission to conduct force-on-force testing at each nuclear facility at least once every two years. The force-on-force tests pit mock intruders against the plant's barriers and defenders.

How do teachers evaluate their students' academic performance? Do they use a checklist to verify that students attend classes and have textbooks, pencils, paper and calculators? No, they use tests that demonstrate their students' capabilities. Textbooks and class attendance are the pathway to knowledge, while tests are the best measure of progress along that pathway.

Likewise, security checklists show that a nuclear plant has gates, guards and guns, but they don't provide enough insight on progress towards security. Force-on-force tests demonstrate whether adequate security has been achieved. Frequent demonstration of adequate security performance is invaluable.

The Nuclear Security Act also requires potassium iodide stockpiling for people living within 50 miles of each nuclear facility. This provision is urgently needed to eliminate current inequities.

That potassium iodide has value is clearly demonstrated by the fact that it would be distributed to nuclear plant workers and federal, state and local officials responding to an accident. It would seem unwise not to provide equivalent protection for Americans living downwind of the facilities.

But, according to the NRC, only 13 states currently stockpile potassium iodide for people living within the emergency planning zones. The NRC protecting only some Americans makes about as much sense as the US Coast Guard requiring lifeboats on only some cruise ships.

Expanding the potassium iodide inventory to cover a 50-mile radius, rather than a 10-mile radius, increases the likelihood that all people in harm's way will be protected. No matter where the line is drawn, the question will remain about people living at end plus one miles. The 50-mile radius seems to be a reasonable compromise. Even if conditions affect people 60 or 70 miles downwind of a plant, potassium iodide upwind could be redirected to the folks that are in harm's way.

The proposed legislation would greatly improve nuclear facility security. The only element potentially missing from the proposed legislation is adequate protection against insider sabotage. There is language in the Nuclear Security Act touching upon insider sabotage, but it does not explicitly address factors such as the two-person rule for vital areas; use of in-plant security cameras; armed security guard escorts for visitors to vital areas; integration of security considerations into normal plant safety decision making; and training for operators when responding to actual sabotage.

UCS recommends the Committee consider strengthening the proposed legislation by explicitly incorporating these items; obtaining a firm commitment for the NRC to include these items in their top-to-bottom review or by providing clear guidance on expectations regarding these items in the committee reports that accompanied these bills.

In closing, UCS supports S. 1586 and S. 1746 and hopes that both bills become law.

I have testified before Congress several times. Until now, it has been always to oppose this or to complain about that. It is a welcome change to appear today in full support of these bills.

The worst part about these bills is they address reasonable steps that could be taken, but have not yet been taken. The best part about these bills is they will solve problems once they are enacted.

Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Thank you. Very good -- you're almost right on the five minutes -- appreciate that.

LOCHBAUM: I practiced more than once.

(LAUGHTER)

JEFFORDS: Mr. Skolds?

SKOLDS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the Committee. I thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today to discuss this important issue.

I would also like to thank several members of the Committee for investigating the issues of nuclear plant security first-hand. Senators Graham, Clinton, Corzine, Smith, Voinovich and Specter have all toured nuclear power plants to receive briefings on plant security since September 11, as have several members of the Committee's staff members. In fact, Senator Specter has toured three of the five nuclear power plants in Pennsylvania, including two Exelon facilities.

I will focus my comments today on the legislative proposals before the Committee, though my written statements provide extensive background on security at commercial nuclear plants in the United States after September 11 and recommendations the federal government should take to enhance security. Before addressing the legislation pending before the Senate, however, I'd like to make a few comments.

We believe that there are people interested in doing harm to nuclear power plants. We have the most at risk. And we take this issue very seriously.

The nuclear power industry is absolutely committed to ensuring that our plants are operated safely and that all necessary steps are taken to protect the health and safety of the public and our employees. Thousands of our employees live within 10 mile of the 10- mile EPZ surrounding the nuclear plants, and no one has a greater interest than us.

Second, commercial nuclear power plants are the most well- protected industrial facilities in the United States today. And, in fact, many businesses are turning to us as the model for providing security and emergency planning at their industrial complexes.

And third, as the United States acts to strengthen homeland security in light of the new threats to the nation's security, it is imperative that federal, state and local officials work cooperatively with nuclear plant operators to build on the solid foundation of emergency response capabilities that existed prior to September 11.

Now let me turn my specific comments to the legislation.

On S. 1586, the nuclear industry is on record as supporting the provisions included in S. 1586. And while some NRC licensees have recently expressed concern about the possible legal implications of providing wide-ranging arrest authority to private security forces, the industry stands ready to work with the Committee to resolve these concerns.

Concerning S. 1746, it makes sweeping changes in a manner in which security at commercial nuclear facilities is addressed. Unfortunately, this legislation puts the proverbial cart before the horse by mandating radical legislative solutions to issues that have not been identified as problems.

Section 3 of the bill would substitute a statutorily-mandated design basis threat for that developed by the NRC, and would federalize security at commercial nuclear power plants by establishing a nuclear security force within the NRC and by requiring the Commission to develop a security plan for each of the nation's sensitive nuclear facilities.

Section 3 also levies a tax on sensitive nuclear facilities to fund a newly created Nuclear Security Fund.

Before legislating the details of a design basis threat, Congress should first direct the president to conduct a comprehensive review with the various energy, intelligence and law enforcement agencies of the various threats facing nuclear power plants. Once such a review is completed, the NRC should be directed to adjust the design basis threat accordingly.

With regard to federalization of nuclear plant security forces, Exelon strongly opposes such a drastic and unjustified change in the security requirements. Security forces at nuclear power plants are highly-trained professionals. And substituting federal employees to safeguard sensitive nuclear facilities may actually degrade security.

We believe that the integrated command and control of plant security forces is an important aspect of our operations and plant operations personnel. And it's essential to assure the protection of public health and safety.

Similarly, requiring the NRC to develop the security plans for each of the nation's sensitive nuclear facilities within 180 days would be a significant task that would result in an unnecessary, and perhaps dangerous, diversion of commission resources.

As with federalization of the nuclear plant security forces, requiring a federally-developed security plan for several dozen sites is unnecessary given the lack of evidence that the current system is deficient.

And finally, a tax on nuclear power plant operators would fund a new and unnecessary federal bureaucracy and would be unparalleled in the private sector. Simply put, this $700 million tax would fund an activity that is effectively managed by the private industry.

Section 4 establishes an Operation Safeguards and Response Unit at the NRC. The existing NRC Operational Safeguards and Response Evaluations, or OSRE, has been applied and interpreted in an inconsistent and, at times, arbitrary manner. Anti-nuclear groups and the NRC have, at times, inaccurately characterized licensee performance under the existing program by claiming that we have failed.

Now, these programs have been conducted for approximately 15 years. And if the report had been that we had found no areas for improvement, I'd be very concerned. There are areas for improvement. And these exercises are very rigorous. These exercises are very detailed and they are intended to identify areas for improvement.

CLINTON: Mr. Skolds, you'll have to sum up, we're at the end of your time.

SKOLDS: All right.

I'll stop right there, then.

SKOLDS: Thank you for the opportunity.

CLINTON: Thank you very much. Ms. Brian?

BRIAN: The Project on Government Oversight, an investigative organization that works with insiders in order to improve public policy, first began investigating nuclear security by looking at the Department of Energy's nuclear weapons facilities. This work caused security guards at commercial reactors, current and former NRC security officials and contractors with military experience to contact POGO about inadequate security at commercial nuclear plants.

My testimony is based on information and documents from these insiders. I must strongly emphasize that our sources of information are not anti-nuclear. In fact, most of them have spent their entire professional lives working and supporting the nuclear industry.

We applaud the sponsors of Senate Bills 1586 and 1746, the Nuclear Security Act, for several important provisions contained in these bills.

The NRC's current DBT is wholly inadequate. According to published sources, the NRC's DBT requires protection against fewer than a handful of outside attackers. This is absolutely absurd given the September 11 attack. And I'd suggest that the fuss about disclosing the already very public number of attackers nuclear plants are currently expecting appears more that the NRC and utilities are embarrassed about this ridiculously low number.

Half the nuclear power plants cannot even protect against these paltry current threat assumptions. Let me caution the Committee, despite what Chairman Meserve said earlier, these tests are seriously dumbed down. They are not hard tests. They, first, do not go beyond this paltry threat assumption. And I outline in my written testimony, many more are artificialities, including, as I think, you, Senator, mentioned, that they give six to 10 months advanced warning, which, obviously, a terrorist would not do.

Can the guard force protect the integrity of the plants from a suicidal terrorist attack? The statistics say no. How much worse would those statistics be if the DBT accurately represented the threat we now face?

The NRC has never tested a power plant guard's ability to protect spent fuel pools, possibly the prime target of a terrorist attack. It is estimated that a terrorist could penetrate the fence line and breach a secured spent fuel pool in less than 60 seconds.

We encourage the NRC to immediately recognize spent fuel pools as a primary terrorist target.

Military special forces have told us about obvious vulnerabilities at most nuclear power plants that I would be very happy to discuss with senators or staff. I am uncomfortable, however, outlining them in public testimony.

In very general terms, a terrorist carrying an explosive could blow a sizable hole in the reinforced concrete around a spent fuel pool. At one-third of our reactors, the spent fuel pools are above ground, where they could be targeted from outside the fence line, resulting in the immediate release of high levels of radiation, quickly turning into an uncontrolled radio-active fire.

The Nuclear Security Act requires a plant to increase security of these spent fuel pools. In the meantime, we recommend barriers and delay mechanisms to supplement security until the spent fuel is placed in dry casks underground.

Guards told POGO that their only firearms training was firing 96 rounds or shots with their handguns, and far fewer with their shotguns. Standard training requires only that they can stand and hit a stationary target 25 yards away. They have no training shooting on the run at a moving target.

Recently, some of the facilities, because of the more advanced attention to this issue in the last few months, have introduced a running man across the target where the standing shooter is allowed to have 10 shots trying to hit the target.

Guards have admitted that their training is so inadequate in the face of a real terrorist attack, many would simply use their guns to protect themselves while they escaped.

Additionally, nuclear power plant guards are severely out-gunned. Even the NRC's DBT assumes that attackers will be armed with automatic weapons and explosives. Yet many guards are equipped only with shotguns and revolvers.

Contrary to the ads in the Washington Post, placed by the nuclear industry lobbyist NEI, guards do not normally wear flack jackets nor carry semi-automatic weapons. At one-third of nuclear power plants, the guards only have access to shotguns that are locked up at a distant central location.

POGO strongly agrees with the Nuclear Security Act's provision reviving the OSRE program and requiring that mock attacks occur no less than every two years.

Chairman Meserve also mentioned that the NRC is in the process of revitalizing the OSRE process at testing facilities. I'd like to mention that the NRC has twice closed that shop down because they didn't like what they were finding out. And I would not, frankly, trust NRC, without congressional involvement, to make the decisions on how they're going to revive that office.

Anti-terrorism experts tell us that the worst enemy of any guard force is the daily grind of nothing happening. A simple solution is to add unannounced tests, which aren't happening right now by the NRC. Fast food chains...

CLINTON: Ms. Brian, you'll have to wrap up.

BRIAN: Yes.

POGO believes the goals achieved by federalizing could, instead, be accomplished to the following improvements. Security guards are among the lowest compensated employees. I spoke with one last night who was getting $2 less an hour than custodians at his facility.

Guards must be given whistle-blower protections. Despite what the chairman said, only federal employees have legal whistle-blower protection. Currently utility and security subcontract employees do not.

The federal government's expanded role should be to provide independent oversight rather than managing security. And we strongly recommend taking the security oversight function out of the NRC.

I'd also just like to conclude that we support S. 1586 as it's intended to remedy some obvious failures in the ability of guards to protect against attacks.

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

Ms. Hastie?

HASTIE: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

I appreciate the opportunity to talk to you today about the current status of emergency preparedness...

CLINTON: Push the microphone a little bit closer to you, Ms. Hastie.

HASTIE: ... at commercial nuclear power plants in the United States.

I'd like to make three points today. First, commercial nuclear power plants have comprehensive, well-developed and regularly tested emergency preparedness programs. The full scope of regulation pertaining to our nuclear emergency programs would cover a length of about 28.7 feet. The bibliography alone for these plants is well over an inch thick. And I've provided a description in my written testimony of the comprehensive programs.

Currently, there is strong interagency coordination among the federal, state and local agencies and with the utility to carry out their specific response. And I believe that many of these federal agencies are under the control of this -- or under the oversight of this Committee.

Nuclear power plants have to participate in an independently reviewed, full-scale exercise every two years. And we have conducted over 1,000 full-scale exercises in the past 25 years. We provide training to local workers through the cooperation of state agencies, and that includes firefighters, police, medical personnel, ambulance personnel, school personnel, school bus drivers and even local farmers. These integrated training programs are an excellent way that we build trusting relationships with the local communities that surround our power plants and also credibility with our state and federal regulators and personnel.

Second point is that the emergency preparedness programs are founded on a strong scientific and technical basis. And this includes the two emergency planning zones around nuclear power plants.

In 1976 a joint EPA and NRC taskforce developed the planning basis for offsite emergency preparedness. The taskforce performed a detailed analysis of the full range of possible reactor accidents to determine the appropriate distances from the plant that should be used for planning purposes.

The taskforce received substantial input from all federal agencies and relevant state agencies that would be responsible for implementing these protective actions.

Following a two-year plus study, the taskforce concluded that it was highly unlikely that prompt protective actions for the public would need to be taken beyond the 10 miles. That study led to the 10-mile and the 50-mile emergency planning zones that are currently used today.

And we know our emergency response plans work, because emergency response plans developed by nuclear plants have been used for many non-nuclear emergencies.

Evacuation of 10,000 people from Cedar Rapids, Iowa, following a fire used the Duane Arnold plant. There was 17,000 residents in St. Charles Parish in Louisiana were evacuated following a leak from a nearby chemical plant using Entergy's Waterford 3 nuclear power plant plan.

We've had hurricane evacuations caused by a volcano at Mt. St. Helen's (ph). We've used Hurricane Andrew at Turkey Point. So we have tested these plans many times in real events. We have never had to use them for a nuclear plant evacuation.

And over the years, as new insights and experience regarding reactor safety have been analyzed, the 10 and 50-mile planning zones have continued to be found valid for our emergency preparedness programs.

And I am not aware of any new scientific or technical information, even post 9-11, that would support fundamental changes to the existing 10 and 50-mile planning zones.

My third point is brief. Continual learning is an integral part of each of our emergency preparedness programs. We have a commitment to excellence throughout the industry, coupled with continued training, self-assessment and testing that has produced a high level of preparedness.

In summary, in the past 30 years, the nuclear industry has conducted, as I said, over 1,000 full-scale graded exercises. We have evidence that our emergency preparedness programs are effective. And we continue to strive for new levels of safety.

I thank you for the opportunity today to provide testimony at this hearing. I am sure that everyone here shares a common goal and that is to protect the health and safety of the public. That's the commitment that binds us all.

Thank you.

CLINTON: Thank you very much Ms. Hastie.

Dr. Redlener?

REDLENER: Thank you, Senator Clinton, and Senator Carper and I'm also pleased to be here. And I'm anxious to be supportive of the Nuclear Security Act. And I'm so glad that it has been proposed.

As a pediatrician and as a public health expert who's been involved in public health for 30 years, I have found myself, since last fall, deeply involved locally, in New York, and nationally in a variety of efforts with respect to the public health in general preparedness planning for ongoing terrorism.

Specifically, among my most important concerns now has been the growing awareness of potential terrorist attacks on nuclear power facilities.

Clearly, the events of September 11 demand a re-examination of all aspects of the vulnerability and security of these facilities. The fact is that because of the potential human consequences of a successful attack on power plants, this issue represents one of the most important public health challenges of our time.

And here, in a nutshell, is what we know about the public health and health risks of nuclear attacks.

Depending on the specifics of the projected attack scenarios and the extent of damage to a reactor, its support systems and/or the spent fuel containment systems, immediate civilian fatalities can range from 100, or so, to 5,000 or more, plus long-term excess cancers from radiation exposure ranging at least into the tens of thousands.

Moreover, nuclear terrorism is in a special category of psychological horror even different from chemical and other kinds of violent terrorist attacks, because nuclear terrorism is evocative of the nightmare scenarios that we've lived with for decades and which first arose during the height of the cold war.

In addition to the human toll studies which have been done by many independent experts, other experts have also concluded that thousands of square miles could be contaminated and uninhabitable for years or decades under a variety of, at least, plausible nuclear plant attack scenarios. In some, the economic, psychological and societal consequences of such an event in a major population center would be almost incalculable.

For all of these reasons, it's imperative that we take necessary and prudent steps, like we would with any other kind of major public health threat, to reduce the likelihood of a successful act of terrorism against a nuclear power plant.

These are some steps that I believe can help us assure the public that we are dealing with this challenge preventively and effectively, and most of which are addressed in the legislation at hand. First of all, I won't belabor this, but I believe strongly that the security at nuclear plants needs to be upgraded dramatically and immediately. And I think the pressure to demand an appropriately rapid time line is more than appropriate.

And the upgrade of the security needs to be commensurate with our new and totally different understanding of the capacity and ferocity and intelligence of the terrorism as we have seen it on American soil.

And I won't belabor that anymore, other than to say that I think, as a public health professional, and knowing very well what I think the public needs, I think whether it needs it practically or psychologically, federalizing the security forces at those plants, I think, is an urgent priority.

REDLENER: Secondly, all spent fuel rods should be stored in hardened, on-site, dry storage facilities, pending a more definitive solution to the challenge of permanent storage. Unlike the reactor core itself, which is in a hardened containment structure, the spent fuel in many plants, for example, the Indian Point plant that Senator Clinton referred to, is in an adjacent, comparatively lightweight structure covered with nothing more than a corrugated steel roof. A significant terrorist-induced explosion and fire could potentially release massive doses of radioactive material to the atmosphere and dry storage can reduce this risk dramatically.

Third, there needs to be a top-to-bottom revision and upgrading of the emergency planning process, with active federal oversight over that process. Planning for evacuation to date, and especially in densely populated areas, is extremely difficult. The grossly inadequate emergency evacuation planning process around the Indian Point facility is a case study.

The emergency evacuation planning zone of 10 miles is entirely too limited and is inconsistent with the potential expectations of damage and contamination that we know would happen.

Spontaneous uncontrolled evacuation in time of crisis well beyond the 10-mile zone could quickly result in chaos and paralysis of egress for people.

Permanent relocation for evacuees in the event of substantial ground contamination would be an extraordinary challenge.

Furthermore, children in school and in day care who need to be reunited with their parents, hospitalized patients, senior citizens, disabled persons, prisoners, persons refusing to leave the area represent some -- just some -- of the vexing real-world challenges not met by the current evacuation plans.

And finally, potassium iodide should be acquired and distributed on a point-of-use basis for a minimum of 50 miles from all the nuclear power plants.

I see my time is up. I know there's much more to talk about. I'm, obviously, available for whatever questions you might have.

CLINTON: Well, I want to thank all of the witnesses. And I know that other members could not stay. Obviously, the hearing went on longer than anticipated. But I think, on behalf of every one of our members on this Committee, I greatly appreciate your expertise, your testimony and the different perspectives that you have brought to bear on the issues confronting us.

I think it would be very helpful for us to be able to submit questions to you for the record. And I also would invite, perhaps, questions from the witnesses for other witnesses or for ongoing discussion. Because as one listened to this panel, you can see there's a very different perspective that I think is legitimately held, in good faith, but it is our job to try to sort it out -- to figure out exactly where we need to take action and encourage whatever steps are necessary to maximize the security of our nuclear power plants.

So I thank you very much for your testimony today. I look forward to the questions being answered that I know I will be submitting to each of you. And I wish that you would be -- all of you -- on call for further consultation by members and staff because this is an extremely important issue.

And I don't think we can take anything for granted. No matter what worked in the past, I don't think we can take it for granted now and into the future. And we need the extraordinary commitment that each of you brings to this issue to help us sort out what we should be doing in the future.

And, again, I thank you. And I thank all of the audience who's been very patient. I've seen heads nodding, depending upon which perspective you agree with. But I think for all of us, we need to put aside pre-existing attitudes, beliefs, experience and take a new look at this, no matter what perspective we came in to the hearing with today.

And with that, the Committee is adjourned.

"The Early Show," CBS, 6/10/2002

This morning, we're kicking off our weeklong Kids Connection series with a look at the mental health of children. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton decided to make this issue a priority after so many children suffered psychological trauma after the September 11th attacks. She's here in Manhattan this morning along with Dr. Harold Koplewicz, director of the New York University Child Study Center.

Good morning to both of you.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning, Jane.

Dr. HAROLD KOPLEWICZ (Director, New York University Child Study Center): Good morning, Jane.

CLAYSON: Senator Clinton, briefly explain for us what today's hearings are all about.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Jane, we have learned that a very large number of our children are suffering from the effects of 9/11, not only those who were in the schools that were evacuated and not even those who tragically lost a parent, a sibling or someone else close to them, but many children who feel more vulnerable, more anxious, more depressed about the safety of their world. And what we're going to be doing today is not only exploring the facts behind these rather disturbing numbers about the children who are suffering, but trying to figure out what we do about it and how we have a better coordinated response here locally and at the national level.

CLAYSON: Let me show you the results of a study that, of course, you know about, conducted by the New York City Board of Education. The numbers show that 10 percent of kids in grades four through 12 are suffering from some sort of post-traumatic stress disorder; 10 percent are suffering from anxiety; 8 percent are depressed; 15 percent have a fear of--of public places. Were you surprised by those numbers, Senator?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I--I was not surprised, because I know from the Oklahoma City experience and other very traumatic violent events here in the United States and around the world that that is unfortunately the pattern, and what we're trying to do is to really face up to the fact that our kids are vulnerable. They're vulnerable to feeling that sense of insecurity that really undermines a child's confidence and trust and, you know, enables a child to do well in school. And we also know that we have some real challenges here that we can address if we have a more coordinated approach, and that's what Dr. Koplewicz and I are going to be exploring at the hearing today, trying to figure out how do we better educate parents, teachers, child care providers, doctors and others so that they can recognize the symptoms and then how do we make sure there's help there.

CLAYSON: Dr. Koplewicz, Senator Clinton mentions that coordinated approach. What can be done to help kids with the aftereffects of 9/11?

Dr. KOPLEWICZ: I think the most important part of this is to realize that this is a public health problem and we know how to take care of public health problems when it's polio or tuberculosis but we have to remember that just because this is a mental disorder, it's not any less tragic or potentially lethal. Kids who suffer from these anxiety, depression, post-traumatic stress disorder symptoms are more likely to have difficulty with school attendance, they have more--are more likely to abuse substances and alcohol and they are more likely to have suicidal thoughts, attempts and completions. This is a serious problem. We should really be screening kids who were exposed and we should alerting teachers and parents about what the warning signs of depression and anxiety and post-traumatic stress disorder are, in the same way we did that with the AIDS education program or now with breast cancer awareness.

CLAYSON: Mm-hmm. Senator Clinton, from your conversations with kids in New York City, are you getting the feeling that they're having problems that are essentially being ignored?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think it really is a--it depends upon where the children are, how sensitive and attuned their families are. Certainly many children are getting support and help; where they need counseling or treatment they are getting that, as well.

But we have two big problems. One, there are many families that just don't recognize that many children who don't know how to even explain what their problems are. This is largely affecting elementary school children primarily. And secondly, we don't have the resources in place. We really don't have the kind of public health resources that are needed to try to provide support for these kids. So both we have to raise awareness and educate ourselves and secondly we have to make sure we have the resources there.

CLAYSON: Very briefly in our final seconds here, Dr. Koplewicz, what are the long-term implications of not getting assistance for these kids?

Dr. KOPLEWICZ: Well, Jane, I think the most important part is that parents have to ask their kids how they're feeling, because frequently these are the silent sufferers. These aren't your rambunctious kids who are bouncing around the class or causing trouble at home. But left untreated there are many consequences that will affect their lives, whether it's productivity in school, whether it's being able to have fun with friends, whether it's the ability to concentrate. So parents really have to talk to their kids when they see a change in their behavior whether it's sleep, whether it's schoolwork, whether it's concentration or whether it's just enjoying the things they usually enjoy. And unfortunately this doesn't stop at the city line. This is something that can affect children throughout the United States, especially when we keep hearing warnings all the time.

CLAYSON: Well, Dr. Harold Koplewicz and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, it's good to see you, and good luck today with the hearings. We'll check back with you.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you, Jane.

Dr. KOPLEWICZ: Thank you.

CLAYSON: All right. Thank you. 8:14 now. Tomorrow on our Kids Connection, we'll take a look at how birth order can have a significant impact on the personalities of your children.

Coming up next, best-sellers do battle at the box office as "The Sum of All Fears" tries to hold on, to the women of "The Ya-Ya Sisterhood." We're back with more on THE EARLY SHOW after this.

U.S. SENATOR JAMES JEFFORDS (I-VT) HOLDS HEARING ON HOME-LAND SECURITY DEPARTMENT, 7/10/2002

CLINTON: I would, Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

JEFFORDS: Without objection.

As you know, the one independent agency that would be entirely absorbed by the Department of Homeland Security is the Federal Emergency Management Agency, which you have spoken about.

As I mentioned in my opening statement, I am concerned about how this will affect FEMA's core mission. How will FEMA'S core mission change if the agency is included in the new Homeland Security Department?

RIDGE: Mr. Chairman, I would tell you that I'm familiar, from both personal experience, as well as legislative experience, with the FEMA. As a matter of fact, working with former Senator Stafford, helped rewrite the Stafford bill. Matter of fact, I think we were in the House together when it was done. Recall you were very supportive of that effort.

But I also recognized way back then that their response to a couple of tornadoes that bounced around my congressional district was less than satisfactory. That's why Senator Stafford and I worked with our colleagues to make those changes.

But since that time, as you pointed out in your opening remarks, FEMA has become a different agency. There has been a cultural change. And under James Lee Witt and under Director Allbaugh there have been very positive changes and people are very, very comfortable with the relationships they have with the FEMA agency.

Mr. Chairman, I think it has the core competency and the expertise to take on the additional mission, and I believe they complement one another, because the kinds of things that the new Department of Homeland Security would be working with FEMA to do in support of their mission has direct application to their traditional mission of responding to a natural disaster.

If we improve the interoperability of their communications, if we make sure that there's testing and exercises so that all first responders show up in response to a terrorist incident; I mean, if the practice sessions are about terrorism, you'll improve the communication and the collaboration among the first responders, then whether they show up at a terrorist incident or a natural disaster, you've enhanced the capability to respond.

So I think the president has looked at FEMA, recognizes its enormous value, understands about 85 percent, 90 percent mission is related to natural disaster recovery and mitigation, but also understands it has core competencies and relationships with the state departments of disaster assistance center, has natural relationships with first responders. And many of the programs in the Stafford Act, the individual assistance grant, the small business loans, those kind of programs are at play in New York City right now in trying to respond to some of those needs of that community, those citizens and those families.

So I think the president believes core competencies, expertise, already a strong relationship with the states and the local government, already a great relationship with the first responders, let make it a more muscular, robust agency. As you know, with his initiative, and with your leadership, in excess of $3 billion would be going to the Federal Emergency Management Agency, and if you improve their communication, their coordination, their skill level, it's just a natural add-on and value added to their ability to respond to a natural disaster. So it becomes a very vigorous, robust, all-hazard response team.

JEFFORDS: FBI Director Robert Mueller has stated that the FBI would not be included in the Department of Homeland Security because of the agency's many non-counterterrorism responsibilities. FEMA also has significant non-terrorism responsibilities. To preserve FEMA's primary focus on responding to natural disasters, I firmly believe that the agency, like the Coast Guard and the Secret Service, should remain a distinct entity within the new department.

Was this a consideration when the administration crafted its proposal? And can you explain any concerns you may have with this approach?

RIDGE: Well, I think it is the intention, Mr. Chairman, of bringing the full agency in and including, I think, the Office of Domestic Preparedness from the Department of Justice within that FEMA to just bring the infrastructure and the leadership and make it a unit within the new Department of Homeland Security and then building on that infrastructure that already exists.

JEFFORDS: I'd like to try to understand the procedure details of your proposal for FEMA. Currently, if an event occurs that is beyond the capacity and the capability of a local community and the state to respond to, the governor may request a major disaster determination. The director of FEMA reviews the governor's request and forwards a recommendation directly to the president. The president then decides whether or not to declare a major disaster, thereby authorizing federal government assistance.

Using last week's flooding in Texas as an example, how would this process work under the new department?

RIDGE: Mr. Chairman, the question is a very appropriate one and a mechanical one, but underlying the question is, we need an emergency declaration quickly, how do we align, take FEMA, put it in this new agency to make sure that we can turn around on the request? And right now we don't see any diminution in time to make the request to the undersecretary virtually on the desk simultaneously with the secretary of homeland security and forward that immediately to the president of the United States.

So I'm very familiar with the procedure, I've made several applications as governor myself. The new secretary of homeland security I think would have to address to your satisfaction that fundamental principle to make sure there's no lag time between the period that the undersecretary gets it and reviews it and the request being made to the president. And I feel fairly confident we can make those kinds of assurances to you, and if we need specific legislative language to get it done, we'd like to work with you on the language.

Time is of the essence and speed is very important. I think that goes to the heart of your question. And we don't want to put any roadblocks, bureaucratic roadblocks in a quick turnaround and a quick decision.

JEFFORDS: Senator Smith?

SMITH: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

SMITH: Governor, Administrator Whitman recently, about five months ago, undertook a study -- an internal assessment at EPA in terms of how one might be prepared to deal with an attack, to help determine EPA's strengths and weaknesses. Could you address, A, what some of those strengths and weaknesses were, and how you're planning to address them?

RIDGE: Yes. Well I think several of the senators, including yourself, have commented publicly about that internal review. And I think it's very appropriate -- actually it's laudable and I think very important that once an incident occurs, and once your team has responded, you go back and take a look at lessons learned.

I think as we have to continue to review both our capacity to respond, the timeliness of the response, and the effectiveness of the response. So in that process, I think Governor Whitman realized that her agency was severely stretched in terms of communications capabilities, personnel capability and the like.

Since that time, I believe she has built up, hired additional personnel, maybe as many as 75 additional people, to enable to EPA to respond to more than one or two events. And you do worry about simultaneous events, and we did have several on 9/11. I think there has been an enhanced training component looking to acquire and work with first responders about the interoperability of their communications. That was a serious problem at -- in New York. Candidly, as we assess other metropolitan areas, it's a serious problem everywhere, in the interoperability of communications.

So I think Governor Whitman took a look at personnel, took a look at equipment, took a look at training, and decided, "We need to do more, we need to do better," and is in the process of doing that.

Now I also think she has made a request in the 2003 budget, my recollection, to expand its work -- expand its ability to respond to disasters. Take that disaster response mechanism -- as you know, there's a national response team and I think 10 regional teams. I think there's a request for about $75 million so she can build up that capacity.

SMITH: In the proposal, your -- the Office of Domestic Preparedness has moved out of Justice and into FEMA. At first blink, it seems to me to be the right thing to do. But there had been some -- there has been some criticism on that. Would you just elaborate on that a little bit as to your rationale for that?

RIDGE: Yes. The Office of Domestic Preparedness within the Department of Justice has, for the past couple of years, with bipartisan support of members of the Congress, have been doing some very good work with first responders to include the law enforcement community.

In an effort to consolidate that effort and outreach from the federal government to the first responders, and particularly to the law enforcement community in non-traditional law enforcement roles, we just thought it would be better to blend the operations so that again, first responders can take a look at one agency, one department for their support for training, exercises, equipment and the like.

Again, we've reviewed this matter with the governors, and we've reviewed them with mayors who all are very attracted to the notion that instead of going to four or five different departments to get the emergency training and response money and exercise money and equipment money, they can go to one department based on a statewide plan, and draw down funds consistent with their statewide plan.

So that is the rationale for that. They do a good job, they are moving in to take that ability -- move it into FEMA, move it into the new Department of Homeland Security, additional personnel with a lot more money to train and work with first responders. That's the rationale.

SMITH: I mentioned infrastructure protection in the U.S. in my opening statement regarding the Homeland Security Office. And there's a lot of questions about who should have the primary responsibility for infrastructure protections. Many members have mentioned it, such as water treatment facilities and so forth. Would you just briefly give us your view on where you are headed on that?

RIDGE: That was interesting, Senator, because you and Senator Corzine basically alluded to it in your opening statements. As the president has submitted the proposal, this is the theory and practice how we believe it would work.

There's no single place in the federal government presently where someone can take a look at the threat assessments generated by the different intelligence-gathering agencies, and then take a look at the critical infrastructure that we have in this country. And 85 to 90 percent of it is privately owned.

And then depending on the credibility of the threat in the assessment with regard to the vulnerability, then say to either that company, that economic sector, that community, whatever the potential target might be, "The threat's credible, you're a very critical piece of this infrastructure, but we don't believe that the protective measures that you have, the security measures that you have enhanced are the best means of dealing with this potential threat." And then, once that assessment is made, work through the EPA, with the water companies or the chemical companies, work through the Department of Energy, work through the Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

So the collaborative feature of this department would be, one place we get the threat, match it against the vulnerability, make a determination whether the vulnerability is real and what we need to do about it, and then work with the respective agency to see that it gets done.

We have had some interesting discussions again informally with trade associations and businesses that represent different sectors of the economy. And I think one of the things that is very interesting, and a couple of them actually volunteered, as we go about determining best practices and working on those protective measures, one of the first people we ought to move in to make sure that they are satisfied locally, whether its the water facility, the chemical plant or whatever, one of the first groups of people we ought to bring in should be the first responders to help assess whether or not they believe the protective measures are substantial enough or not. Since they're to be the first ones to respond, we think they ought to have a role there as well.

JEFFORDS: Point out, there's a vote scheduled at 3:15, so hopefully we could be able to conclude by that time.

JEFFORDS: Senator Corzine?

CORZINE: I think you really have tried to address where I was going to go, but, you know, there have been a number of assessments with respect to the chemical plant/oil-refining issues already established. And I'm concerned about how we're going to use those assessments already in place, or are we going to have to do additional assessments. I do understand identifying and matching these off to a sensible program. But there are some clear vulnerabilities that are identified by agencies over a significant period of time.

In fact, if I understand it correctly, EPA was about to come out with a proposal with regard to dealing with chemical plant facilities. For some reason it was withdrawn in June, or at least we're under the impression of that.

How are you going to put together what is already in the public forum, relative to how we get on with this? And as it relates to chemical plants, do you think there is a joint role between the new department and EPA? And do you have a vision for that as we go forward?

RIDGE: Senator, very appropriately you've identified one of the challenges that we have in this country. The fact is we have a very diversified economy and our enemies look at some of our economic assets as targets. And clearly, the chemical facilities are one of them. And we know that there have been reports validated about security deficiencies at dozens and dozens of those.

As part of their ongoing work within the Office of Homeland Security within the White House, we've been working with an interagency group, primarily EPA, but other agencies involved as well, and the chemical industry and other groups to take a look at overall security concerns, protective measures, look at best practices, try to set standards. And then work to see if, frankly, once we decide what needs to be done, if, in fact, it's done.

We are hoping to avoid, candidly, the need for legislation. We take a look (inaudible) conversation with some of the leaders of the different sectors of the economy. One, they've got a fiduciary responsibility to the communities in which they house these facilities to do everything they can to ensure their protection. They've got a responsibility to the men and women that work there. They've got a responsibility to their shareholders. And we've talked to them about an enhanced responsibility of the private sector to take on the additional expense associated with increased security and increased protection.

We are close to completion of that interagency process. And I suspect that one of the reasons we knew the EPA -- we started several months ago -- the EPA was working independently, as it should. One of the reasons it's been slowed down is because of the work they've been doing with us.

So that's where we are specifically on the vulnerability of chemical facilities in this country.

CORZINE: One of the -- sort of, in between a statement and a question -- one of my concerns is is the lowest common denominator issue that can arrive. It is quite possible that some chemical plant facilities or dangerous facilities would follow best practices on ongoing standards. We see that in financial reporting.

RIDGE: We do.

CORZINE: We also see significant elements of our economy that don't always follow the rules and nor are they always taking the public interest into full account.

And one of the reasons that I would ask your thoughts on why you don't think we need legislation in this area when, in fact, we don't always see a consistent pattern to the lowest common denominator, and therefore, the public can have concerns about whether these issues are actually addressed if we don't have statutory responsibility, statutory action.

RIDGE: Senator, I think your concern is certainly well-founded. Because the vulnerability and the prospective damage done to people, life, limb, human damage, property damage, psychological damage because of the vulnerability of our chemical facilities is real.

But having said that, there is also, I think, a different environment post-9/11, an acceptance of -- I'm not going to say across the board, because I don't know yet -- of greater financial responsibility from within the corporate community to enhance their security. They have a lot of reasons to do it.

And one of the interesting things that I think we should continue to work with you on, and one of the legislative means by which we might be able -- maybe not legislative means, but a market-oriented means by which we might be able to affect some of these changes is working with the insurance industry to see that there's a differential -- there's some discussions we've had with the insurance industry based on the recommended protective standards that EPA may put out there saying to a chemical facility, "These are the kinds of things that you need to do." There may be a variation on insurance rates as it relates to their willingness or their ability to affect those changes.

I would say to you, we'd like to avoid legislation, Senator, but we got to see what happens. We got to keep all our options open.

CORZINE: I'm not sure what the downside of the legislation is, but the people are going to perform these roles anyway.

RIDGE: I am not equipped to tell you today the specific recommendations that are going to be made and whether or not they will be fully implemented across the board.

RIDGE: I feel fairly comfortable in telling you that no one is interested in the least common denominator. And there has to be some kind of enforcement mechanism.

We'd like to -- we can do that conversation with you just to see what the enforcement mechanism is. If we can do it without legislation, fine. But I do think, depending on what the recommendations are and the outcome and the acceptance of those recommendations, we're not going to foreclose the legislation. It may be we have to use the stick rather than the carrot.

JEFFORDS: Senator Warner?

WARNER: Thank you.

I'm going to refer to this opening statement, and over here you've got information analysis and infrastructure protection, telecommunications and cyber-security.

First comment on cyber-security: Some three years ago, when I was chairman of the Armed Services Committee, I became quite interested in this subject and the fact that there are very few young people out there seeking the education to equip themselves to go into this complicated, highly technical field.

So I drew up a piece of legislation, it eventually got through the Congress. It set up a program, sort of a first cousin to a GI Bill. If a young person would commit to four years of obligated service working with the Department of Defense, as a civilian, or other agencies, I guess we got down to three in the final analysis, that we would fund fully their program.

And we got it through Congress and I was very pleased and then, all of a sudden, the appropriators cut it down to just $20-some million. Well, that was a bit disappointing, but I renewed the efforts the next year and we finally got it up to double the amount of money. Just that little bit.

All at the same time, the Congress was voting -- now mind you, you've got $20 million for this program, then I think I got up to $40 million -- Congress was voting $8 billion to $9 billion in Pell grants.

So I hope the new secretary begins to look where the money is and put it behind, whether it's cyber-security or the other desperately needed areas of education, to equip the type of people to come in to your organization, not just now but in successive generations. Just a little (inaudible).

RIDGE: Appreciate that, Senator. You should know that that is of concern of the adviser to the president for cyber-security, Dick Clark.

WARNER: He was behind it, too.

RIDGE: Yes. And we've had that conversation and (inaudible) greater action down the road within this Department of Homeland Security. He sees that as a very unique educational niche, but it's also a very critically important security niche, and there just aren't that many men and women interested in going and getting the technical education around securing the Internet. So you have a gap there, and we have to try to fill it.

WARNER: A scholarship program. Because after they've fulfilled their obligated service, there are plenty of jobs out in the private sector. So, it's just a thought.

Second, military bases: No direct reference in your document here to that, but CINCNORTH is the new command that we're creating here in the Congress. Will you be in tight coordination with that officer who will have at his command all of the military assets necessary to respond to an attack on the United States here in the homeland?

RIDGE: Senator, I think first of all, as we take a look at the reorganization effort, we think what Secretary Rumsfeld has recommended adds enormous value to the new Department of Homeland Security to coordinate in advance some of the work it would do if it had to utilize Department of Defense assets.

I think the relationship will not be from the Department of Homeland Security to the general directly, but will be from the civilian level, from the secretary to the secretary.

But the fact of the matter remains is that now that under the unified command plan you do have a North American command, we can sit down with and talk about how we'll use different assets under certain circumstances. It really adds a great deal of enhanced protection and ability to the new Department of Homeland Security.

WARNER: One of that will be interoperability of communications, I hope. You'll have to put a high level of effort there.

I'm going to read from page three, again the same section. "In short, the department would, for the first time, merge" -- now that means bring together all the parts -- "merge under one roof the capability to identify and assess threats to the homeland."

Now at present some of that threat analysis is done in CIA, DIA, FBI. Are those components going to be pulled out of those agencies and merged into yours? What does that word "merge" mean? Are they going to lose their capability? Will there be one structure only in homeland defense, or will there be parallel structures?

RIDGE: Senator, there would be no capacity within the Department of Homeland Security to collect this information. It is not a collection agency.

The merger of the information or intelligence will be the reports and assessments from the CIA, the FBI and the other collection agencies as they relate to domestic terrorism. But the CIA and the FBI and the other agencies will continue their collective function.

Now, of course, Customs, INS, other agencies that, if Congress approves, become part of the Department of Homeland Security, will be in the collection business. But we will, there will be no collection from the CIA or the FBI. They'll just send us over the reports for assessment.

WARNER: I understand that. But the analysis "merge under one roof the capability to identify and assess" -- assess means analysis -- "threats to the homeland."

WARNER: So supposing the director of the CIA has a set of facts, which he shares fully with you. He has one opinion that that doesn't amount to a threat, say, that you have to issue a warning. You feel differently. Director of the FBI may have a somewhat different view. Are you the final arbiter of what's to be done?

RIDGE: I believe at the end of the day, Senator, it's a very appropriate question, because the president wants to retain within the office of the White House an assistant to the president for homeland security to coordinate the efforts among the agencies. And if it ever came to a point where there was an interpretative conflict, where we had Homeland Security looking at the reports and assessments and differing from the CIA or the FBI, I think it would be resolved in that fashion.

Ultimately, at the end of the day, we want to take that information to reduce vulnerabilities. They're using that information to reduce threats. My sense is that, if our assessment of the information says we ought to move to reduce vulnerabilities, we should have our way. But if there is a conflict, obviously, there's a mechanism within the White House to resolve it.

WARNER: All right. Now, what is that mechanism, again, to be?

RIDGE: Ultimately, the tie breaker is the president of the United States. But you try to resolve that before you get there.

WARNER: Yes, but he could well be off somewhere and the vice -- but I understand the command and control there. But it seems to me you got to act quickly. Now, you could have legitimate disagreements, but it's important that it move swiftly, that we not have to all get limousines and roll over to the White House and sit around a table. We've got to do it quickly.

RIDGE: Time is of the essence. You're absolutely right, Senator. And in my experience since October 8th, when I was sworn in, just dealing in a personal way with George Tenet and Bob Mueller, one, there has been a unity of effort. There's been no disagreement as to what should be done or even the application of the facts.

But under those circumstances, I think you can well appreciate the fact that these men and women -- this administration and future administrations lean always toward security because it's an enduring vulnerability. And it's resolved in favor of being -- doing something to make America safer.

WARNER: I think my time's up. Take a look at that sentence.

RIDGE: I will.

WARNER: Because somehow I understood it as you've now stated in this hearing. But somehow this sentence, I began to be puzzled.

Now, you do not deal with cyber-security in this prepared statement for the committee. What is the basic document to which we go to refer for expansion of points you've made in here?

RIDGE: Senator, I'd be pleased to send you up a document that deals specifically with cyber-security. There are...

WARNER: And other items that are not covered here. Is it the president's proposal in the blue cover that came up? Or has that been replaced by a fuller document?

RIDGE: I think there is a fuller document, Senator, that talks about the cyber-agencies that will be moving in -- that we're going to recommend to be moved into the new department. And it'd be my responsibility to make sure that you get it today.

WARNER: Well, that's all right. Thank you very much.

JEFFORDS: Thank you for very excellent questions, Senator Warner.

Senator Wyden?

WYDEN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Governor, as you could tell from my earlier comments, I'm concerned about the whistleblower protections in the proposal. You have cooperated with me in a number of areas and I hope we can get some changes in this area.

It was clear, for example, from what happened with Colleen Rowley that that was absolutely key to getting an urgent set of communications to the top of the FBI. And I read the administration's proposal on the Homeland Security Office to really be a rollback of whistleblower protections. It reads that the secretary of homeland security could choose how, or in effect, whether someone would be able to get the legal protections that are available at other federal agencies. And I think we ought to be strengthening protections with respect to whistleblowers. And I would just like to see if you're open to some changes on this.

I sit on the Intelligence Committee. I'm anxious to work with you on the national security implications. But this is one of the best ways to make sure that the public isn't in the dark and that we protect national security.

RIDGE: Senator, to your point, I would look forward to the opportunity to work with you again for very positive clarifying language gaining the results that we both achieve. And that is making sure that, as we set up this new agency, and as it goes forward, men and women who have some ideas that are eventually critical of how things used to be and have a better idea of how things should be, be, number one, considered patriots all, because their mission is to do whatever they can to enhance security.

I would tell you that earlier today the president addressed about 3,000 men and women from the federal work force. I had the opportunity to speak just briefly before the president ensured them that they will have that protection. And look forward to working with you and your colleagues to see to it that it's consistent with the protection they've enjoyed in the past.

WYDEN: Well, that to me is the bottom line. It seems to me, at a minimum, they ought to have the protections that are available to other federal employees. And if you read the proposal now, this certainly isn't the case the way it reads today. And we do need to work together in a bipartisan way on it.

The other question I want to ask also relates to the public's right to know. And that deals with the Freedom of Information Act exceptions in the legislation. Now, you heard me commend you and your office with respect to the work you've done with us in terms of technology. And it's important we get the ideas from the business community in particular with respect to how to tackle this issue.

But again, I think it goes way too far to create all these additional exemptions from the Freedom of Information Act to make sure that the public has confidence in what the government's doing. I mean, already there is a national security exemption from the Freedom of Information Act.

WYDEN: And I would just like to see, for the record, if we could work with you to again hone down these exemptions, because I think it would be a bad message to be sending right now.

RIDGE: One of the experiences we've had, Senator, dealing primarily with the private sector during the past couple of months, is their reluctance to share proprietary information with regard to their facilities, the security measures, a variety of other things.

And what we were looking for in drafting this legislation -- and of course we want to work with you on it -- is to provide a limited exemption for information that's communicated voluntarily about their own self-assessments of their own facilities. And it's not the kind of information you necessarily want to put on the Internet. You don't necessarily want to show your own weaknesses.

But we do feel that it's important, if we're to have comprehensive look at our critical infrastructure, we need those who are responsible, who have ownership of that infrastructure and responsible for its security as well, to be able to share with us, from their perspective.

We may have a different point of view. We may conclude they haven't gone far enough to respond to that vulnerability. But that is a limited exemption that we're looking for.

And, again, the president sent it up with an idea that we need to work with members of Congress to address those concerns. And we'd welcome the opportunity to try to find language that satisfies your interest and the public's right to know, but also the president's interest and the country's interest not in giving the terrorists a road map to identifying vulnerabilities.

WYDEN: I support that. I only want to note for the record, Governor, that the FBI -- the head of the National Infrastructure Protection Center says that the protections already exist to do what you're talking about. So we've got people in law enforcement who are already saying that the protections exist to get the information from the technology leaders, get the information from the business community, get the information about infrastructure.

And I just want to work with you so that we don't open up, you know, new loopholes. Because if the public's kept in the dark, if whistleblowers don't have existing protections, that's going to make it tougher for us to tackle the terrorists that you're going after and I want to support you on.

RIDGE: Good. Well, we're going to make sure that the whistleblowers have the protection, and we're going to work with you to make sure that the information that's volunteered from the private sector is the kind that should be protected and in doing so protect the broader right of the public to know.

WYDEN: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

JEFFORDS: Senator Clinton?

I'm going to go over and vote and be back. We have another member that wants to participate. So I will exit temporarily and be back.

CLINTON: Tell them that I'm coming, Mr. Chairman.

Governor Ridge, I want to start by thanking you for the extraordinary cooperation that you've provided on behalf of the needs of New York. I greatly appreciate it and I look forward to working with you as we develop and pass this important legislation.

I wanted to go back to a point that Senator Smith made, and that is the Environmental Protection Agency's report which was first reported in the Daily News.

And this, lessons learned in the aftermath of September 11th, 2001, I think is extremely instructive and I hope that we will be getting a full copy of it here in the committee and we'll be able to hold a hearing about it.

I commend the EPA, and I've told Administrator Whitman that the kind of honest assessment which was undertaken by the EPA is exactly the right attitude. And it should serve as a road map for what we need to address going forward.

But it is a little bit daunting to read this honest assessment, because it states, among other things, that, "The EPA is not fully prepared to handle large-scale NBCR attack. Agency information, experience and equipment is insufficient to respond with confidence." Closer to home, with respect to our ground zero air quality experience, the report says, "The dissemination of EPA's health-related sampling results to non-EPA front-line responders was delayed for at least two weeks."

I bring this up because I think that the challenges that the EPA is honestly laid out for itself are not only specific to that agency but will be found to be faced by other agencies that you're about to merge into the department, as well as others, like the FBI and CIA that are staying outside.

And I'm wondering, since the EPA is not being merged, what are the plans for coordinating the specific functions that the EPA currently undertakes with the mission of the new department? How will that be accomplished and what are your plans for making sure it is?

RIDGE: Well, as you know, Senator, the EPA has -- again, is one of those agencies that has many, many missions. And we took a look at the EPA just briefly, but there are just so many other things that it does, felt that its primary mission was not homeland security. I think they do -- they respond to maybe 30,000 chemical spills a year.

But they do have a very important and prominent role to play with us, to play with the Department of Homeland Security. One is the vulnerability assessment, one is the response, one is working with the sectors, the water, the chemical, and the other economic sectors to do -- develop standards of protection.

And, again, this'll be -- could very well be formalized once the new department is established by a memorandum of understanding or an executive order.

RIDGE: But clearly as we go about dealing with the vulnerability assessments and response mechanisms, I think there's just to be a very close, collaborative working relationship.

I can't define it more specifically than that at this date, but I expect that the new secretary of homeland security would try to create, in advance, the kind of working relationship he or she would need in response to an event.

CLINTON: And would it be fair to assume that that will be the same relationship you'll have with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission?

RIDGE: I think it's important, because, as it was noted in the remarks earlier, the new unit, Senator, that has -- matches threats with vulnerabilities will work with these agencies on the protective measures, and maybe look to these agents to use to oversee that the protective measures are done. I mean, we're working with the EPA on the standards of protection for chemical or water plants, work with the NRC for standards of protection on the nuclear facilities we have around the country, work with the DOE where appropriate.

So I think it is the intent of the president that this is the unit that takes a look at the vulnerability, that's information that is passed to this new department by these agencies and through work with the private sector. But then you go back to those agencies. "These are the standards. Are they satisfactory to you? They should be part of the oversight and enforcement mechanism as well." I think that's the collaborative work that we anticipate.

CLINTON: One of my concerns, and you and I have discussed this, Governor, is that our front-line soldiers in this homeland security front are our first responders. And we passed out of our committee the first responder legislation that the administration had requested. I am still, however, concerned that we are not putting enough focus on getting the funds directly to the cities and the counties that are on the front lines.

I understand completely the need for state planning. And, you know, I respect greatly the role of governors and former governors, having a close relationship with one who has served for 12 years. So I know that there are a lot of functions that the state has to undertake.

But I really believe that, at the very least, we need some kind of formula that guarantees dollars end up in the hands of the people on the front lines.

And I also am very concerned that we don't -- we're not giving enough flexibility. Just as the department wants flexibility and the use of personnel and compensation levels, I think this homeland security money that goes to first responders also needs to be more flexible, because as I've traveled around my state, you know, the needs in Buffalo are very different than the needs in Watertown or in New York City. And I believe that we should take that into account with the dollars that the federal government provides and I would hope that we can continue to look at that as a need that is not yet being addressed.

RIDGE: Senator, I would tell you that you echo the concerns -- continuing concerns of our friends who serve as mayors and as county executives and Governor Carper and I, and you know from your personal experience, sometimes there's a little tension between the statehouse and the local communities. And I think we have got it worked out, that a smaller percentage goes directly to the statehouse. And I think the bill that passed out of the committee said a minimum of 75 percent should go to the local communities.

And I understand why the mayors and the county executives and the police and the fire and emergency responders, in a respectful way, once they participated in a plan, they've decided what their priorities are. They don't want that money channeled through the state, so that the state legislature, kind of, undoes the -- unties the plan, goes back in and sets their own priorities rather than the local communities priorities.

So I -- we've made a commitment to work with them and members of Congress who expressed the same concern, that once the bill is passed, once those dollars are out there, once we determine what that percentage is, that within a certain period of time, according to the plan, the money is filed right down to the local communities.

And I think that from a mechanical matter that we can work out, I know you have emphasized it on several occasions with prior conversations and I want to work with you to make sure we get the language to our mutual satisfaction, because we have made the commitment, the president's made the commitment as well.

CLINTON: The only point that I would add to that, Governor, and I'm very grateful for your comments, is that the legislation so far prohibits use for these funds for compensation in any form. And I think that's a mistake.

I think that flexibility needs to be available, whether it's a funding by a governor, a funding by a mayor that can then be held accountable. But the biggest problem we've got in our cities, and again speaking for New York, that are in deficits, a state which is in deficit made much worse because of the attacks on 9/11, is that we need funds that can be used to actually pay our HAZMAT teams. You know, not just equip them and give them better communications, but, you know, make sure that they are going to be out there and deployable.

So again, I just would respectfully request that at least we provide permissive language. Right now it's prohibited and I think that's a mistake. Because I think the flexibility that we want should at least be permissible. Maybe there has to be some requests that goes up to the department by the governor or something, but some mechanism that can trigger that money to be used for personnel as well as other purposes. Thank you.

BLITZER: Another major security concern since September 11th, the nation's nuclear facilities. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton is co-sponsoring legislation that would increase security and emergency readiness. Senator Clinton joins us now from Capitol Hill.

Senator, thanks for joining us. We learned, as you pointed out, that commercial airliners can be weaponized in a very deadly way on September 11th. You're worried that these nuclear power plants around the country can be weaponized in a more deadly manner right now. What steps are you proposing that have to be taken right now to prevent that from occurring?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, Wolf, you're right. I think since September 11th, we've all been asking a lot of hard questions that we never had to even think about before.

And today we were passing out of our committee, the Environment and Public Works Committee, the Nuclear Security Act of 2002 that will increase the security at our nuclear power plants, will really force all of us -- the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, the owners of the plants, those who provide the security -- to go through more intensive training, to look hard at the possibility threats that they face and to come up with answers as to how best to deal with them, to look at the zone that is around nuclear power plants to determine, you know, what needs to be done to improve the safety and security of the people living near nuclear power plants.

I also included an amendment, a Dirty Bomb Prevention Act of 2002, to start keeping track of the radiological material that we use in commercial and academic institutions and hospitals to provide radiation therapy.

So this was a good start. It's not all that perhaps we would wish for, but we came up with a good piece of bipartisan legislation that sends a very clear signal we need to be more attentive to our nuclear power plants.

BLITZER: Is there one or two steps the federal government can take right now, within a few weeks, that will make those nuclear power plants more secure?

CLINTON: You know, Wolf, the nuclear power plants have a very high level of security right now. We also passed out the Chemical Security Act because we have a lot of chemical plants that are not nearly as secure as our nuclear power plants. But when it comes to nuclear power, the chances of a disaster are so huge that we have to do everything we can to prevent it.

And what we're asking for are more regular force-on-force terrorist mock exercises, taking a hard look at every possible threat and coming up with solutions through a federal task force and assigning a federal safety coordinator to each plant. We're doing, I think, what we need to do to provide more security on the ground for these plants.

BLITZER: But Senator, as you well know, those security personnel at those reactors are not even federal employees, and many of them don't necessarily have the training, the background checks that are required. Are you taking steps to change that?

CLINTON: Yes. In fact, we have a new set of requirements for security. We couldn't get them federalized. You know the fight we had over federalizing airport security. My legislation originally called for federalizing nuclear power plant security. We just could not get that done. And so we had to work for a cooperative approach that includes federal security supervisors and teams that will work on the technical expertise that is required.

We also changed some of the laws that exist on the local level by providing overall federal standards for weapons that can be carried and used. So I think we made some real progress today.

But you know, Wolf, there's a lot of work that we still need to do. I heard the earlier program about airport security. It just is shocking to me that we haven't provided all the training that our flight attendants need, that we haven't hardened all the doors into the cockpit, that the, you know, Transportation Security Agency is asking for delays. You know, people need to get with it.

BLITZER: One final question, Senator Clinton. You speak about a "dirty bomb" and making sure terrorists don't get their hands on a dirty bomb. But how concerned -- how realistic is it that they will get some of that radiological equipment and cause that kind of destruction that a dirty bomb potentially could cause?

CLINTON: Well, that's what we're trying to prevent in this legislation, to start keeping better track of where this radiological material is kept and how it's used, trying to make that sure we have some central oversight of all of that.

You know, one of the things we obviously have to worry about is the fear that would be induced by such a radiological explosion that would be triggered by conventional weapons. Now, in fact, it wouldn't cause, in estimates I've seen, a lot of damage to life, but it would cause contamination. It would cause panic. So it's something that we need to be very much aware of.

And what I've spent a lot of my time doing since September 11th, unfortunately, is trying to think like our adversaries. You know, we're a big, free, open, mobile society with a lot of vulnerabilities. We obviously are not going to, you know, put a glass bowl over our country and be scared to move. We've got to keep living our lives. But that means we have to take precautions. And radiological materials, nuclear power plants, chemical plants -- those are all things we need to do better to protect.

BLITZER: Important issues that we have to consider. Senator Clinton, thanks for spending some time with us today.

CLINTON: Thank you. Wolf.

U.S. SENATOR EDWARD KENNEDY (D-MA) HOLDS HEARING ON POLLUTION AND HEALTH, 9/3/2002

CLINTON: Well thank you, Senator Edwards, for calling today's hearing. This is obviously a critically important issue, the connection between human health and changes to the Clean Air Act.

And I think what we're focusing on today is the administration's announcement that it intends to make a number of changes to the part of the Clean Air Act commonly referred to as New Source Review.

I want to thank the witnesses who are here. I've had the pleasure of having Dr. Olden before me, and I respect greatly the work that he does.

And I thank you for coming as well, Mr. Holmstead.

And I particularly want to thank Carol Browner for the work that she did for eight years and the progress that was made under her leadership.

And also Dr. George Thurston of NYU Medical School, who has been part of the ground-breaking research that has really demonstrated clearly the linkage between pollutants in the air we breathe and the quality of our health.

In fact, Dr. Thurston testified before this committee earlier this year with respect to health tracking legislation that I've introduced with Senator Reid of Nevada, and I hope we'll be able to mark that up later this month.

Obviously we now know something we could not prove in 1996. Many of us intuited it, we believed it, but there wasn't the hard and fast proof that Dr. Thurston and other scientists have now provided to us. And that is that there is a linkage between pollution and our health.

Now what does that mean? Well, I think it means that we have a higher level of responsibility than we did in 1996 when we worked on the basis of the best information available.

But, you know, that's what's so wonderful about science, that it provides additional information. Sometimes it debunks beliefs, sometimes it takes what we think and feel and puts it into hard, statistical analysis.

And we now know without doubt, based on these recent studies, some of which go back many years, even pre-'96, but which have come to fruition in the recent months, that there is a correlation between increases in air pollution and increases in hospital admissions, asthma attacks, heart attacks, lung cancer and even premature death.

Now I think that is stunning, and here we are faced with this evidence and to many of us the administration seems to be rushing to implement new rules without adequate attention being paid to these research findings.

Recent epidemiological studies show that human exposure to air pollution increases the risk for heart disease. Exposure to ozone pollution may not only trigger asthma attacks but actually cause asthma in children.

So the biological, epidemiological proof that air pollution not only contributes to but also causes disease is finally one that we cannot ignore, except at our peril.

So the logical thing to do, it seems to me, if we care about our health is to take steps to curb pollution from power plants and from other sources.

And that's why we're here today, because Senator Edwards, myself and others in the Senate, as well as many representatives of medical and academic communities, are concerned about the impacts that the administration's proposals, both with respect to New Source Review and multi-pollutant legislation, will have on human health and the environment.

Now I think all of us are willing to entertain certain reforms in the NSR program; that has to go along with scientific advances. But only in the context of significantly improving our air by curbing emissions.

Now what the administration is doing by rushing to go final on a number of these changes to NSR is to end-run the process. And to make it worse, from our experience to date, the administration cannot definitively tell us what impact these changes to the NSR program will have on air pollution or on human health.

CLINTON: Many of us are also concerned about the administration's 4-P (ph) proposal that we also believe falls short.

And what I am having a hard time understanding, Mr. Holmstead, is that, despite these health studies, despite the fact that they've been published in peer-reviewed, scientific and medical journals since 1996 when the original proposals were made, the administration is still going forward. And I believe there is time for us to take a step back and really consider what it is we are trying to accomplish.

Now, although the administration announced more than two months ago its intention to make changes, nothing has been published in the Federal Register to date. So I would like to take this opportunity to urge the administration to reconsider its position. And at the very least, the administration should allow the opportunity for comment on the final changes it intends to make, so that those changes may be informed by recent scientific findings regarding the public health impacts of air pollution.

As I came in and Senator Edwards was questioning you, Mr. Holmstead, I believe I heard you say that the evidence that you had would be published with the final rule. So that really doesn't do us very much good, does it? Is that, you were going to do this final rule regardless of the evidence, and now you're going to stick in evidence to somehow support the final rule? It sounds a little bit Alice in Wonderlandish to me.

So let me ask you, Mr. Holmstead, what is the harm of allowing additional time for comment on this rule package that you intend to make final? It is apparent that you do not have the analysis that Senator Edwards has asked for. It is obvious now that much has changed since 1996. Every time you go back and say, "Well, this is what it said in 1996," you are, in effect, trying to turn the clock back on scientific research that has been proven in the last month to make the linkage between pollution and health that the original rule was attempting to try to address, but didn't have the scientific basis on which to make that rule change.

So what is the harm of waiting, Mr. Holmstead?

HOLMSTEAD: Let me, first, just agree with you, that we know more now than we knew in 1996 about the health impacts of air pollution. And many of the studies that you referred to that Senator Edwards referred to were studies that were sponsored by EPA. We do understand more, as Dr. Olden and Dr. Thurston and others will talk about, about the health impacts of air pollution and, in particular, the health impacts of fine particles. And as you and I have discussed, by far the single most significant contributor to fine particle pollution is power plants.

And so, I absolutely agree with you. I absolutely agree with Senator Edwards. And I can say on behalf of the administration that we agree that the most important thing we can do to improve air quality is to reduce emissions from power plants. And maybe we can even talk a little more about that.

And I think what North Carolina has done in particular is very commendable, and a very aggressive approach that we laud and support and applaud at EPA.

You asked me about the harm in continuing to wait. The harm is that we will continue to have a program that artificially encourages companies to keep their pollution high. And nothing about that conclusion has changed since 1996. The basic conclusion in 1996 was that these proposals would not impact air pollution levels one way or the other. The NSR program includes many different pieces, and we are only addressing a small portion of that overall program. And so nothing since 1996 really changes that conclusion.

We do know that today there are plants that -- again for reasons that I'm happy to talk about -- have a very strong incentive to keep their emissions high, because the way the program currently works, that's the only way they have flexibility into the future. And we want to remove those disincentives. We want to make the program work in a way that actually gives people the right incentives to install pollution controls, to undertake pollution prevention projects, to use innovative ways to reduce their emissions. And right now, companies that do that are actually penalized under the NSR program. And we really do want to remove those disincentives.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Holmstead, the problem with that -- and I don't disagree with the process that you're describing. But what is bothersome is that you cannot, at this time, tell us that the final proposal will not increase pollution.

HOLMSTEAD: Yes, yes I can.

CLINTON: But you asserted; you cannot prove it. You don't provide any kind of analysis about what the likely effects of these proposed changes would be.

Now I fully agree with the goals that you're setting for us. We all agree with the goals. I fully understand the anomalies within the Clean Air Act that sometimes make it not work as well as we would want it to. And that's why I said that many of us would support appropriate changes.

But, you know, this is the second time you've appeared before us. And I think you can sense some of our frustrations. Because we share the goal, but you're not giving us a process that has any credibility attached to it that we can therefore say with these final rules, "This is a step forward."

And that's why I ask for the administration to perhaps take a deep breath and provide some additional time for comment. Perhaps through that the administration might alter or refine its approach to New Source Review.

But you have to believe it's a little disconcerting to recognize that this was a campaign promise by the president, made regardless of what the scientific evidence was, as a way of demonstrating support for those who, frankly, find compliance burdensome and onerous.

CLINTON: So you've got to recognize that it raises some red flags to many of us. And I would just hope that, in good faith, the administration would want to hear from some of the experts and determine, after a limited period of additional comment, whether there might not be a better way to proceed.

Thank you, Senator Edwards.

"The Early Show," CBS, 9/6/2002

As we mentioned, for the first time in more than 200 years, a joint session of Congress will be held here in New York City today to pay tribute to the victims of 9/11. New York Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Chuck Schumer are already at Federal Hall in Lower Manhattan. Good morning to both of you. It's nice to see you.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning, Jane.

Senator CHARLES SCHUMER (Democrat, New York): Good morning.

CLAYSON: Senator Clinton, let me start with you. Can you tell us, please, what will happen there today at Federal Hall?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Jane, this is a commemorative meeting of Congress. And we're so pleased and honored that since 1790, we haven't had the Congress meet in New York. And we are. We're gathering to recognize and remember. We're going to be coming together to demonstrate the unity of our country, and the great support that Congress has given to New York. So we're just so pleased that leaders of Congress and so many members will be with us today.

CLAYSON: Senator Schumer, today's session is largely ceremonial. Can--can you tell us, in your opinion, why it's so significant for New York City?

Sen. SCHUMER: Well, it's significant because it shows that America remembers. You know, the pain that all of us, as New Yorkers, have--there's probably a day that doesn't go by when I don't think of the image of those planes flying into the towers--is shared by America. And what better way than having the Congress return to this hallowed building, where George Washington took an oath of office and where the Congress first met? So they're coming to show that we care, we remember you, you're not--we're not div--you're not apart from America. You are part of us. And there's not a better way for it to happen. You know, it's great when the president comes, but that's one person, and he can come all the time. We're having the whole Congress come here.

CLAYSON: Let me--let me turn the attention, for a moment, to--to President Bush, who is seeking congressional support for action against Iraq, as you know. Senator Clinton, what will it take to convince you that US forces would be necessary to overthrow a reg--regime in--in Iraq?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Jane, I'm very pleased that the president made his announcement that he will be consulting with Congress. And that process is beginning. All of us are taking this very seriously. No one doubts that the world would be better off if Saddam Hussein and his regime were not in power in Iraq. But we have to look carefully at all of the evidence, and we have to assess the implications and consequences. And that's what we'll be doing in the next week or two.

CLAYSON: Does it bother either of you that most world leaders really don't support our action in Iraq and that we might be taking almost unilateral action, Senator Schumer?

Sen. SCHUMER: Well, it would be a lot better to take it all together. But what the president has to do, Jane, is show--do the same thing he's going to do with the American people to the people of the world. And that is to show the real, compelling danger that Iraq pro--poses to every one of our safety and our freedom. Once he does that, I think that people in America, both Democrats and Republicans, will line up behind him. I think people in the world will line up behind him. But, you know, when you're sending the sons and daughters of America off to war to risk their lives, you want to be sure.

CLAYSON: Well...

Sen. SCHUMER: And so far, the evidence hasn't been presented to either the American people or the citizens of the world.

CLAYSON: Well, weapons inspectors haven't been in Iraq for nearly four years now. But still, they say, they've identified several nuclear-related sites in Iraq where new construction or unexplained changes have taken place recently. Mrs.--Senator Clinton, how much absolute proof do you need that Saddam Hussein has developed or is developing weapons of mass destruction?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Jane, I think we have to wait and see exactly what the evidence is. Obviously, for 10 years now, we've looked carefully and tried to contain Saddam Hussein, and--to try to prevent his acquisition of weapons of mass destruction. There isn't any doubt in anyone's mind that this is a person who's not only trying to, but has in the past used such weapons. But I think all of us want to make sure that the evidence is of a compelling nature, because after all, there are a number of regimes around the world that have done similarly, and some are tremendous threats. North Korea exports the kind of technology that can be used in weapons of mass destruction. So it's not only the action based on the evidence that's going to be presented that we have to make a decision about, it's the consequences and implications. And we have to think through that very carefully.

CLAYSON: Final...

Sen. SCHUMER: Here's the question, Jane. The question is very simple, and that is: How much real danger to Americans walking on these streets of New York and every other city does Saddam pose? And if that danger is real, and if it's--you can't say, 'Well, it's 100 percent certain he'll do something,' but if it's a high percentage, you can't take the risk. But we have to see the evidence, and the American people, when Hillary and I go around New York state, that's what they're asking. They're not saying yes, they're not saying no, but they're saying, 'Show us the facts.'

CLAYSON: We'll have to leave it at that. Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Chuck Schumer, thank you. And good luck today.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you, Jane.

Sen. SCHUMER: Thank you very much, Jane.

CLAYSON: Thank you.

"Inside Politics," CNN, 9/6/2002

Kate mentioned Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. In fact, I talked to her as well today and asked her a little more about what she thinks the real value of a session like this is.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Of course, it has great symbolic and historic significance that the Congress would come back where the Congress started here in New York at Federal Hall, but it's also a very tangible way for New York to say thank you to the Congress and to America, and for members of Congress to see what has been accomplished.

You know, the last time many of them were here was a week after -- or so after September 11. I think it was actually the 20th. And we walked over to the site of such devastation and horror that it was a really hard day. And then of course, the Congress came through and provided the funding that we needed to do the clean-up and remove the debris and take care of a lot of the human needs that we were faced with. And this was a way for the Congress to see what they helped accomplish.

So it's not only is a looking back, if you will, about where we've come from, but I think it's also a way of looking forward, because clearly we are going to need more help. I'm going to be going to my colleagues as the months and years go by, just to make sure they know what our needs are. This makes it very real.

WOODRUFF: Now, much of the focus is continuing to fight the war on terror, on Iraq, on the minds of every member of Congress. Yesterday, your husband, former President Clinton said in California that what President Bush should focus on is not Saddam Hussein right now, but Osama bin Laden. In so many words, he said it was Osama bin Laden who killed 3,000 Americans, not Saddam Hussein, and we should be going after bin Laden. Do you agree with him?

CLINTON: Well, I think the war on terror has a lot of targets, and from my perspective, we have to pursue those who would use weapons of terror against us, no matter who they are or where they are.

Clearly, we have a lot of work still to do in rooting out and eliminating the al Qaeda network, but the president is going to make his case to the Congress and to not only America but the world as to why he believes that Saddam Hussein is also a very significant target in this war on terror. And we are all going to be listening.

The real goal, I think, all of us share is that we do everything necessary to defend our country, to defend Americans and defend freedom-loving people throughout the world, and we have got, unfortunately, some committed, dangerous adversaries, more than one out there.

WOODRUFF: But it sounded as if your husband was saying the president's priorities are not correct, that Osama bin Laden should be first before Saddam.

CLINTON: Well, I think that that's a question a number of members of Congress and people generally raise. We don't know what's happened to bin Laden. We do need to know that. We also need to make sure that the positive mission that our military undertook is a lasting one so that we don't leave a vacuum for terror to grow again in Afghanistan.

But unfortunately in today's world, terrorists have many different locations from which they can strike against the United States, and what we are going to wait and see in the Congress is the case that the administration makes.

One thing we don't want -- and I know that a number of military leaders have been pointing this out -- is to, you know, spread our resources so thin that we are not effective anywhere. So we really have to take this carefully, weigh all the alternatives and act. But I don't think anyone would argue that Osama bin Laden has to remain the number one target, because clearly that's who brought so much destruction and death on this city.

WOODRUFF: Final question. We're INSIDE POLITICS, how actively are you going to be involved in the gubernatorial race? Apparently Carl McCall against George Pataki?

CLINTON: I'm going to be very active. I didn't take a position of endorsement in the primary, because I think I'm better suited to wait until the nominee of our party is chosen. And we have now a nominee, a very able, accomplished nominee, indeed. And we are going to be working as hard as we can to get him elected.

WOODRUFF: So, George Pataki should be defeated?

CLINTON: Well, I think that Carl McCall has a lot to give to New York. And when New Yorkers hear him and know where he stands on the issues and the changes he wants to make, I think this is going to be a real horse race. Stay tuned.

WOODRUFF: All right, Senator Clinton, thank you very much for talking to us.

CLINTON: Thank you, Judy. Appreciate it.

WOODRUFF: Well, not far from Federal Hall where I'm standing, the work of the financial markets went on today.

And for the latest on what happened in today's stock market activity, let's go down to Bertha Coombs. She's on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange -- Bertha.

BERTHA COOMBS, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Hi there, Judy.

Today, in fact, Dennis Hastert and Trent Lott opened the markets. It seemed to be a good omen for the markets. Also, a couple of better-than-expected reports seemed to be just what the doctor ordered for Wall Street this session.

August employment reports showed that the jobless rate dipped to 5.7 percent. That's a five-month low. And tech bellwether Intel trimmed its quarterly sales outlook, but by not by as much as Wall Street had feared. Stocks sprinted out of the gate from the start, with techs leading the pack: the Nasdaq composite 33.5 percent. Shares of Intel added 7 percent after hitting a 52-week low yesterday, while the Dow Jones industrials rose 143 points. And the Standard & Poor's 500 also ended the session higher.

But even with today's run-ups, stocks fell short for the week. The Dow lost more than 2.5 percent. The Nasdaq finished the week down slightly. And the S&P 500 shed nearly 2.5 percent as well.

That's the latest from Wall Street -- more INSIDE POLITICS after the break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

WOODRUFF: I'm here in Midtown Manhattan with House Speaker Dennis Hastert and House Minority Leader Richard Gephardt.

Gentlemen, we're just about a mile and a half, two miles away from ground zero right here.

Mr. Speaker, today's ceremonial session, what does this signify? What do you want to tell people by having held this?

HASTERT: I think, first of all, we want to say that we're in solidarity with the people of New York and the people of Virginia, too, that went through the Pentagon -- but of their extreme courage.

We want to salute, certainly, and commemorate those people who died, but also the great heroes of the city. I think New York, in going through this tragedy, in their coming back and fighting back, really exemplifies the spirit of America. And we want to honor that.

WOODRUFF: Only the second time something like this has ever happened. Was it really something you think that needed to be done?

REP. RICHARD GEPHARDT (D-MO), MINORITY LEADER: I think it's important. This attack on the United States was the largest attack probably in our history, probably since the War of 1812 of the Revolution. So this was an enormous attack. And people are still trying to get over it.

Obviously, the families of the people who were killed are never going to get over this tragedy. We wanted to honor them. We wanted to honor the rescue workers, who -- many of whom also died, and say to the whole country that we're back, that we're united, and we're going to try to fight against terrorism in the days ahead.

WOODRUFF: Speaker Hastert, so you have one day where you have all come together in a spirit of support for the city, the Congress working together. Is there any chance this is going to spill over into any of the other contentious issues before the Congress in the weeks ahead?

You've got spending questions. You've got health care questions. You all are very far apart on some of these issues. Is any of this going to have any effect on the rest of what you do?

HASTERT: Over the years, we have worked together. And, ultimately, we get things done. And I think we will continue to work together. Sometimes we have differences of opinion. That's how we get elected. But we're going to continue to work together.

I think the Congress in the past year has moved a tremendous amount of legislation to try to make our skies safe, to make this country safe, to apprehend terrorists, to do all those things that we've done, extraordinary amount of legislation that we've worked on together.

WOODRUFF: Does it make a difference, one day like this, do you think? Does it help solve any other problems?

GEPHARDT: Well, I think 9/11 has had an impact on all of us. I think we've done pretty well in working together as best we can, in a bipartisan way, to get the things done to respond to this terrorist attack.

We passed lots of legislation in the two or three weeks after 9/11. We are working now on a Homeland Security Department. And it's been a bipartisan consideration. So I told the president on 9/12, "You've got to trust us and we've got to trust you." I think we've done pretty well at that. And we're going to continue to do that. This fight is not over.

WOODRUFF: Speaking of which, Mr. Speaker, the focus now on Iraq, some congressional officials saying this debate, your hearings, could go on into and past the November midterm elections. Is that a timetable you're comfortable with?

HASTERT: We're not sure what the timetable is yet.

But there's a time for talking and then there's a time for action. And I think we're united in saying that we don't want to see this happen again in this country. And we need to do everything we can to protect the people of this nation, so that we don't have this type of terrorism enacted again on the people of the United States. And we'll do everything to stop it.

WOODRUFF: But are you comfortable with the hearings going beyond November 5?

HASTERT: We need to take the case to the Congress and to the American people. And when that case is made, then we'll have the right form of action.

WOODRUFF: You're not answering.

HASTERT: Well, we don't know. We don't know how long it takes.

WOODRUFF: But the president has said he'd like to get it done by early October.

HASTERT: He said he'd like to get it done before Congress leaves.

WOODRUFF: Which will be in October.

HASTERT: We don't know.

WOODRUFF: What are you thinking?

GEPHARDT: I think you have got to take it a day at a time. I don't think we can get ahead of ourselves. We do need hearings. He's going to the United Nations on Tuesday. I don't know what he will say there, but there may be some activity there.

He's calling other countries. He's trying to build a world coalition. So there are other things that could intervene here. But, as the speaker has said, we need to do what it's Congress' responsibility to do. A lot of us said to the president, "You need to come to the Congress." Well, he's done that now. And I'm glad he did that. We need to do our part and we need to do it in a responsible and successful way.

WOODRUFF: How much of a factor will Iraq be in these midterm elections, Mr. Speaker?

Iraq and what we were doing here today is beyond politics. We need to stand together and do the right thing. I don't know what the consequences are for the midterm election. We need to do the right thing for the security of this country. And I think Dick Gephardt and I both agree. Politics doesn't have anything to do with this.

WOODRUFF: And yet, for the Democrats, Mr. Gephardt, if the Democrats aren't able to talk about some of the issues that you've said are important -- the economy, prescription drugs, and so on -- if the debate is all about Iraq, how do Democrats get their message out?

GEPHARDT: Well, we're going to continue to talk about all the domestic issues. And I'm sure the Republicans will, too. Those are issues that are important to the American people. And we need to be heard on those. Those differences still exist. And those will be sorted out in the election.

At the same time, we need to put politics aside to deal with these issues. We've got to do the right thing for the American people. These are life-and-death issues. Our highest responsibility is to keep the people of this country safe. We simply cannot have another attack, certainly, with weapons of mass destruction, against the American people. We've got to prevent that, if it's humanly possible. And the only way to do that is to put politics aside and do what you think is right.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WOODRUFF: Talking with House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Minority Leader Dick Gephardt.

As you've been hearing, the events of this day more significant because we're so close to ground zero and so close to the humble beginnings of this country.

Here's CNN's Bruce Morton.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BRUCE MORTON, CNN NATIONAL CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): The first Congress met in New York, not where they're meeting today, but in this building, remodeled in 1789 by Pierre L'Enfant after the Continental Congress had used it.

The Senate was upstairs. It is still called the Upper House, behind closed doors, the house downstairs with room for visitors. This is an artist's impression of the Senate session, another of President Washington being sworn in. It took some members from the South and West a month to reach New York. They didn't stay long.

DONALD RITCHIE, SENATE HISTORIAN: They finally started the House on April 1 and started the Senate on April 6, 1789. And then they stayed there until August of 1790, so just about a year and a half.

MORTON: Then they moved to Philadelphia -- that building is still standing -- for 10 years. It was a deal, of course. The South would help the Northern states' debt and the government would move to the Potomac.

RITCHIE: George Washington picked the site, not surprisingly about 20 miles from where his home was. And he had hoped that this would help to improve commerce of the states of Virginia and Maryland.

MORTON: Philadelphia hoped Congress would love it and want to stay. Would our national dish be Philly cheese steak if they had? But a deal was a deal. And they came to Washington, which looked nothing like the way it looks today.

RITCHIE: Just part of the Capitol Building, the White House and a few other federal buildings were open in 1800. They still moved down there. And the congressmen sorely missed the amenities of Philadelphia and of New York. They lived in very rudimentary boarding houses. And they complained bitterly for years, in fact for decades, about how primitive Washington was as a site for a capital.

MORTON: But they stayed, stayed when the British were burning the city during the War of 1812, stayed ever since, with two exceptions: Congress held a session in Philadelphia in 1987 to celebrate the bicentennial of the Constitution, and in New York today.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE (singing): ... that our flag was still there.

MORTON: Bruce Morton, CNN, Washington.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WOODRUFF: Meanwhile, we want you know we're still waiting for that second verdict in that Florida murder trial involving two young boys. It will be coming down around the top of the hour.

But, next, we will head to New Jersey, where a Republican candidate says he smells blood. Plus: Senate hopeful Elizabeth Dole kicking up controversy over her role as a poster girl of sorts.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WOODRUFF: While many senators gathered here today in New York City to remember September the 11th, Democrat Robert Torricelli stayed home in New Jersey to campaign. Exactly 60 days before the November election, Torricelli's bid to get reelected remains shaken by questions about his ethics.

Here now: CNN's Brian Palmer in New Jersey.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

DOUGLAS FORRESTER (R), NEW JERSEY SENATORIAL CANDIDATE: Bob Torricelli has managed to step in it this time with regard to the Superfund and accusing me of being indifferent.

BRIAN PALMER, CNN CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): Doug Forrester smells blood, attacking Bob Torricelli's record at a Northern New Jersey toxic waste site. Torricelli supporters showed up to defend their man.

TOM RICHARDS, MAYWOOD CITY COUNCILMAN: Congressman Torricelli at the time grabbed hold of the reins and made an effort, a successful effort, to clean up the homes in Maywood.

PALMER: The powerful incumbent Torricelli is on the defensive, dead even in recent polls with the political unknown Forrester. Torricelli has been hobbled by a Senate Ethics Committee admonishment for using poor judgment in taking gifts from a donor in 1998.

SEN. ROBERT TORRICELLI (D), NEW JERSEY: I agree with the committee's conclusions, fully accept their findings, and take full personal responsibility.

PALMER: That apology isn't enough for Forrester, who has blasted Torricelli throughout the bitter campaign, as he did Thursday in their first TV debate.

FORRESTER: Mr. Torricelli is a repeat offender. Do you realize that he is the only member of Congress in U.S. history to be hauled in before the Ethics Committee in both the House and the Senate?

TORRICELLI: I have tried the very best I can to be accountable on this item. I've said there were mistakes. I've said there were misjudgments. It's really the best I can do. All I can do is, with the record that is now present where I made these mistakes, is ask people to consider all the other things that I have done in life.

PALMER: But the man known as "The Torch" is not just playing defense, attacking Forrester for his conservative politics, his lack of experience in elected office, and lumping the business executive with greedy CEOs.

TORRICELLI: Who is Doug Forrester? He won't release his income taxes, how he went from a middle manager in state government, sold political contacts, and made $50 million to $100 million selling overpriced prescription drugs in eight years.

PALMER: This race is much bigger than New Jersey.

INGRID REED, EAGLETON INSTITUTE, RUTGERS UNIVERSITY: This is one of a few close races that will mean the balance in the Senate. Right now, there is one vote between Democrats and Republicans. And this campaign could make the difference.

PALMER: The national parties have lined up behind their candidates.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, AD)

NARRATOR: Torricelli has a 100 percent pro-choice rating. Forrester would cut Medicaid-funded abortions for victims of rape and incest.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, AD)

NARRATOR: Bob Torricelli thinks New Jersey will tolerate lies and corruption. Call Bob Torricelli. Tell him we won't.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

PALMER: With so much money flowing into the race and so much riding on its outcome, the eight weeks between now and the election promise to be long and tense.

Brian Palmer, CNN, New Brunswick, New Jersey.

WOODRUFF: Meanwhile, in Rhode Island, the mayor of Providence, Buddy Cianci, was sentenced today to five years in prison for corrupting city hall. The 61-year-old Cianci says he plans to appeal. The judge described the colorful longtime mayor as a Jekyll-and-Hyde character who corrupted Providence's government even as he helped resurrect the city. About an hour after the sentencing, City Council President John Lombardi was sworn in to serve out the remainder of Cianci's term, which ends in January.

The "Political Play of the Week" is coming up next. Find out why raining on someone's parade helped one political figure shine.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WOODRUFF: Unfortunately, our Bill Schneider is not here with us today in New York, but Bill has Big Apple politics on his mind -- Bill.

WILLIAM SCHNEIDER, CNN SR. POLITICAL ANALYST: Well, Judy as you know, New York respects clout and it respects politicians who have clout.

This week, a New York politician showed clout without even voicing an opinion. That's unusual for a New York "Political Play of the Week."

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

(voice-over): It was all set up. New York Democrats were supposed to nominate their first African-American candidate for governor this year, state Comptroller Carl McCall.

MICHAEL TOMASKY, "NEW YORK": It was pretty much wired for Carl McCall from the start.

SCHNEIDER: Then Andrew Cuomo, son of the former governor and member of President Clinton's Cabinet, got into the race. The whole New York Democratic establishment, including Senator Chuck Schumer, got behind McCall. That put New York's other Democratic senator, Hillary Clinton, on the spot.

TOMASKY: As the race wore on, pressure from black political leaders, particularly, mounted on her to make some gesture in behalf of Carl McCall, if not an actual formal endorsement.

SCHNEIDER: What to do? The polls gave Senator Clinton an opening. They showed Cuomo falling way behind. Pressure grew for Cuomo to pull out. Last Friday, Senator Clinton and her husband showed up at the New York State Fair.

CLINTON: We dream about this sandwich all year long.

SCHNEIDER: Andrew Cuomo was at the fair, too. But somehow, the Clintons never managed to connect with him. Hmm.

Monday: the West Indian American Labor Day Parade in Brooklyn. Senator Clinton was there. So was Carl McCall. It was raining. The senator needed an umbrella. Somehow she managed to connect with McCall.

CARL MCCALL (D), NEW YORK GUBERNATORIAL CANDIDATE: I think I had a very big umbrella. And Hillary Clinton wanted to be under my umbrella to be protected from the rain.

SCHNEIDER: Cuomo got the message. The next day, he pulled out of the race, sparing his party a divisive primary.

ANDREW CUOMO (D), FORMER NEW YORK GUBERNATORIAL CANDIDATE: If we were to now spend $2 million this week on an acrimonious campaign, we would only guarantee a bloody and broke Democratic nominee, whoever won.

SCHNEIDER: How bitter could it have gotten? Cuomo told a "New York Times" columnist, "I believe in my heart that, if I did a negative ad, I would have won." A frustrated Cuomo added: "How could I go against Carl McCall? How could you do that? Don't you like black people? Aren't you a progressive? Aren't you a liberal, you young, arrogant SOB?"

It looks like the campaign ended just in time.

TOMASKY: This is the first race, really, in which she, as a sitting senator, could deliver an endorsement that carried a lot of weight and meant something.

SCHNEIDER: Yes, it did. It meant disaster was averted for the senator and her party. It meant the "Political Play of the Week."

(END VIDEOTAPE)

SCHNEIDER: And, Judy, for the record, this is the first "Political Play of the Week" accomplished through the skillful use of a strategic umbrella.

(LAUGHTER)

WOODRUFF: There are all sorts of umbrellas.

Thank you, Bill.

SCHNEIDER: Sure.

WOODRUFF: We appreciate it.

That's it for INSIDE POLITICS this Friday, September 6. We thank you for joining us. I'm Judy Woodruff in New York City.

And I'm going to turn it over to "WOLF BLITZER REPORTS" next.

"CNN American Morning with Paula Zahn," CNN, 9/6/2002

PAULA ZAHN, CNN ANCHOR: In New York, symbolism is the order of the day as Congress hits the road. A ceremonial session will be held in New York a little bit later today in the shadow of ground zero to commemorate 9/11.

Congress met here in 1789 then moved to Philadelphia in 1790 and Federal Hall is in lower Manhattan. It is on the same site where George Washington took the oath of office.

And New York Senators Hillary Clinton and Charles Schumer join us this morning from that historic location.

Good to see both of you. Welcome.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Thank you, Paula.

SEN. CHARLES SCHUMER (D), NEW YORK: Good morning. Good morning, Paula.

ZAHN: We want to talk a little New York right off the top. Since September 11, some $21 billion in aid has been promised to the city. Has it come through, Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Yes, it has.

SCHUMER: Yes, it really has. You know, Paula, the president, the Congress really rallied behind New York. And we have needs that are enormous, as anyone who comes down here can see. Some are visible, the destroyed buildings and infrastructure. Some are not visible, the people who really need to be healed and mended in different ways.

But America has stuck behind New York and we are extremely appreciative and grateful. The Congress, both Democrats and Republicans, the president, he's of a different party than we are, but we give him credit for stepping up to the plate and helping us. So, we're probably going to need more help in some ways we don't even know. But the fact that the Congress has come here, over 300 members, shows they haven't forgotten us in any way.

ZAHN: Senator Clinton, do you have any concerns as the city moves towards that one year marker and you have the president coming to town? You've got members of Congress here, a lot at stake over the next five, six days, the meeting of the general assembly of the U.N.

CLINTON: Well, Paula, obviously I have concerns. But I'm also very confident in the preparations and planning and the expertise and competence of our city and our police, our fire, our emergency responders. We're living with a heightened state of vigilance today in New York and throughout America, which we have to. But there isn't any place in the world like New York.

We had a great celebration last night in Times Square to kick off the football season. We've got the Congress coming today. We're going to have many, many ceremonies, culminating in a day long series of incredible events to remember and not only look backwards, but look forwards on the 11th.

I think that the country and the world will once again be very proud and impressed by New York and New Yorkers.

SCHUMER: You know, Paula, just one little note. They ask New Yorkers in a survey every year, do you intend to be in New York five years from now, knowing we're a city for people who have come from all over the country, all over the world. Before 9/11, about 55 percent would say yes. Since 9/11, 75 percent say yes. I think that's the spirit of New York.

ZAHN: As a diehard New Yorker, I'm thrilled to hear that. On to the issue of Iraq and the debate over what course of action the U.S. should or should not take. I wanted to share with both of you something that the former president, President Clinton, had to say in giving a little advice to President Bush, saying that we really need to move slowly here.

Let's listen to what he's had to say the other night on CNN.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Tomorrow I'm calling leaders in Russia, China and France to talk about the threats that face us all. I will see Tony Blair on Saturday. I will see Jean Chretien on Monday. My point to you is not only will I consult with Congress and talk to Congress, my administration and I will do so, I will also see many of the leaders of the world and remind them of the facts.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

ZAHN: Well, guess what, Senators? We got the wrong president. I was, in fact, referring to Senator Clinton's husband, Bill Clinton, and basically he said looking at it from the outside it seems to me that we have maximum incentive now for him not to use these weapons and not to give them to anybody because he knows all of America is ready to go after him and would if he had done that.

Do you agree with the president's sentiments there, Mr. Schumer?

SCHUMER: Well, you know, I think that the, President Bush in the last while has slowed things down a little bit. Instead of just saying well, we have some secret information and we think we have to go to war and then these leaks to the newspapers of tactics, we'll invade Iraq from the northwest corner. That frightened the American people and the world.

I think Americans are willing to, we're willing to defend ourselves and we're willing to go to war if there's a compelling danger to the people here in America from Saddam Hussein. But the president has to lay that out. He has to lay it out to the Congress, but just as importantly, to the American people and he also has to lay it out to the people of the world. Leaders like Tony Blair, Berlusconi of Italy, many of the others want to be with us, but their publics are asking them the same question, that is, why do we have to do this?

You don't go to war casually. And if the president lays out a compelling case, my guess is he'll have the support, certainly of the Congress, both Democrats and Republicans, but also of the world. But he has yet to do that.

It's good that he's going to the U.N. It's good that he said on your clip there that he was going to talk to the leaders of the world. He may have to do what President Reagan did and visit the countries of the world and lay out America's case. And if it's a compelling case, I think the world will join us in trying to deal with Saddam Hussein.

ZAHN: What are the chances, Senator Clinton, that Congress will give the president support to go into Iraq before the midterm elections?

CLINTON: Well, Paula, I think what Chuck just said is absolutely on target. The president is starting the consultative process now with Congress, with our allies and with the American and international public. We're going to be involved in that process. All of us take very seriously the threat that Saddam Hussein poses to the region and the world. Clearly, a regime change would be in the best interests of the Iraqi people as well as the international community.

We want to look at the evidence. We want to understand the planning. We want to really analyze the consequences and implications. But I really am pleased that the president announced this week that that's exactly what he's going to be doing. And we're going to be listening and watching very carefully.

ZAHN: Senator Schumer, a final question. A number of Democrats thought they got singed by the public when they didn't go with the first President Bush on efforts to get involved with Desert Storm. How much does that enter into the equation this time around?

SCHUMER: Well, I don't think very much. I think that you have to vote your conscience and you have to vote what the right thing is. It's an awesome decision to tell, particularly if you don't have young men and young women yourself in the armed forces, children -- I don't, my daughters are too young -- to say OK, we're going to put those people in harm's way. We're willing to do it. One of the beauties of America is we've been willing to do it every time our safety is at stake. But you don't do it casually.

So I think that everyone is going to be careful. And I'll tell you, in the meetings that I've been to, public and particularly private, Republican senators have expressed more objection than Democratic senators thus far. I don't think there's a partisan divide on this issue, quite interestingly.

ZAHN: Senator Clinton, we've just got about 10 seconds left. A final thought this morning on, once again, what you want Americans to think about when we see more than half of the Congress convene in downtown New York.

CLINTON: Well, Paula, I want Americans to know how grateful New York is for all of the help and support that we've received in the last year. The Congress has come through. The president has come through. But they've done so on behalf of our nation and we're very grateful. We're probably going to need more help. This was a tremendous blow to the economy, to lives. We have to rebuild. But I think anyone who comes here knows that we're on the right path and we're going to get it done and we appreciate all the support and the continuing prayers that we get from around our country.

ZAHN: Well, we thank both of you for joining us this morning. Senator Clinton, Senator Schumer, again, thanks for your time and good luck down there later on this morning.

CLINTON: Thank you, Paula.

SCHUMER: Thanks, Paula.

ZAHN: Appreciate it.

"Face the Nation," CBS, 9/8/2002

And we're back now with our expanded edition of FACE THE NATION. Gloria Borger is standing by at ground zero in New York this morning. With her is Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. Gloria.

GLORIA BORGER (CBS News): Thanks, Bob.

Senator Clinton and I are actually here at the Verizon Building, which is right across the street from ground zero, and even on a Sunday morning, Bob, the work is continuing here.

And, Senator Clinton, I guess I just have to ask you, one year later, being back here at ground zero, your thoughts.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Well, Gloria, as you were pointing out to me, you look back at this site and the enormity of it is more than television can capture. I thought that the first time I came down on September the 12th to see the extraordinary devastation and yet no one thought we would be ahead of schedule and below budget in the clean-up effort and so many people deserve the gratitude of all of us for the rescue and recovery and the clean-up work which is going on as we speak, right behind us.

BORGER: Right. Now Congress had come through with the $20 billion that you asked for.

Sen. CLINTON: That's right. $21.4, actually.

BORGER: OK. That you asked for for the cleanup here.

Sen. CLINTON: That's right.

BORGER: Is that going to be enough, Senator, for New York?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Gloria, probably not. But we're very grateful for what we've received from the president and the Congress, and it has enabled us to move forward, not only on the physical cleanup and the rebuilding, but on a lot of the human costs that have to be paid, and there are so many people who lost somebody or who are grievously injured, who are still coping with that, people who still don't have a job and aren't back in their apartments yet. So we have a lot of work ahead of us but I am so grateful on behalf of New York to thank all of America for what has been done.

BORGER: One year later, the talk, as we heard with Senator--with Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld and--and Bob has talked war in Iraq. This morning's New York Times reports that Iraq has been busy this past year, trying to purchase equipment to make nuclear weapons. There's also talk that Iraq has the capacity to build and deliver chemical weapons. Is that enough for you to vote to authorize the use of force against Iraq?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, Gloria, I think the goal that we all share to remove this regime that does absolutely pose a threat, now or in the future, is one that I fully subscribe to. And I'm looking forward to the president coming before the American people Wednesday night, going before the United Nations on Thursday, to make the best case possible because I--I think what we want is not only a shared goal, but an understanding of the means and the level of commitment. And I heard Secretary Rumsfeld out--outline some of the grave concerns that he has spoken to, which I share. I don't...

BORGER: But have you heard enough yet?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, we're--we're hearing more. You know, as it comes along, more information is put out. And we have to evaluate it carefully. But we also have to know what exactly the intentions are, militarily; who will go with us. And I'm hoping that we'll have more support than just our very good friend, Tony Blair. What our potential intended consequences are as well, how we hope to be able to pursue our mission in Afghanistan at the same time, which I think is still critical. So there's a--there's a lot of unanswered questions that we're in the process now of answering.

BORGER: What if we had to go it alone, Senator?

Sen. CLINTON: If it were the right thing to do, we would do it. There's no doubt in my mind. And I would support it.

BORGER: Now you talk about finishing the work in Afghanistan, and last week, former President Clinton said that we ought to go after Osama bin Laden first and then we ought to go after Saddam Hussein. Is--is that what you think?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think there are a number of priorities in the war against terrorism. Obviously, here in New York, our priority has been our nation's priority, which is to root out and eliminate the terrorist network. And we also have to be very careful that Afghanistan doesn't implode and create a vacuum in which terrorists can once again flourish. That has been our nation's policy ever since September the 11th, and I don't want anything to take away from that emphasis. Now I believe we can do more than one thing at a time, but we also have to be extremely cognizant of the fact that these terrorists are determined adversaries, and we have to be sure that we do not, in any way, slack on our effort to get rid of them.

BORGER: The vice president said this morning that he would like a vote in the Congress authorizing the use of force or something like that before Congress leaves in October, before the elections. Will that be something you would be willing to give him, a vote?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think that we do need a vote. The timing on it is something that I leave to the administration, the leadership to work out.

BORGER: And I guess one last question, Senator, as--as we sit here and we look out over ground zero, I'd like to know your thoughts about what you think should be here to memorialize September 11th?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, Gloria, I wish I had the imagination and expertise of an architect or a designer or an artist to be able to describe it. I know that I want a memorial that stands the test of time, that will not only remind us of what happened, but continue to uplift our spirits and pay homage to the lives that were lost and the values of America that they were lost for. I'd like to see a life that once again brings people down here. You know, performing space and cultural destinations, retail and residential and a school and the sound of children, as well as commerce. This was a thriving neighborhood.

You know, when some of my colleagues came down with me about a week after, they were surprised to learn that people lived here. Children went to school here. They rode their bikes around the World Trade Center. So we want it, once again, to demonstrate the reality that New York is the global financial capital of the world. But we also want it to be a place where people raise their children, where tourists come to have a moment of silence and where all of us know that life has returned which in many ways is the best tribute we could pay to those who were lost.

BORGER: Thank you very much. Thanks for coming here today. Thanks for being with us, Senator Clinton. And we go back to you in Washington, Bob.

SCHIEFFER: Thank you very much, Gloria. And thank you, Senator Clinton. We'll continue with our expanded edition of FACE THE NATION after a short break.

President GEORGE W. BUSH: (From September 2001) I can hear you. The rest of the world hears you and the people--and the people who knocked these buildings down will hear all of us soon.

(Announcements)

CEREMONY FOR SMITHSONIAN EXHIBIT ABOUT SEPTEMBER 11, 9/10/2002

FIRST LADY LAURA BUSH, RUDOLPH GIULIANI AND SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON PARTICIPATE IN DEDICATION CEREMONY FOR SMITHSONIAN EXHIBIT ABOUT SEPTEMBER 11

CLINTON: Thank you, Secretary Powell. And I know that our country is grateful for your years of dedicated service in both your military leadership and now your civilian leadership. And we're very grateful and thankful for your leadership and guidance today.

It is such an honor for me to be here with Mrs. Bush to open formally this deeply moving exhibit. And on behalf of all New Yorkers, I, too, want to thank our first lady for the extraordinary grace that she has demonstrated and the service that she has performed in so many ways, but particularly with respect to the words that she has spoken and the example she has set so that all of us have a better idea of how to comfort and help our children.

And I'm very grateful for her leadership. And I want personally to thank her, knowing a little bit about the position she found herself in, and being very impressed with the wonderful job that she's doing for all of America.

Thank you, Mrs. Bush.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, the Smithsonian really is the guardian of our cherished memories, our artifacts, our icons. It has been a place that through our country's history has not only responded, but has helped to shape how we think about ourselves, who we are, where we've come from, where we're headed.

CLINTON: And I want to thank everyone associated with this exhibit. I particularly appreciate the leadership of Lawrence Small (ph) and Mark Pacter (ph) and Sheila Burke, but to all of the curators, all of those who donated to make this exhibit possible. This was an extraordinary gesture that will be seen and felt and remembered by so many Americans.

In this audience today are people who were there at the Pentagon, people who were there at the World Trade Center, people who lost loved ones in those terrible attacks when the airplanes hit our cherished places of commerce and government and crashed because of our heroes' efforts in the fields of Pennsylvania.

And to each of you, I thank you for being willing to share your memories and to look forward, because this is not just an exhibit about the past. It does honor the past, but it calls on each of us to think deeply about what it means to be an American at the beginning of the 21st century.

Each of the objects, the photographs, are certainly part of that tragic day in our history. The personal stories, the piece from the facade of the Pentagon, an empty Navy uniform, the photographs of rescue workers in Virginia, New York and Pennsylvania, the squeegee that was used to save lives opening an elevator, the shoes taken off so that someone could run for safety.

These objects alone might be significant to the person who donated them, but together they form such a poignant picture of what all of us remember and many experienced on that terrible day.

Yes, it was a day marked by unspeakable tragedy, but what we are really honoring today was not just the courage and the heroism shown by the rescuers, but by so many Americans, along with the countless acts of generosity and kindness, a day when a calculated effort of evil was answered by Americans' instinctual need and desire to do good. And that's exactly why the terrorists will never win.

This museum is the perfect setting for such a powerful exhibit, and as you tour this exhibit, as you stop before the pictures, as you think about the individuals who are depicted there and so many more who have already come as family members and who will come to leave their remembrances, I know that, like I, as I first walked through it, the power of it will overwhelm your emotions.

These artifacts in this great museum remind us of what it means to have the blessings of liberty and freedom, to be able to make the choices that we think are right for ourselves and our children.

On that terrible day, some people made the choice to run toward danger. Some people went far above the call to duty. Some people paid the ultimate sacrifice with the loss of their lives. Some suffered grievous injuries that are still preventing them from being with loved ones or resuming the normal activities of everyday life.

But this exhibit will make sure that we never forget the sacrifice that so many paid, who were going about their daily business as American citizens, who were, of course, the target of the terrorist attack, but who, more than that, symbolized the resilience of this great nation.

CLINTON: Among those people who paid the highest price was the Fire Department of New York City. I've been privileged and honored to meet so many of the firefighters in this last year, to talk with them, to listen to them, to try to help in whatever way I could, getting the resources that were needed to tend to physical and emotional challenges. And I always come away inspired, and frankly, in awe.

It's now my honor to introduce one of these firefighters to you. Chief Joseph Pfeifer was the first New York City Fire Department battalion chief to arrive at ground zero. Chief Pfeifer that day was on a routine call about a gas leak. As he stood on the streets of lower Manhattan, he and his men watched as the first plane struck the north tower. Then he did what all firefighters do. He rushed to the scene to help and to save lives.

On that terrible day, his brother lost his life. Chief Pfeifer's heroism and sacrifice represents the best that New York and America has to offer.

CLINTON: Please join me in welcoming a genuine hero, Chief Joseph Pfeifer.

(APPLAUSE)

"Larry King Live," CNN, 9/11/2002

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Oh Larry, it was such an emotional moment. You know, I read the names with a man who lost his brother. And we stood there together, and I was looking out at that crowd and I recognized some of the faces.

But so many of the people were holding pictures of their loved one, or they had a button with his face on, or -- It was a real time to just think about the losses that we suffered last year. It was so overwhelming, still, to realize that a year ago these hundreds and thousands of people just got up on a beautiful September morning to go to work, and were just murdered.

KING: Did you watch the president's speech?

CLINTON: I didn't get to see it, but I heard about it. And I heard it was extremely effective, very wonderful message for the country to have. A real sense of our unity and purpose with of course, the unbeatable backdrop of the Statue of Liberty right there on Ellis Island.

KING: What's the year been like for you?

CLINTON: It's been a year of extraordinary pressures and stresses, because of the -- and losses that we suffered here. So many people who, not only lost their family members, their colleagues, their friends, people who were still grievously injured, people who have lost their jobs and haven't gotten them back. People still don't have their apartments back to live in. That great huge hole in the heart of the city, that reminds us what happened every single day. And you know, all the holes in the hearts of so many New Yorkers.

I mean, I was honored to represent New York when I was elected, and every single day I felt so privileged. But this brought home the sense of the responsibility and the greatness of this place.

KING: Did any of their reaction, this city, your adopted city, surprise you?

CLINTON: No. No. You know, we never know what any of us will do until we're tested.

KING: Never know.

CLINTON: You could sit and talk big, and you can expect, you know, what might happen, but you don't really know. I don't know that any city in the world could have responded as magnificently as New York did. I have no doubt that our firefighters and police officers and emergency workers saved literally thousands of lives.

But in addition to the heroism and the bravery that we know about, there were countless other acts that we're only learning about still, people who aren't here to tell them for themselves. We also knew of, and learned of, so many acts of kindness and generosity. It wasn't just the heroism. It was the every day act of taking care of each other.

KING: Are you supportive of the president's homeland security concept and all that's occurred in that area since?

CLINTON: I certainly am. You know, back, I think, early November of last year, I proposed legislation to get money where it's needed, which is to the front-line soldiers who defend us here at home. We've done a great job getting resources to our men and women in uniform and our military, and they're doing magnificently.

I don't think we've done enough yet for our firefighters and police officers and others. We need to make sure that they get the resources they need to be able to do the job we're expecting them to do. There's a lot of work to be done. People ask me all the time, well, are we safer, senator?

Yes. I think we are. I think we are safer. Are we as safe as we can be or should be? Not yet.

KING: Did you like the idea of reorganization in one head office?

CLINTON: Well, I think that there's some benefits to be gained. But it is going to be hard to merge all the different agencies together. A lot of people who studied this problem say that it's something we need to do, and I do support it.

But I don't think we should think it's a panacea. It is going take a lot of hard work to break down these bureaucratic barriers, to get people to be more efficient. We don't even have a modern computer system in the government.

You know, one of the reasons we had some of the problems is that we didn't pay for and install in the government the kind of computer capacity that most businesses of any size have today in America. And they don't talk to each other, they don't share information with each other. Yes, some of it is because before last year we didn't think we needed to do that.

You know, if you and I had been talking on September 10 last year and I would have said, you know Larry, I think we need to stop everybody as they go on the airlines; in fact, we need to ask them to take their shoes off, you would have looked at me like I was crazy.

We are now willing to do things, and that includes reorganizing our government, giving our front-line defenders the resources they need, and getting up to speed with the equipment and infrastructure that's required.

KING: In the aftermath of this, we have Iraq looming, and where does Senator Clinton stand?

CLINTON: Well, I stand with the majority of my colleagues right now, in recognizing and acknowledging that Saddam Hussein and weapons of mass destruction should not be said in the same sentence. We have to separate him from the capacity to obtain and use such terrible weaponry against his neighbors or anyone in the world. It is also important to try to do this with some international support.

Not because we needed it militarily. We have the strongest military in the world. We've proved that time and time again -- Bosnia, Kosovo, Afghanistan. If we have a mission that is clear, we can fulfill it.

But we have to be wary of the unintended consequences of military action. We have to make sure that, you know, our allies in the region are willing to stand with us, both for logistical and strategic reasons, but also because after the fact, we have got to have support to, you know, do what's needed.

KING: Are you open to listening to the president's point?

CLINTON: Absolutely. In fact, I'm very pleased that he's going to go to United Nations tomorrow. We're all open and we're really waiting for the president and the administration, both to lay out their case in more specifics. And to lay out their strategy, so we can ask some of the questions that need to be asked.

KING: Is it essential that Osama bin Laden's whereabouts, or if there's an "about," be known?

CLINTON: What's essential is that we continue the eradication of the al Qaeda network. If he is still alive, and if he is functioning, then it's essential that we prevent him from masterminding any other terrorist actions.

But this network is bigger than one man. He has been the key to it. I mean, he's really been the driving force and charismatic leader. I don't like the idea that he may still be at large. That doesn't make me comfortable.

But we also have demonstrated our ability to roll up some of the terrorist cells, to obtain information, to act on that information. So eventually, I hope we know what's happened to him, if he's still alive. I hope we're able to, you know, bring a end to his ability to lead this network.

KING: Were you surprised on this program last week, when your husband said was consumed by Osama bin Laden?

CLINTON: No, I'm not surprised at all, because I saw it firsthand.

You know, we can look back now and say, well, why, before September 11 of last year, you know, didn't we know more, do more, find out how we can prevent this? And certainly, everyone I know in this administration, the prior administration, going back years is an expert now at saying, what if this, what if that?

But the fact is that we were able to do some things, but we didn't have the international support. We didn't have the commitment as a nation to really make this the priority it needs to be. And September 11 changed so many things.

KING: Couple of other things. How do you think Laura Bush is doing?

CLINTON: Oh, fabulously. You know, I'm very impressed by the way she has helped to pull the country together. Her emphasis on what we need to do for our children is exactly right. She and I were together yesterday at the Smithsonian for the opening of the exhibition that the Smithsonian has put together about 9/11, and I'm very impressed and, you know, very grateful to her.

KING: Anything surprised you about being in the Senate?

CLINTON: Oh my gosh. Well, before September 11, what was most difficult was trying to get a handle on my schedule. It was so hard to show up and not know whether we would have votes, and whether we were going to go to this committee meeting or that.

But since 9/11, what's been overwhelming, is just the obligation that I feel to do everything I possibly can to help individuals, to help the city and the state, to do whatever is required to take care of national security and homeland security.

KING: We're going -- we've now called it Patriot's Day. Are we going to do something every year, do you think?

CLINTON: I hope so.

KING: What's proper? Not a holiday.

CLINTON: No, it's not a holiday. It's not a time for celebrating. It's not a time for goofing off. It's not a time for, you know, vacationing. It's a time for remembrance, and a time for resolution about what we do going forward.

Today was a profound combination of looking backwards and looking forwards. And one of the things that has so impressed me about so many families -- and I thank you for running all their names across the bottom of their screen; that means a lot to family member -- but what has also impressed me is how they often so often say to me, we just don't want this to happen to any other family.

KING: Always good seeing you, Senator.

CLINTON: Always good to be with you, Larry. Thanks.

KING: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the former first lady, Democrat of New York.

NEWS CONFERENCE ON SKYSCRAPER SAFETY, 9/17/2002

LOCATION: HOUSE RADIO-TV GALLERY, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, thank you all for being here this afternoon. We have a very important matter that we're excited about, because it's actually moving through the Congress, about to be passed in the House, and that is the National Construction Safety Team Act of 2002.

This is really a bipartisan, bicameral effort. And I want first to acknowledge the tremendous work and leadership of Congressman Sherry Boehlert. Congressman Boehlert, as you know, is the chair of the House Committee on Science, and he understood immediately what this issue meant, not only to the many families of lost ones from 9/11 but for the future in terms of making our buildings, particularly our skyscrapers, safer.

I also want to thank Congressman Anthony Weiner, who also served on that committee with Congressman Boehlert, and I want to thank Congressman Chris Shays as well for being here today.

I want to thank, in the Senate, Senators Hollings and McCain, the chair and ranking member of the Senate Commerce Committee. They and their staffs worked so many hours over so many days with my staff and with Congressman Boehlert's staff to resolve all of the outstanding issues of the bill. And without Senator Hollings and Senator McCain, we could never have passed this in the Senate last week.

I also want to acknowledge the hard work of a grassroots organization known as the Skyscraper Safety Campaign, led by Sally Regenhard and Monica Gabrielle. Without their dedication to this issue, this would not have gotten on to the radar screen and we wouldn't have gotten the public support and the fast action in the Senate, and now this afternoon in the House. We expect passage today.

This legislation is so important because it will save lives. It will empower the National Institute of Standards & Technology, otherwise known as NIST, to have the tools it needs to properly investigate major structural failures. It is also fitting and consistent with how our country has dealt with disasters in the past.

I just want to raise one past precedent. On March 25th, 1911, the terrible fire known as the Triangle Shirt Waist Company fire in Manhattan killed 146 people, mostly women and girls, who were trapped in the building. Exits were blocked. Victims were forced to leap to their deaths. And in the wake of that awful tragedy, our government responded with new fire-prevention and factory-safety measures.

That's what we're seeking to do now, to learn from this terrible disaster. And this act will give the authority to NIST to be able to send special teams to disaster sites, like we do when we have an airplane crash, to have full access to such sites, to help subpoena and preserve evidence, and to use its new authority to really deepen the investigation that has already started into what happened.

I've met with many of the families who have suffered terrible losses because of September the 11th. Their questions are legitimate. They deserve answers. And this legislation is going to help us obtain those answers.

And it's my great pleasure to introduce the real champion in the House of this legislation, Congressman Sherry Boehlert.

REP. BOEHLERT: Thank you very much, Senator. The House passed this bill on July 12th by a vote of 338 to 23. The Senate last week followed through, and they made some slight modifications which we find fully acceptable, and we will pass that bill later on today and send it on to the president.

This is very important, very significant legislation. The attack on the World Trade Center is, we hope, unique. But the collapse of those two seemingly immovable objects has lessons for a wide variety of buildings facing a wide variety of relatively common occurrences.

H.R. 4687, which I introduced along with my colleague, Mr. Weiner, will ensure that we are able to learn and apply those lessons, not only in the case of the World Trade Center, but in future cases as well. The bill simply and precisely remedies each and every failing that hindered the investigation of the World Trade Center collapse.

The bill gives clear responsibility and authority, including subpoena power, to the National Institute of Standards & Technology, to use its long-time expertise and that of outside experts to investigate failures of structure and evacuation procedures and to make specific recommendations to prevent their recurrence. And the bill ensures that NIST's response will be both swift and thorough. And we followed the model of the National Transportation Safety Board.

The bill, as I indicated, has already passed the House, and we have negotiated clarifying changes with the Senate. The bill will shortly be ready for the president's signature. And I can't thank enough all the people who worked, as the senator indicated, on a bipartisan, bicameral basis, but particularly in my House, Congressman Weiner and Congressman Shays and Congressman Grucci, who is not here with us today. We all pulled together in the same direction at the same time.

If you look at the final bill, you'll see a lot of fingerprints -- not fingerprints of Republicans or Democrats or senators or House members -- the fingerprints of concerned Americans, who are going to do something meaningful. And I'm proud to identify with that effort.

It's a pleasure now for me to introduce my lead co-sponsor, Congressman Weiner.

REP. WEINER: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I want to thank you for all you've done. Also I should point out that Senator Schumer, who was most helpful in this, couldn't be here today. He had a death in his family.

This was an extraordinary effort. No one can say that they expected the attack on the World Trade Center. In fact, no one can say that it wasn't a sheer miracle that over 25,000 people got out alive. That's a testament to how well the buildings were constructed and a testament to the thousands of hours of incredible work by the workmen and women who built the towers.

But it can also be clearly said that the investigation that was done after the collapse was fatally flawed. It was a crime scene. Not only was there no smoking gun, but there was no weapon found, no fingerprints. And, in short, there was not even a detective assigned to the case.

Unlike a month and a day later, when a plane tragically crashed in the Bell Harbor part of my district, when the NTSB was on the scene -- literally, frankly, within half an hour they were on the scene. They were sequestering evidence. They were taking control of the scene.

They were gathering information that would hopefully, in the next few weeks, bring us close to conclusions about why that plane went down.

If you juxtapose that with the collapse of the World Trade Center, you saw a situation that was frankly in disarray. Over 80 percent of the steel was carted away and recycled before it could be looked at by any expert. There was infighting among agencies about who had the right to see blueprints for the building. There was even controversy when members of the police department seized film being taken by some of the investigators that might have been helpful to the investigation. And the reason is simple: No one ever contemplated such a horrific act.

Well, unlike some elements of our 9/11 legislation that have been bogged down, in some cases for very good reason, the Science Committee in the House, the senators on the Senate side, in bipartisan fashion, with comity all around, came to a consensus about what needed to be done, and we quickly moved to do it.

Now, September 2002, we're sending to the president a measure that would create a new agency that would have new authority to make sure that not only is the legacy of the World Trade Center collapse that we know how not to do investigations, but in the future we're going to know important things that might save lives.

And the information that has come out in hearings in both the House and the Senate has already been most enlightening. We found out that the design of the World Trade Center, keeping the four stairwells closely compact in the center of the building, made sense from a design perspective but perhaps did not make sense from a safety perspective.

We now have given new thought to whether or not it's important to have access to the roof, whether or not having repeaters built into the hard wiring of the building might not be a good idea in the future. This new agency is going to help make it happen. And I want to thank particularly Sherry Boehlert on our side, Senator Clinton on the Senate side, for working so hard and so diligently to make this legislation a reality.

SEN. CLINTON: Congressman Shays, welcome.

REP. SHAYS: Thank you. First, I thank Hillary Clinton and Chuck Schumer for their effort in the Senate, and obviously for Congressmen Weiner and my chairman, Sherry Boehlert. When these two gentlemen first introduced this bill, I thought, "What are they talking about?" We saw these planes hit. They were filled with an extraordinary amount of fuel. It's obvious that they would have eventually collapsed. What's there to know that we didn't all get to see first-hand.

From the very beginning of the hearings, we just learned so much. We learned about building materials. We learned about where the stairways were put. We learned that had we looked at building number seven, that was basically allowed -- it burned for nearly seven hours or more and then collapsed. When could you have this wonderful case -- horrible case study of what happens when a building burns? They were amazed, frankly, that it burned -- that it stood standing for so long. Why did it burn? Because there was no water to get to it.

We learned that no one was in charge. Absolutely no one was in charge. It's amazing to think of. And they used obviously the NTSB as the model. They have subpoena power. They have the ability to jump right in and everybody respects their authority.

But in the end, what the Science Committee did and what the Senate has done was just an extraordinary piece of legislation, no politics involved, just caring about the victims of September 11th, those that lived in Connecticut and New York and New Jersey and Massachusetts and around the world, frankly, all the host of people around the world that went down in this disaster.

So this is really great legislation and we're happy that you're here to pay attention to it, and hope that, with all the other things that are being debated, this doesn't get overlooked. This is going to have tremendous benefit for years, thanks to the work of these people right here.

SEN. CLINTON: Any questions?

Q Just to be clear, this bill doesn't have any bearing on last year's -- it won't help -- (inaudible)?

SEN. CLINTON: Well --

Q (Off mike.)

REP. BOEHLERT: But let me point out, it's very important to note that Congress immediately responded, and the supplemental appropriated $16 million for the ongoing investigation of the WTC. That money is in the hands of NIST. They're using it very effectively. They're filling the gaps in our knowledge base, and that's critically important.

SEN. CLINTON: I think, you know, you could make an argument that not only the additional money that Sherry just mentioned, which was given to NIST to conduct the investigation -- because, remember, the first investigation was not conducted by NIST. First we had to get NIST the responsibility to investigate. The first investigation, even the people involved in it said, you know, "We're not the experts here."

But there wasn't any real authority to give to NIST until recently, and then we've now given them some appropriated funds to do it. And I think that, given the importance of this investigation, the fact that this legislation lays out the authority going forward, I think NIST will have a good argument legally that they should be able to use some of that authority going forward, too.

REP. WEINER: And let me make one other point. At our first hearing of this in the House, we had a panel that included five people from five different agencies. And I asked, "Who's in charge of the investigation?" Four hands went up and one guy flinched. I think now we understand who's in charge. We understand the line of authority. And we also understand, frankly, how seriously Congress takes this.

And I should point out -- and I'm sure my colleagues have -- this is a case where the victims and their families made this bill happen. This was, frankly, one of the things of a long litany of things that we were thinking about in the back of our minds, and it wasn't until Regenhart, the Skyscraper Safety Campaign, citizens came to us with the idea and said, "Hey, you're overlooking what went on."

And, frankly, a lot of people came at it the same way Chris Shays did. And so I think this is also a testament to the idea that people called to our attention that this wasn't happening in an organized fashion. And now it clearly is.

Q Does this bill actually -- assuming the president signs it, this will help the ongoing investigation?

REP. BOEHLERT: It will indeed. It will indeed. And NIST will have subpoena power, for example, which they didn't have; which they don't now have.

Q (Off mike.)

SEN. CLINTON: NIST is not doing the investigation. I mean, there was an investigation that, as Anthony --

REP. BOEHLERT: American Society of Civil Engineers conducted the initial investigation. But they were hampered in so many different ways.

SEN. CLINTON: Right.

REP. BOEHLERT: They didn't have immediate access to the evidence. It was two and a half months later before they had access to the blueprints, for example, of the building; a lot of concerns about potential liability. No one was clearly in charge.

First and foremost, number one, the top priority is the rescue operation. And no one (wanted to interfere?) with that, obviously. But evidence was being carted off in different directions in just a valiant effort to save as many lives as possible. Some of that evidence was destroyed, disappeared.

Every single beam is numbered, so you can actually do with a building the same thing you do with an aircraft. You can piece it back together. Obviously you're not going to recreate the World Trade Center, but you can on paper, knowing where the evidence is and where it was discovered. And these are very important investigative tools.

Bottom line, no one had clear authority to come in and take charge of the scene, to sequester the evidence. Subpoena power to get additional evidence was needed, and now they have that.

REP. WEINER: And let me give you two specific examples about how the law will change the present investigation. One, when this NIST team goes to Fresh Kills and says, "We want to look around" -- and there are FBI agents still there today, police officers still there today -- "We want to look around and gather information and mark it," they'll have the right to do it, and insist upon it if they're not permitted.

Secondly, when they go to the Port Authority and say, "We need to take a look at the exact layout of the 71st Floor; give us your blueprints," you won't have the Port Authority saying, "Well, let's check with our lawyers." It's going to be clear that they have the authority to do that.

Those are two things that didn't happen in the days immediately after September 11th.

Q What were some of the changes that the Senate made to the bill? And were there any changes made to the funding levels at all?

SEN. CLINTON: What we really did in the Senate was to convince the Commerce Committee that this should be a priority. And there were some clarifying changes made, and I can go through the specifics of that.

But what really happened in the Senate -- and I give Senator Hollings and Senator McCain great credit -- is that they took this on as a priority and it moved to the top of their agenda, whereas before, you know, it was something that wasn't going to be acted on in this session.

So the changes were not that significant, but what was really significant is that they took it on, got it done. We got it passed by unanimous consent and we're going to get it signed by the president.

REP. WEINER: There was only -- if I can just say, there's only one substantive thing. That was concern by the Justice Department, since an agency was going to be -- a new agency was going to be issuing subpoenas. Making sure they had their lawyers have a chance to look over the shoulder in the process is a relatively minor change.

Yes.

Q (Off mike.)

SEN. CLINTON: I think the report is going to contain their findings. And some of those findings, recommendations will flow. I think that, just as we see with the National Transportation Safety Board, they finish an investigation and then they say, "Well, you know, we'd better check the engines on this make of plane." I think you're going to see the same kind of active recommendations coming from the NIST investigation.

Q (Off mike.)

REP. BOEHLERT: Don't worry. I mean, it's several months in the making already and it's probably going to be several months more. We want it to be thorough. We want it to be complete. (Inaudible.)

STAFF: (Off mike.)

REP. BOEHLERT: But they were already underway.

SEN. CLINTON: Right.

REP. WEINER: And we should fully expect them to say, in a lot of cases, "We just don't know." And that is the sad legacy of this issue is that unfortunately this bill was not law at the time; switches, that a lot of the experts say, "If only we could have taken a look at those electric switches, we could have determined to a greater certainty about the heat" and things like that.

There are some questions that are going to be sadly left unanswered. And we hope, you know, obviously to answer as many of them as possible, but we have to have reasonable expectations. Information and evidence that was lost, tragically was lost for good. So -- and I think members of the families understand that, and I think we should expect that also.

REP. BOEHLERT: And it will give us some direction for new research and development activities. For example, we know that the insulating material on the steel beams -- the impact of the plane -- some of that material came off, which allowed the beams that were to be protected to get to 2500-degree temperature, and that began to cause the collapse.

SEN. CLINTON: You know, we also anticipate -- we did some protocols about how to proceed, hopefully not because of an intentional terrorist attack but maybe some other catastrophe, so that when your primary goal is to rescue people and save lives, no one wants to interfere with that. But there needs to be a protocol so that, at the same time, with the least amount of interference, the investigation can proceed. And they're going to be coming forward with some good ideas about how to do that.

And no one wants to second-guess the decisions that were made because, as Anthony said, I mean, this was something that people had to quickly make decisions about on the site. But if they have a pre-existing idea -- "Well, you know, instead of sending that off to get melted down and recycled, it goes somewhere else to await an investigation," you know, that's different. And we can fix a lot of that going forward.

Q What will happen if another building collapsed somewhere, you know, next year, next month, and someone asked NIST to investigate and they decide not to?

REP. BOEHLERT: They're not going to decide not to. They've got the authority and the responsibility and the clear direction to investigate.

SEN. CLINTON: Yeah. Well, I mean --

Q (Off mike.)

REP. BOEHLERT: We're not talking about somebody's garage in the neighborhood but you're talking about significant structures.

Q (Off mike.)

SEN. CLINTON: We have a --

REP. BOEHLERT: Congressman?

Q (Off mike.)

SEN. CLINTON: That's my counsel -- (inaudible) -- who's worked very hard on this for me, and I appreciate it. We're not talking about the garage, but we are talking about substantial buildings, substantial loss of life. And I think that's what people would expect from us.

STAFF: What the bill -- (inaudible) -- applicable to other -- (inaudible). Within the expert community there's a fairly good sense of what that is. There has to be discretion because otherwise you're -- (inaudible). It's pretty widely understood what kind of building -- (inaudible).

REP. BOEHLERT: And with that, we go to the House now, and we're going to pass the bill and get it on to the president. Thank you all very, very much.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you very much.

U.S. SENATOR JAMES JEFFORDS (I-VT) HOLDS HEARING ON FEDERAL RESPONSE TO 9/11, 9/24/2002

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

Senator Voinovich?

VOINOVICH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman -- Madam Chairman.

First of all, I would like to say publicly and I haven't had a chance to talk to Senator Smith privately, although I have written to him to acknowledge the hand of friendship that he extended to me when I became a member of the Senate and chairman of the transportation infrastructure committee and the work that we did together on Water 2000 and the Florida restoration project and also sharing my frustration while we were ranking members of this committee trying to come up with a bill that would harmonize our energy and our environmental needs. We're going to really miss you, Bob. You've been a wonderful member of this committee and I'm going to miss you.

I'd like to thank Administrator Whitman and Director Allbaugh for the outstanding job that they have done in responding to a situation that none of us would have ever anticipated in our lifetime.

So often in these hearings, we just talk about the problems and don't talk about all of what you've taken on with the work forces that, frankly, weren't shaped to deal with this kind of tragedy.

I know that you are doing the best that you can to move forward and to try and respond as well as you can to the things that are still out there. I think that we owe you a great debt of gratitude to the two of you and to your staffs and to your families for the time and effort and sacrifice that you've made on behalf of your country. So, I want to get that out before we get into the questions part of this.

In that same note, Joe, you and I've quoted you in speech after speech when you've testified before this committee and said "We have not been spending enough time internally on our employees. Before 9/11, retention was a problem and there was essentially no recruitment. Over the next 18 months, nearly 50 percent of our agency is eligible for retirement and since 9/11, retirements have accelerated. The people that worked at Ground Zero came to my office with a different perspective on life, wanting to spend more time with their kids, grandkids and spouses."

I'd like to hear from the two of you what you have been able to do in terms of shaping your work force. We're talking about all of these problems, but I am an old governor and mayor and I realize that you are only as good as your team and I think the teams of many of our federal agencies were in bad shape before this happened and need to be reshaped to respond to it.

We do have the homeland security bill before the Senate. Finally Congress is paying attention to human capital and flexibilities and things that, for the most part, they've ignored for years and frankly, so has the previous administrations.

But I would really like to know, where do you stand in terms of recruitment, maintaining your people, reshaping your work force, getting yourself in the position where if we get hit again, you are going to be able to do -- you know, we're going to be able to do a better job of responding to the situation.

WHITMAN: Well, Senator, let me just say quickly and Senators, I have indicated that I am going to have to leave so I apologize, but I would be happy if the other two regional administrator and the assistant administrator could assume the place at the table.

You and I have had this discussion on a number of occasions and the issue to which you address yourself is a very real one. We, too, stand to lose up to 50 percent of our work force over the coming five years.

And so, we have been engaged in a very aggressive outreach to recruit new, young people to the Environmental Protection Agency, but at the same time to provide opportunities for those within the agency to see a real career path, to make it worth their while to stay, to understand that there are opportunities for them to expand their horizons. We've been aggressive with SCS (ph) mobility. We have tried to encourage people to take advantage of new educational opportunities.

In respect to response to 9/11, while our on scene coordinators were well trained and were able to do a significant job, they needed more training and we have been very active and aggressive in more training. We have hired, as I have indicated initially, 75 new personnel. We are starting a western office so that we make it easier and we don't have to deploy people simply from the East Coast to respond to any kind of a crisis that may occur -- of this sort occur across the country.

We have undertaken a number of steps to ensure the security of all our people around our country, in all the offices around the country so that they understand that we care about their security as well, that we are concerned about it, that we are focused on it and that we will do all that we can to make sure that they understand what is happening when it happens, what the procedures are in place and that we provide them with all the protection necessary.

We are continuing with an aggressive training program for those who are our first responders, our on scene coordinators, providing them with additional equipment.

We have been working very closely with other agencies to ensure that we are coordinating this kind of training and we are making it possible to ensure that our people are going to be the best possible people on the scene that you could have, that the American people could look for.

At the same time, we are looking at the broader issue to which you refer, which is that of just retaining people, bringing new people in in light of those who are getting ready to retire.

Thank you, Senator. I am sorry. I have to excuse myself.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Administrator Whitman.

Deputy Administrator Horenko or Region Administrator?

ALLBAUGH: Senator, I appreciate the question. I am very proud of the fact that over the last 19 months I've been in Washington, we have launched out on a very aggressive program in trying to increase our retention.

Congress has given us the ability to offer retention bonuses which come in handy periodically that I can throw on the table to keep that gray matter that we are losing every day. We've aggressively stepped up our own internal training, so individuals have a career path similar to what Governor Whitman was talking about.

One of the things we've done just recently is take a look at ourselves and define a strategic plan for the agency and internally have become more flexible and amenable to attacks such as we sustained on September 11.

We have also -- I am stunned that we have five different classifications of individuals in our agency and we are trying to eliminate the disparity between those classifications.

You have people doing -- sitting side-by-side doing the same work and some have benefits, some don't have benefits, some of them are salaried, some aren't salaried and it does not create for a very harmonious work force when there is this disparity. So, we are aggressively attacking that.

We have a plan on the table subject to OBM's approval to do away with all of those classifications, so I am very proud of that. My most immediate concern is that I am losing individuals at a rate of five a day to TSA. They walk in; they get a $40,000 pay increase to go to TSA. I cannot compete with that.

So, we're almost cutting off our nose to spite our face. I mean, I realize and recognize the importance of the job that TSA has ahead of it, but we're all in this together, quite frankly. So, I worry about the drain from that on our work force.

Having said all of that, we have some of the greatest people who are innovative. They put others ahead of themselves when they are trying to do their job and it would be insightful if I could get every member of Congress to come to New York City and sit just for 10 minutes as we process some of these individuals who are hurting, just the compassion that our employees share and the volunteers share with those people who have been harmed.

That is what is great about America. It's unfortunate that everyone can't see that, because that is why FEMA exists -- to help people in time of need, to protect lives and to save property and we do a pretty good job of that.

CLINTON: Senator Crapo?

CRAPO: Thank you, Madam Chairman. I have no questions.

CLINTON: Director Allbaugh, I also wanted to thank Deputy Director Mike Brown (ph), who I didn't see earlier. Shows you problems of aging. And I wanted to just make three points. Your concern about the health tracking of our workers and volunteers, I know, is very sincere and heartfelt.

It is my understanding that although the firefighters have been tracked and baseline comparisons made with their pre-September 11 physical condition, unfortunately, they don't have the follow up money to track them into the future, which is what the idea behind the health tracking is, that they need clinical treatment and follow up that will go on.

Unfortunately, because of the stresses and because of the World Trade Center Syndrome, which is asthmatic and bronchial and respiratory, we are losing literally hundreds of our firefighters for health reasons as well as stress related reasons so that the ongoing tracking is not only physical, but also for emotional stress.

In addition, our police officers have not yet all been tracked. We know they didn't have the same kind of system as the firefighters. They are trying to build that, really, from scratch, putting them into the Mount Sinai program, getting them there.

Other workers, particularly our iron workers, our operating engineers, our laborers, the guys who were down there from just about the afternoon of the 11th until just recently, are only now getting into the system.

One of our hopes is that we not only can provide the health tracking over the foreseeable future that these people will need, but we will learn a lot in conjunction with the registry that you very wisely set up. We want to make sure that we are actually treating people, so it kind of dovetails.

We will get with you on that, because I know that both Mr. Brown (ph) and Mr. Gehr (ph) have been very receptive and responsive. I just wanted to ask about another issue and that is that the hazard mitigation grant program and I think that as I understand the program, New York is eligible for grants to help mitigate the effects of future disasters equal to 5 percent of the total amount appropriated, in other words, about approximately $420 million.

The administration has the discretion to raise this cap from 5 percent to 15 percent. I know that there are about 240 requests totaling billions of dollars from hospitals, agencies, city departments, the fire department, police department, et cetera.

And yet, none of that money has yet gone out. Is there a reason for that? Is there something we need to do to...

ALLBAUGH: There is a very simple reason. We are waiting for those projects from the city and the state. We are in discussion in a wide variety of those projects, but until they say, these are the ones we want to fund; we're on hold, quite frankly. And that's an ongoing -- it's not an adversarial relationship or dialogue. It's a very good dialogue and it just takes time to sift through all of the requests that they have.

CLINTON: Well, again, I thank you for your openness, flexibility. We'll make sure we'll do our part on the city and state end. And I guess, you know, finally from me, the issue about getting our first responders the training and equipment they need is something I am just passionate about and I heard it in your voice. I've seen you say the same thing in previous settings.

You know, we did have money and I know the president did not designate the money that was in the supplemental that included money for fire grants. It included money to begin to make our radio systems what is called "interoperable", which is something we had a terrible time with on September 11 in New York.

The homeland security department is authorization, is not appropriation. We just have to get the money out to FEMA, to the states, to the cities. I prefer that we have a formula where some money gets directly into the hands of our police and our fire and they can begin spending it at the city, country level.

I know the administration has a different approach, but whatever approach it has taken, we've got to get the money out. We are not getting the money to where it needs to be to get those respirators bought, to get that hazardous material training, to get our guys, you know, ready for whatever might come next.

I appreciate your very strong endorsement of that position, Director Allbaugh.

ALLBAUGH: Well, I appreciate that, Senator. I will tell you that as an agency, every dollar that we have been afforded by Congress to go directly into the hands of those first responders will be out, both the '02 money and the supplemental money will be in their hands by the end of this calendar year. We are moving as quickly as we possibly can. A lot of that money is for planning, but they need some money to plan, to do the exercises, to figure out what kind of equipment they need and what kind of training.

We are working as quickly as we can. It's not a problem of being held up. We just, like you, need the money to get the job done.

CLINTON: Thank you. And I want to thank Ms. Horenko and Ms. Kenney (ph) for their work as well in New York.

Senator Warner?

WARNER: Thank you very much.

I commend also their performances but I want to direct my question to Director Allbaugh.

I've been a native of the greater metropolitan Washington area my entire life, of course, primarily Virginia, but here is the central government of the United States and we've got to keep it working.

Should we have the misfortune of another incident in and around the nation's capitol which required not only the District of Columbia, but Maryland, Virginia and some 16 local governments to coordinate, is there someone looking at this specific mission of keeping government working, which requires the presence of a percentage of the government employees. They've got to have the ability to go to and from their offices and their homes in this region.

Now, I just have been advised that on the floor we've adopted an amendment, which I cosponsored with Senator Sarbanes, setting up in the homeland defense agency a specified segment of that organization and headed by an individual whose function is to do just this. Do you have some comments on that?

ALLBAUGH: Well, I thank you for that. We do that on a daily basis over at FEMA. We work with our counterparts not only Peter LePort (ph) and his crew at the D.C. Office of Emergency Management, but the surrounding communities on both sides of the rivers.

It is an effective national capitol region group that addresses every one of these problems. We work closely with OPM and other agencies to make sure that those that are needed to carry on those important and vital functions of our government have access to their offices.

It is a well-orchestrated plan. It is in effect today and I appreciate what you have done. This will just give added emphasis to what we already have in effect.

WARNER: Of course, the transportation and communication system will be a principle focus. Is that correct?

ALLBAUGH: Absolutely. It is the cornerstone. Without the ability to move about and to communicate, we're essentially dead in the water.

WARNER: That's clear. I thank the chair. Do other members of the panel wish to comment on this? I noticed that you were nodding.

STAFF: Senator Warner, I'm pleased to comment, we are part of the team that director Allbaugh referred to. Our EPA staff are planning, exercising, training with the National Capitol Region team that FEMA and the Office of Homeland Security are taking the lead on. We're pleased to play a relatively small but important part in that effort.

WARNER: Thank you very much.

Thank you, Madam Chair.

CLINTON: Senator Corzine?

CORZINE: Thank you. I also welcome Ms. Kenney (ph) and Ms. Horenko. I would comment that I think the laboratory that is run in Edison has been a remarkable group of people that worked around the clock on September 11 testing and efforts and I congratulate you all for your efforts along that.

I have a couple of questions that are sort of off where we've been. The testing for anthrax in buildings that has somewhat disrupted the Senate for a period of time. It certainly disrupted a number of the post offices and very serious concerns about the dislocation that has occurred at the Hamilton Post Office in New Jersey.

But I think the same situation occurs here in Washington and Florida. I wonder whether we've gotten these procedures moved along in a process in a way that it will not take weeks, months and maybe it will approach a year when we get into October with regard to a number of these activities.

Where do we stand? Where does EPA stand in its process of dealing with these? And then the second question I have would be to Mr. Allbaugh. I can only tell you that I think all of us appreciate the flexibility and the, I think, creativity of FEMA.

I think that a transportation center funding in New York with regard to the PATH tube and not necessarily putting back exactly the same footprint when times have changed and optimizing makes a lot of sense.

But similarly with regard, and this is, some might say, more parochial but when we're talking about first responders, the very first responder to Ground Zero on September 11 was with respect to the Urban Search and Rescue teams was the New Jersey team.

It is fully funded by the state of New Jersey, fully meeting all of the standards, but can't get to the designation. This is less a funding issue than being able to be plugged into the exercise and training issues.

I guess less a question and an encouragement to believe that the same kind of flexibility is shown with regard to what I have seen FEMA do and I really do congratulate the administration and FEMA for its efforts.

Some of that same flexibility in this area might also be appropriate. So, both those areas I would like to explore.

ALLBAUGH: I appreciate your concern. I, too, have some of that same concern. We have a multitude of urban search and rescue teams whether they are supported by other states or those in local communities that are equally as talented.

I am of the opinion at this point that we need to finish our review process, bring the teams up to a certain standard and they're undoubtedly in my mind, will be several who will fall out of the matrix who just can't cut it.

I think the door will open up. I do not see the need, quite frankly, to expand on the 28 task forces. That means we have 56 teams right now. The need is not there, but I hear what you are saying and I think only time will maybe accrue to your benefit. We'll have to see how it sorts itself out.

CORZINE: There has been -- I would just reiterate, the investment has been made. The performance has met the standards and the level of consideration; so, I know it is a serious concern within our state and among our first responders. They have been very active in the current situation.

ALLBAUGH: I hear from them weekly.

CORZINE: I'm sure you do. So do I.

STAFF: Senator Corzine, let me first thank you for your kind comments about our very dedicated staff in Edison, New Jersey. They, indeed, were the stalwarts of our emergency response.

As you know, a few minutes after the incident of 9/11, our folks in EPA Region Two whose offices were only six blocks from the World Trade Center were evacuated and had to deploy out of the Edison office in the following weeks and months.

And so, really, without our dedicated New Jersey staff, we would have not have been able to proceed. And also -- I know the senator had to leave, but I would like to recognize also Senator Smith's friendship and support to the EPA and its staff. Over the years, he's really been a stalwart in environmental protection and I would like to recognize that.

We have indeed learned a great deal about anthrax in the last year, more than I certainly ever thought I would learn when I took this job. At the Capitol Hill complex, we essentially wrote the history book on decontaminating large buildings in an urban area laden with anthrax, deployed through the mail as a weapon of mass destruction.

We learned many lessons from that historic and unprecedented response -- the importance of the unified command and incident command, the appropriate sampling techniques, an entire toolbox of decontamination techniques that have never before been pioneered and then finally processes for clearing buildings that have been contaminated with anthrax and determining that they are safe for reoccupation.

During the exercise last fall, cleaning up the Capitol Hill complex and the post offices, here within the federal government led by the Office of Homeland Security, we developed a model that is now being applied at the other sites that are contaminated in New Jersey and here at Brentwood outside of D.C. and other locations throughout the United States.

We have developed a national coordinating committee that wrote a guidance document on cleaning up anthrax, decontamination techniques and is now developing a national response team guidance document on procedures on clearing buildings that have been contaminated with anthrax.

We are also working cooperatively with the post office, providing technical advice and with other locations where anthrax is still located in terms of appropriate alleviation (ph) techniques and also, we'll use the same approach we that applied at the Hart Building -- a multi-agency clearance committee for clearing these buildings.

So, we have many more tools in our toolbox than we had before. We are moving on now to the other biological agents of concern and, in fact, tomorrow Governor Whitman and Governor Ridge will announce that the EPA has been charged with developing a national center of excellence, based out of our Cincinnati laboratory, including specialized building decontamination forces that can be deployed to as many as five major incidents nationwide at the same time.

So, we have come a long way in only a short time.

CORZINE: I appreciate the planning and the forward-looking aspect to this. I have a simple question of when can we expect to be back in Brentwood. When can we expect to be back in the Hamilton Post Office? Are there specific timetables that the community could look forward to?

STAFF: We're working very closely with the postal service. They are taking a very careful stepwise fashion. These buildings are very large buildings and unlike the Hart Building, they are contaminated at several locations throughout. And so, the post offices, looking at source control first, treating the most heavily contaminated areas and then going on to treat the entire building.

We expect to be fumigating the Brentwood facility in October. Plans are moving forward in that fashion and we will be proceeding once Brentwood is done with, treating the Hamilton township post office. We are currently targeting December. Again, this is all under the direction of the Postal Service, but the various federal agencies are coordinating very closely to make sure we are using the proper and protective techniques.

CLINTON: Senator Voinovich?

VOINOVICH: Mr. Allbaugh, the Columbus Dispatch, which I think you are familiar with in Ohio, ran an article this morning and it quotes from Mr. Jack Reall from the Ohio task force who is the leader of our team and was one of the first to provide assistance at Ground Zero.

You're not going to be here to hear Mr. Reall, but he claims that more money is needed for care of the Ohio task force members and for better equipment and health care in case of future incidents. We talked a little bit about this before, but what is, how do you respond to the issue of money for people who have already been injured. What are you doing about that? That is number one.

And then, number two, I'd like to see in writing and if it has to be confidential, I'd be more than happy to do it on that basis, you're going to be charged with the whole first responder thing all over the country correct? We had the hearings on that. You're going to have that responsibility.

ALLBAUGH: I hope so.

VOINOVICH: The issue then becomes, how many of those units are you going to have, how much equipment are they going to have and some of the details. I'd like to find out, you know. We'll start off with just the ones that we have, first responders that you have already approved. Where do they stand in terms of -- if we had another event tomorrow, do they have the equipment to move in there and not be exposed to what they were exposed to when they went into Ground Zero.

So, number one, what are we doing about the medical costs of some of these people in these first responder units in Ohio and other places in the country and second of all, what are we doing about equipment.

ALLBAUGH: Let me talk about equipment and training for those individuals' nationwide first responders. We have been talking for a year -- I feel like I am beating my head against a wall, and we haven't put any money in the hands of those first responders and only now are we able to put some planning money, thanks to Congress and their action. We received $100 million for planning. That doesn't buy the equipment or give them the necessary training.

But it is a step in the right direction. These folks have to figure out exactly what they need. Quite frankly, I believe all the first responders know what they need and we need to move expeditiously to put the money in their hands so they can buy that training and equipment to protect their individuals.

VOINOVICH: So, the fact is that the first responders that have already been approved in the country really have not yet got the equipment that they would need if we had another 9/11 tomorrow.

ALLBAUGH: Are you talking about the USAR team members?

VOINOVICH: Yes. The ones that are out there.

ALLBAUGH: No, sir. We haven't given them additional caches (ph). We've asked for that in our '02 and '03 budgets and '04 budget that's coming up. We haven't been able to buy the additional caches (ph). Every task force member is covered by our insurance, so any claims that they would have, health related, they will be covered and taken care of and every task force member knows this.

ALLBAUGH: They've been delivered a set of instructions in writing as to what to do in monitoring their own health, in talking with their own doctors. It will all be taken care of. They are our employees when I activate the task force -- each one of the task force. So, they fall -- and have the same benefits of any other FEMA employee who may be injured.

VOINOVICH: So, the compensation for health care you believe is being taken care of.

ALLBAUGH: Absolutely.

VOINOVICH: But in terms of the equipment, you need the money to buy the equipment.

ALLBAUGH: We're way short. We're falling way short. I will tell you, of all the claims that have been submitted on equipment reimbursement, we've approved every one of the team's request except for two. They've just recently, I believe, it's Nevada and Colorado, submitted their requests and we'll get them expedited as quickly as we possibly can.

VOINOVICH: As I said to you the last time, if we're going to have more first responders, how we treat those that are already first responders, are going to have a lot to do with anybody else is going to be interested in getting into this service to their fellow man.

The last question I have is for both of you and that is, what are we doing to ensure that the workers are kept up to date on information regarding their exposure and potential health impacts. The last time again we had hearings in March; there was this issue of mixed signals about what these folks were exposed to. And at the time, Mr. Allbaugh testified it was hard to get everybody together in the same room to coordinate the information.

Now, who is in charge right now in the federal government of coordinating all of the various agencies that are involved that have been evaluating the exposure of these folks and who is the coordinator and then, number two, have you been getting that information out to these folks, not only in New York, but all over the country that were involved at Ground Zero.

ALLBAUGH: We're looking for our guidance from HHS. They have been very successful, providing that leadership and every bit of information they share from us from a scientific standpoint, we get to every FEMA employee, every USAR employee. Those volunteers that came to help us at Pier 94 -- we're sharing as much information as we possibly can and it is all based on science.

VOINOVICH: So, HHS is the coordinating agency and EPA feeds into HHS and through HHS, the people who were involved then are informed about what they've been exposed to?

STAFF: Actually, ATSDR (ph) is keeping a registry, a health registry. They are working with the city of New York on this and they are collecting data now and will be keeping people informed through web sites, et cetera. But that is obviously something they are very dedicated to to make sure that people understand what the exposure was.

VOINOVICH: You are confident that everybody has been kept up to date on...

STAFF: I think it's an on -- sorry, Senator. It is an ongoing process, obviously and it is something that they are putting together now. They are working very closely with New York City to make sure they have access to the records that they need in order to do the appropriate, you know, development of this.

VOINOVICH: How about the people from Ohio and others that were first responders that were there, you know, I can understand in New York City they are there, but how about these other folks.

ALLBAUGH: We have an internal registry and we take care of those individuals who showed up that we know were in New York City and we share that same information.

VOINOVICH: You are both confident that finally we have a coordinated effort and the information is getting out on the street.

ALLBAUGH: I'm confident.

STAFF: Yes, I believe so, Senator.

CLINTON: Thank you all very much for being here this morning. We appreciate it. We're going to move quickly now to our second panel, Dr. Kerry Kelly, Madeline Wils, Danny Greenberg, Jack Reall and what we are going to try to do, as the panelists come forward is to ask each of you to summarize your testimony in five minutes. Your full testimony will certainly be in the record and that will give us a few minutes for some questions before we have to break for a vote, which is going to be apparently shortly.

Many of us recall the moving and quite profound testimony that Dr. Kelly provided to this committee literally within days of what happened on September 11, which directly affected her and affected so many of the people she knew and cared for in the fire department. We are very grateful that she would be here again.

Madeline Wils is a member of the community board number one in lower Manhattan. She is actively involved in many of the ongoing civic activities and has taken particular interest in trying to help the city recover and rebuild and serves on the lower Manhattan redevelopment corporation.

Mr. Danny Greenberg is president and attorney and chief of the Legal Aid Society. His society, which is a non-profit, was right in the midst of the destruction at Ground Zero. Of course, he had a very difficult time under the existing Stafford Act rules trying to get support and help for meeting his needs and FEMA was extremely helpful and creative in trying to bring about some help for the Legal Aid Society.

Mr. Jack Reall, the task force leader from Ohio task force one who responded to our desperate needs and we are delighted our chairman has returned.

And Dr. Kelly, if you would begin, I would appreciate it.

KELLY: Good morning, Chairman Jeffords, Ranking Minority Smith and members of the committee. My name is Dr. Kerry Kelly and I am a chief medical officer for the New York City fire department. Thank you for the opportunity to speak here today.

It has been a year since our view of the world was changed forever. It has been a year when unimaginable brutality was met by extraordinary acts of humanity.

As chief medical officer for the New York City fire department, it has been my privilege to care for the health and well being of our 15,000 firefighters, fire officers, emergency medical technicians and paramedics.

On 9/11, our members responded to the call for help at the World Trade Center. The members of the FDNY came from every borough and every rank to assist in the rescue of victims and suppression of fire. Focused on their task, they acted without regard for their own safety. Three hundred and forty three of our members died that day, saving the lives of many.

The members of the New York City fire department facilitated the evacuation of more than 25,000 people, the largest rescue operation in United States' history.

Despite the staggering losses, the members of the FDNY persisted in their work after the collapse of the Towers. Over the course of the following weeks and months, they worked 24 hours a day, seven days a week to help in the suppression of fires which burned until December and the rescue and recovery efforts that continued until May.

Obviously, this has been a difficult year for our members, whose physical health and emotional well-being have both been deeply affected. In the initial collapses, the pulverized Towers sent a caustic cloud of black soot, gritty powder and choking debris, showering down on the survivors, blanketing our members as well as the survivors in that area.

Every breath was made difficult as the air became thickened with particulant matter. The injuries to our work force during this last year have been described in detail in the two attached manuscripts published in this month's issue of the CDC MMWR as well as the New England Journal of Medicine.

Two hundred and forty firefighters and emergency medical technicians were seen in emergency rooms that day. Although most were treated and released with respiratory and eye irritation, over 28 were admitted for more life threatening respiratory as well as orthopedic injuries. Over 90 members still remain off the line with orthopedic injuries from that day.

As our other members continue to work at the site, medical leave remain low as members dedicated themselves to the rescue efforts. But as the weeks passed, respiratory symptoms became increasingly problematic, with increasing symptoms of cough, wheezing, congestion and shortness of breath.

In response to these symptoms, our Bureau of Health services, partnered with the CDC and the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health to develop a specialized comprehensive medical evaluation. Over 10,000 of our members were seen and evaluated at that time.

Because we had an existing infrastructure with preexisting database for the uniformed forces, this gave us the ability to evaluate both pre and post World Trade Center results. The results of those evaluations indicates significant changes in pulmonary function tests particularly.

Approximately 90 percent of our rescue workers had cough systems within 48 hours after the World Trade Center attack. Although 1,500 of the members showed a decline in pulmonary function tests, most of those people were able to continue at work, primarily because they had such excellent pulmonary function tests to begin with.

However, over 1,800 members were required medical leave for their significant cough symptoms. About 332 firefighters were absent from work for over a four-week period. This is what we defined as the World Trade Center cough -- people who both had symptoms and were missing from work for four weeks due to their significant symptom.

About 52 percent of these individuals have still not recovered sufficiently to return to the demands of the full firefighting duties. It is estimated that nearly 500 of our members may have suffered permanent respiratory disabilities as a result of the World Trade Center.

Since the attack, our members have also struggled with the emotional consequences of losing colleagues, near death experiences and digging through tons of rubble to find those who perished. The emotional toll of this event has clearly been very great.

Again, we were fortunate to have in place a preexisting counseling unit to help provide immediate services, and we also were helped with funding through Project Liberty, as well as through the FEMA, the Federal Emergency Management Administration, to give us that money.

Utilizing this funding, we have been able to provide needed services and we have developed new programs to meet new needs.

Fortunately, with treatment, some of our members who have sought treating, over 3,000 have been able to return to work, but about 250 members remain on leave with persistent symptoms.

One year after the attack, the fire department of New York continues to rebuild and recover, forever changed by the events of 9/11. For our members, it has been a difficult year as they experienced the direct trauma of the World Trade Center collapse, as they faced the loss of friends and family members and as they spent months searching and recovering for those who perished, while attending at the same time daily memorial and funeral services for their fallen brothers.

The department has been further affected by the retirement of both seasoned and experienced members, many of whom are leaving because of the demands of this job as well as the psychological trauma of this event.

We expect that up to 500 of those suffering from respiratory problems will be permanently disabled by this condition, many of whom have had their careers shortened by this respiratory problem.

The members of the New York City fire department responded to the call for help on 9/11 and they have not stopped responding since that day. They have given many times over as they dedicated themselves to the recovery at the site and in their support of the deceased family.

The initial federal resources that our department was given has been utilized to help our department and help us rebuild, but our ongoing efforts must be supported as we continue to monitor the health of our members as they cope with the physical and emotional stress of 9/11.

Senator Clinton's amendment would make $90 million available for health screenings and long term monitoring. This funding is extremely important. Clearly, our recovery did not end with the closing of the site. It is an ongoing process that requires attention to both the medical and emotional well-being of our members.

Thank you for your past support. We ask for your continued support. Of the many vivid images that remain in our memory from 9/11, the raising of the American flag by our three firefighters helped a nation that was troubled and grieving. I think we owe it to the first responders and to the firefighters who gave to help them in their time of need.

Thank you very much.

CLINTON: Thank you, Dr. Kelly.

Ms. Wils?

WILS: Senator Jeffords, Senator Clinton, Senator Voinovich, thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak with you today as chairperson of community board one, the lower Manhattan planning board and director of the lower Manhattan development corporation. I represent the residents, workers and business owners of lower Manhattan.

I'm glad to share the public's view on where we are today, but first let's go back one year.

WILS: Everyone would agree, the weeks, months after September 11 that the city, state and federal government's efforts towards the recovery and clean up on the World Trade Center site was stellar.

However, there was a lack of concern for the community at large and their suffering and this was alarming. In the wake of the attacks, the EPA took a back seat to the mayor's office instead of taking charge of the public health efforts. It was their responsibility to clean up this devastated community that lived with the dust plumes, to breathe that and invaded our homes and businesses and the fires that continuously burned for five months.

One year after the attack on the World Trade Center, there is still a great deal of anxiety among residents regarding the type of pollutants that entered the atmosphere, how some of these materials are still being found in indoor spaces, even after cleaning, and, of course, the long term health implications from the exposure to these elements.

With the change in the city's administration and their interest in the environmental issues, the EPA and FEMA decided to initiate an indoor residential air testing and/or clean up program. This was, of course, widely applauded.

These efforts may be characterized, however, as too little, too late. The clean up program began in rolling candidates in the summer of 2002, nearly one year after the attack. By this time, the overwhelming majority of residents had reinhabited apartments, cleaned unprofessionally, or by workers without government oversight or scientific standards. Many of these people having endured enormous disruptions in their lives, are understandably reluctant, one year later, to turn their homes inside out, even though they may be at risk for continued contamination or for recontamination.

We have recommended to the EPA that the deadline to sign up for the residential clean up program be extended past October 2, 2002, until the end of the year. This would enable EPA to do more effective outreach, which is really needed, and overcome the accumulated public distrust. It would allow the agency to publish results obtained from the first months of testing, data that would help other residents make a more informed decision whether to sign up for this program themselves.

This information will also help the EPA make an informed decision on whether or not there is a need to expand the clean up area. Scientists have referred to the boundary of Canal, Allen, Pike Streets as arbitrary.

The EPA should conduct indoor testing northward and eastward across the East River to determine the range of contamination by the dust plume, which scattered debris, in some cases, for miles. It can then formulate an accurate and scientific boundary within which to pursue its testing and cleaning.

One of the drawbacks of the entire cleanup process was the lack of ability for FEMA to pay for the clean up of small businesses. The Stafford Act should be amended so that we can prepare in the future to help all those who deserve it.

Large businesses cleaned their own premises, but 95 percent of small businesses did not have insurance coverage for this purpose and could not afford environmental contractors. In fact, many of the approximately 14,000 small businesses cleaned their premises themselves, most likely insufficiently.

Schools, public spaces and parks that were copiously contaminated by the dust plume have received little attention from the EPA. It seems arbitrary, if not perverse, that places used by children for learning or play receive so little attention.

Most of these spaces, when tested privately, showed evidence of contamination, particularly asbestos. In the future, the EPA should consider testing or cleaning schools and parks a primary concern.

Initially, the EPA announced it would test only for asbestos. Now they have agreed to test for dioxin and heavy metals, but only in about 250 homes. Yet, contamination appears to be in many cases random or influenced by vagaries of wind that are wholly unpredictable. One floor of the building may show no contamination while another floor does. We asked that the EPA test all homes included in the program for these contaminants at least until a sufficient body of data has been collected to rule out any threat.

Some homes have chosen testing only and they should be tested for all of the above, not just asbestos, because the asbestos tests are generally non-aggressive. All homes that are cleaned should be tested for all of the above after clean up and all research data obtained should be released as soon as possible.

This should be accompanied by the complete explanation of all test methodologies used. This data should be documented on the Internet and in all local newspapers as well as in public discussions to help eliminate public distrust.

A number of research studies are investigating health impacts upon firefighters and other workers in the rescue and recovery efforts, residents who are encouraged to reoccupy homes immediately, close to Ground Zero, immediately after the incidents have also experienced respiratory problems, like myself, or other health impacts.

Research should be funded to study long-term health impacts on exposure to residents in the vicinity of the site.

On another subject, we applaud FEMA for showing flexibility in allocating money towards transportation projects in lower Manhattan. This money should be used not only to rebuild the aging, inadequate transportation infrastructure that existed before September 11, but on projects that will help rebuild our businesses, residences and accommodate new tourists (ph) by improving our links to the region.

In summary, we appreciate the EPA for its decision to conduct the air testing and cleaning program for the residents of lower Manhattan. They need to acknowledge, however, that their public outreach efforts have been inadequate and that they have an important obligation to keep local citizens fully abreast about what their ongoing testing uncovers of any potential health risks, which may emanate from their findings.

We recommend that the EPA do further outreach, extend the signup deadline and expand the scope and quality of the testing and clean up program.

I am grateful for the attention Senator Clinton has brought to this issue and I thank all the members of this committee for your support, your concern and for giving our recommendations your complete consideration.

Thank you.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Ms. Wils.

Mr. Greenberg?

GREENBERG: Thank you.

Senator Voinovich, Senator Clinton, thank you for the opportunity to come here and speak a little bit about the role of lawyers in what happened after September 11 and particularly the non-profit Legal Aid Society, what happened to us and maybe extrapolate a little bit about FEMA's role in what it has done so well for the people of New York and our clients in particular.

The Legal Aid Society is the country's oldest and largest legal organization. We are a law firm for poor people. We started about 125 years ago. We serve 300,000 clients a year. We are in the lowest courts of New York City and state and we also have argued 40 cases in the United States Supreme Court.

We are the public defender in New York City. We are the appellate defender. We are the federal defender. We have represented 90 percent of the children in Family Court in neglect cases and dependency cases and we also have a very large legal services component, neighborhood offices throughout the city and we have foregone legal services corporation funding in order that we don't have restrictions on the work that we can do.

On September 10, we were seeing far too few of the poor people eligible for our services. On September 11 and September 12, the number increased by even conservative estimates to be at least 100,000 newly poor people who had lost jobs.

In addition, the headquarters of the Legal Aid Society is less than 50 yards from the Twin Towers. We are literally across the street from where they stood. The firefighters, the valiant, heroic firefighters stood in our building to put out the fires in number seven which burned for another day.

Our staff, fortunately, got out quickly and safely. One of our staff members took the blind woman in the lobby who runs the kiosk and for seven hours took her home to Queens because of the transportation being down and the inability to communicate with her family.

So, on the lowest and most important individual level and then on the systemic level, the Legal Aid Society was there. The food stamp system was down in New York. If you lived in Queens, if you lived in Bronx, if you lived in Westchester, nowhere near the World Trade Center site, with no one involved there, nonetheless, in your local bodega or in your supermarket, you couldn't get food if you had food stamps, because the electronic transfer system was down.

And in an amazing act, actually, the Legal Aid Society, which is so often castigated for its adversariness, it's working with government only through an adversary relationship, embarked, with the help of FEMA, in one of the more extraordinary collaborations that I have witnesses in about 30 years of doing this kind of work.

Suddenly, our lawyers had expertise that was valued by government and that food stamp system suddenly turned to us and said, how can we do this better and we helped the state department get out regulations that said to local store owners, if you give out this food and if the person in some rare case turns out to be ineligible, you will be held blameless and suddenly, all over the city of New York, literally hundreds of thousands of people were able to get food again. So too with the emergency Medicaid services that the state of New York provided.

FEMA was implicated in our work in two very, very important ways. The first was in ways that have not been spoken about here but deserve to be mentioned. There was, as you know, Pier 84 for the direct victims and their families and that was an extraordinary effort of all different kinds of services, including the private bar.

But FEMA set up a center in lower Manhattan that tried to service those people who were not direct victims, the busboy who worked in the World Trade Center on Windows of the World and was fortunate enough to be on the night shift, but suddenly living from week to week as he and his family was, had no money, had no way of even thinking about getting the money and couldn't get back into the place that they were.

And the FEMA center was this amazing confluence. It was exactly what advocates for the poor had said for 30 or more years -- why not put in one place all the services that somebody needs and bring the services to them instead of making them go all around to try to get the services. The FEMA center on Worth Street and Center Street in lower Manhattan was a model of what should have been -- public/private partnerships, not in rhetoric, but in reality.

FEMA oversaw it. They knew exactly who to bring to which table. The small businessperson went to the SBA table. The person with an eviction problem came to Legal Aid. Those places -- the FEMA center was open on evenings, on weekends during the day and served thousands of people and we were proud to be part of that partnership with FEMA.

I think it succeeded beyond our hope of what could happen as people just poured in and were given all the help that they needed, including cash assistance from Safe Horizon (ph) and other places.

We had one other interaction with FEMA, which ends well, but didn't begin quite as well. As I indicated, our offices were across the street from the World Trade Center. We need to get back into those offices and have not yet been able to do so. We have insurance. We have claims. We are working on those things. But we also need FEMA assistance.

When we first asked for it, we were told as a non-profit that we were not an essential service. We were actually denied the claim. With the help of city and state officials, at the outset we put back the claim saying if those who were mandated to represent indigent defendants are not an essential part of this city, it is hard to imagine what is in keeping the criminal justice system going.

And equally important, clearly more important, Senator Clinton, with your help and that of Cara Hughes (ph) in New York City, FEMA has now turned around and said, we do understand. You are right. You are eligible and your claim will be processed and they have been extraordinarily helpful in helping us to even generate that claim.

So, the one thing I would say as I conclude in terms of help to this committee in thinking of the FEMA role -- whether it needs statutory amendment or merely to have FEMA understand it, there is an extraordinary role that non-profits played in the city of New York in the wake of this tragedy, extraordinary role that it needs to play in the rebuilding of downtown New York, but more important, non-profits throughout the country need to be valued and understood not to have resources, not to have endowments, not to have the ability to really move from year to year in a way that a great tragedy will inflict on it.

If we are to invest in the infrastructure of this country, then the understanding that non-profits, like the Legal Aid Society, play important roles that no one else can play needs to be addressed in a way that others won't have to come to congressional delegations to have their services needed.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak to you today.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Greenberg.

Mr. Reall?

REALL: Good morning, Senator Clinton, Senator Voinovich, thank you. I am Jack Reall. I'm the task force leader of Ohio task force one of the Urban Search and Rescue Team. On September 11, 2001, my team of 74 responded to the World Trade Center tragedy to assist with the rescue and recovery efforts.

REALL: We arrived in Manhattan at 6:00 a.m. on September 12, where we remained until September 19. Our day shift crews were assigned to begin work immediately in the Liberty Sector on the southwest quadrant of the collapsed area.

During our operations, conditions at the site were hazardous at best. Dust and paper were everywhere. A night shift when I worked, visibility was extremely limited due to the dust in the air reflecting light.

While the paper became less of a problem throughout the eight-day period, dust and the smoke from the ever-burning fires were always present. During the first 24 to 36 hours of our deployment, respirators were difficult to obtain. We carry full-face cartridge respirators in our cache (ph) for compliance base operations. However, during this deployment, we recognize the need for half face respirators due to the extended wear requirements.

We were able to obtain half face respirators through the various volunteer supply sections throughout the area after a period of about 36 hours. At each of the daily briefings our teams had, hazards for the site were noted for the task force to prepare for. One day it was asbestos, the next day it was gamma radiation, the next day it was failure of the slurry wall.

Each of these was deemed less of a hazard after further investigation. However, early reports led us to believe that we may be exposed to any number of various lethal components.

Because of these warnings, we strongly encouraged the use of the most appropriate level of personal protective equipment available to us at the time.

Upon our demobilization and return to Ohio, our greatest concern was for the psychological and emotional scars this deployment would have on our task force. It took us almost two weeks for us to realize we were experiencing an increased number of illnesses. Fourteen of our members sought medical attention within weeks of the incident for respiratory ailments. Diagnoses ranged from pneumonia to reactive airway dysfunction syndrome.

One of our members was hospitalized for five days and treated aggressively for his symptoms. Another experienced a hernia due to the excessive coughing. Many others experienced infections of a non- respiratory nature -- skin disorders and various other ailments. Almost every team member experienced hoarseness, gravelly voice and nasal blockage for many weeks after the incident.

Until the recent published reports in the New England Journal of Medicine and the CDC, most of our members took their minor symptoms for granted. Fortunately, soon after our return, one of our team doctors surveyed our members regarding their health and treatment. He found the deployed members were 2.7 times more likely to require antibiotics for respiratory infections and 3.2 times more likely to require medical care than our non-deployed members.

This information has been extremely helpful in educating our team about the need for appropriate medical surveillance. During the development of the Urban Search and Rescue response system, the primary focus was on how to protect our members from failed structures that may collapse and trap us. For this, we learned how to shore up buildings with wood to create safe areas to work.

After Oklahoma City, we extended our focus to how to withstand the psychological and emotional effects of man-made disasters taking hundreds of lives. For this, we learned how to strengthen the support network, in both pre and post deployment to enable us to keep the people we have trained.

After September 11, we must extend our focus to the unknown health effects our members will face in short and long term future. For this, we must be able to monitor their health completely from the time they join the team until they retire from the team and in all phases in between.

Our Urban Search and Rescue teams function on a shoestring budget of $150,000 per year. $100,000 of this is eaten up immediately in fixed costs like insurance, utilities and maintenance of equipment. The other $50,000 must be utilized to maintain training levels, provide basic protective equipment and plan for the times when we won't be reimbursed for our expenses.

That doesn't leave us much room for $1,000 medical exam for 180 personnel. The budget has put us in a Catch-22 situation with the Department of Labor. Our members are repeatedly denied their coverage under federal workers compensation because we don't have enough data to create a causal relationship between the incident and diagnosis.

Yet, we don't have the funds to obtain full medical surveillance to provide that relationship. The member who spent five days in the hospital just had his third denial for his claim overturned and approved for payment by the Department of Labor. He will be the first approval we have obtained one year after that disastrous day. His claim was for less than $1,000.

Our Urban Search and Rescue teams have been available and on the scene of every major disaster since their introduction. Their members participate voluntarily to ensure every citizen in this country is given the best chances of survival in impossible situations. We should be able to ensure their safety whenever possible.

You and your colleagues have assisted us in our budget situation and made funds available to deal with the aftereffects of September 11. We appreciate that support. Those funds are just now becoming available to us. We need to be able to provide the support to our members, not just today, but for tomorrow as well.

Thank you.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Reall.

We have a vote and we'll try to get as many questions asked before we have to excuse ourselves. But I want to ask Dr. Kelly and Mr. Reall -- first Dr. Kelly -- in looking at the future needs of the firefighters that you care for and taking into account what Dr. Prezant's (ph) research demonstrated clearly in the publications that have come out recently, do you currently have the resources you need to adequately track the physical and mental health of all those who responded at the World Trade Center?

KELLY: We do have an existing infrastructure. We have people and physicians and a staff who wish to follow people. But we don't have the current resources for that. We are set up to do annual evaluations of our members, but again, the two areas of concern are that so many of our members are retiring prematurely and we need a mechanism of following those individuals, which is a goal that we have.

And the second is I think it is very important to continue to support the people who are a part of our environment, because there are so many reasons for them to leave that we need to support what is going on in their mental and physical concerns.

Your group was there a week, so you can imagine how it is like for our group who was there so long. I think the nation looks to our group to see how we are doing as a group because of the exposures that we've had.

CLINTON: Well, you know, we have asked for the additional funding -- $90 million that would go to the health tracking. $25 million of that would go to the fire department to continue to do what you need to do, because I feel so strongly that we owe it to everybody, worker and volunteer alike who came to respond that we track and care for their physical and emotional needs. I think it is an obligation. I don't think there is any doubt about it. Our country owes all of those who were there that kind of assistance.

And Ms. Wils, I know that you've had some very positive recommendations about indoor testing and cleaning and I have to reinforce your point that we have to make sure that residents who were exposed are also included in the tracking and the follow up work, because a lot of them -- some didn't leave, but many came back as soon as they could and were there for week after week and month after month. And I appreciate your speaking out for the residents of lower Manhattan.

Mr. Chairman, I'll excuse myself to go cast the vote and I thank you for holding this important hearing.

JEFFORDS: Thank you for your excellent help. It is an important vote.

Dr. Kelly, as you know we have discussed many times over the last year the need for health monitoring and tracking programs for our first responders. I am impressed by the study you have conducted with New York City firefighters. Based on that experience, I would like to know what you think an effective program would include and what would it cost -- the latter one may be a little problem for you, but.

KELLY: We are very thankful for Senator Clinton, who has introduced an amendment to help give us some resources for this. Again, we have an existing program, a bureau of health services with a facility, nurses; physicians who are prepared to follow people. What we are looking to do is to continue to monitor people after they have retired on the premise that these are people who have really been in the first line in a war and just as you would follow veterans who have been in an event, you want to follow a group of people that have been exposed to toxins and other substances that appear to be having some pulmonary problems.

The firefighter who is hired by our department has a set of tests done at the time they come on. We know what their preexisting pulmonary function test, chest x-ray; EKG is because we have them on premises. So, we have an ability to follow people if there are changes, for example, their pulmonary function test or their chest x-ray.

Our initial changes that we have been seeing have been people with wheezing and hyper-reactive airway disease. The concern we have is down the line. Will there be further changes, either in their breathing capacity or any restrictions in their lung because of the, again, the powder, the substances that they have been exposed to, as well as monitoring their other blood testing, EKGs, chest x-rays, CAT scans of the chest.

JEFFORDS: Well, thank you.

Mr. Reall, urban search and rescue teams are an important part of the federal governments disaster response and recovery efforts. But what can be done to increase the safety of these teams.

REALL: Well, I think a good start has begun already through the work of Congress in funding our preparedness for weapons of mass destruction nationwide. That will give us a lot of the equipment and the training needed to not only identify, but help protect our members in the event that we respond to incidents of this nature in the future.

I think the primary thing that we are going to focus our efforts on in Ohio are on, because we are not a single fire department team. We are made up of people from around the state of Ohio.

We need to concentrate our efforts on creating that baseline, medical, like Dr. Kelly spoke of and then being able to follow up and monitor the pulmonary function test annually or semi-annually on our members. We've identified that as a problem in these kinds of events now in these major collapses and it will be an ongoing problem, so we need to take the steps to be able to protect our members.

But, of course, that takes funding.

JEFFORDS: What can be done to increase the safety of these teams.

REALL: Well, right now we have to make some changes in our cache (ph) equipment in order to be able to appropriately identify the hazards at the scene early on, prior to the response of federal agencies.

We're there very early into the incident and it takes some time before you get different nuclear emergency support teams or EPA there to appropriately monitor the air. We need to be able to do that ourselves and make the appropriate recommendations to our team members for the respiratory protection and/or any other protection that they need at the site.

JEFFORDS: What additional resources are needed to ensure that teams are prepared for all types of disaster. I know that's a broad question.

REALL: I don't think we'll ever be prepared. We learn from each incident we respond to. We're not going to be ultimately prepared for everything that happens other than the fact that we have people that are willing to do it. That's the primary preparation we have.

The equipment is something that we learn on each incident, what different types of things we need and what is out there. Some of the things that after the World Trade Center incident, our respirators that we wear on a daily basis and even the ones that are available right now are not meant to be worn for 14 hours a day, day in day out.

They are just not made for that kind of arrangement. There obviously needs to be some work on those kind of pieces of equipment should we encounter something like that in the future -- decontamination equipment and the ability to decontaminate appropriately at the scene is a high priority as well.

Our decontamination of our team members didn't come in until three or four days after the initial response.

JEFFORDS: Ms. Wils, are the residents of lower Manhattan currently participating in a health tracking or monitoring program?

WILS: Yes, Senator Jeffords. There has been an effort just in the last couple of weeks to start an indoor air testing program. It has taken a while to get this started, because there has been many, many differing opinions in the scoping issues and methodology used.

And approximately, I think, about 4,500 households have signed up for this. One of the problems, though, is that if you sign up for just testing, if you -- if they bring in a modestly aggressive method to test for asbestos only in your home and if they don't find anything, they don't clean up.

These methods are questionable and people don't know what to ask for.

WILS: They are not that knowledgeable in this. And if you are being tested you are only being tested for asbestos and there has been clearly heavy metals, anything from fiberglass, mercury, lead and other dioxins found in the area and currently found in people's apartments, schools, parks from the private testing that has been done. So, it's going to be very important for, I think, for the EPA to, as I said in my testimony, they are currently testing 250 homes only for these other toxic substances and we think it is very important that after they clean up, they test all the homes for these substances.

JEFFORDS: Mr. Greenberg, your Legal Aid Society had extended interactions with FEMA and other federal agencies. Based on your experience, what suggestions can you give us today to help improve the federal government's interaction with non-profit organizations during and after major disasters?

GREENBERG: I think first, to reiterate, I think they were, by in large, very good, and in particular, the FEMA center downtown, I think served many of the people that Ms. Wils talked about and many others.

The definition of who is a victim, I think, could be somewhat broader. We have defined a victim as somebody who lives in a geographic area, but obviously, if you worked in that geographic area and your job ceased to be any more, even if you lived in Queens or in some other part or in New Jersey or some other place, clearly you need some kind of help and the flexibility to define who is a victim, I think it needs to be somewhat broader rather than merely being geographic.

Secondly, as to non-profits per se, again, I think they play an important role in all the help that people need after a tragedy. I think that the definition that a non-profit can be eligible for FEMA help, even if they are not strictly in the terms that now that FEMA used, an essential service, that broadening of definition would be helpful.

JEFFORDS: Senator Voinovich?

VOINOVICH: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Reall, thanks very much for being here today and thanks for your task force members responding to September 11 tragedy. I think you know that the members of this committee and I'm sure Administrator Whitman and Director Allbaugh are concerned about the health of your members -- when I read your testimony, I was outraged at the fact that one of your members was turned down twice and then finally approved for a payment of $1,000. Were you here for the testimony of Mr. Allbaugh?

REALL: Yes, sir.

VOINOVICH: Do you want to comment on that testimony? Basically, it was like, they are all being taken care of, but the fact of the matter is that they're not being taken care of and the fact is that the compensation system is not within the framework of FEMA, but rather is in the hands of the Department of Labor. The question is, does the right hand know what the left hand is doing?

REALL: I think we have been notified on how to appropriately fill out paperwork for compensation claims. There has been a lot of confusion internally within our team about how those should be handled. But even when that was cleared up, we have quite a few members that received denials on a regular basis from the compensation claims. A lot of that, again, has to do with the fact that right now we're not doing appropriate medical monitoring of our team members. We just don't have the funds to do that. So, it's difficult to create that relationship.

We've followed up -- our team doctors are doing quite a bit of work to follow up with the denials and make sure that they are taken care of as best can be and to provide the support for the claims so that it can be overturned and the claim be made.

I, too, when talking to my team am somewhat outraged by the fact that they are being turned down a little over a year later for claims and none of us are experiencing the significant health problems that the New York City fire department is. We're in the moderate to mild exposure range as identified through the New England Journal of Medicine report and the CDC report.

But still, we need to take care of our people.

VOINOVICH: How many did you have at Ground Zero. I've forgotten.

REALL: Seventy four.

VOINOVICH: So, out of the 74 you had 14 that seemed to be the ones that are most -- have all of the 74 had complete physical examinations?

REALL: No, sir. We don't have a system in place to allow a team such as ours and many other teams -- Senator Corzine talked about the New Jersey team. I believe they are in the same situation we are -- they're multi-jurisdictional teams. I individually have a system in place to get baseline physical and annual medical testing done through my fire department, my primary employer, but as a team, we don't have that kind of system in place and we don't have a standardized pulmonary function test to utilize for team members.

VOINOVICH: It seems to me that at this stage of the game that that would have been one of the first things they would have done -- I'd like any other comment from any of the witnesses. Have you experienced this same thing in terms of compensation at all? Have people complained to you about the fact that they had to go through all kinds of paperwork in order to get help?

KELLY: Our department was in place and we were ready to take care of the physical needs of the firefighters and the EMTs who had been at Ground Zero so that we were able to pull together the resources that we already had in place and put together funding through NIAGE (ph) and the CDC to do these medicals, because we were aware very early on that people were having respiratory problems. We started seeing those symptoms very quickly and because we have an occupational medicine program in place for our New York City fire department, we were able to notice these symptoms and respond quickly.

VOINOVICH: So, you did it yourself. Have any of them filed for compensation under the federal program that Mr. Allbaugh made reference to. I think it's called the federal -- it's like a federal workers compensation program. He basically said in his testimony, well, they're all now like working for the federal government.

Have your people used that system or have they just gone outside...

KELLY: I don't know the answer to that. We have our own mechanism in place for disabilities which, again, probably 500 of our members will be applying for respiratory disability and we have 100 to 200 with some emotional, you know, psychological problems.

VOINOVICH: I can see their part of the workers comp system in New York City. They were on duty and their workers comp system is handling it. The folks that came in as first responders belonged to a multiplicity of fire departments and other units, EMS units. Am I right, Mr. Reall?

REALL: Yes, sir.

VOINOVICH: So, they are not covered by their own personal systems because they did not arise -- or cause from their duty, so they had to go to the federal system. Now, that's the difference. I would be interested -- we ought to inquire, Mr. Chairman, of the other units that have come there, not only from Ohio, but from around the country to find out whether or not they are experiencing the same kind of frustration that they are in Ohio.

There ought to be a system in place that, first of all, these people are going to do this, that there are physical exams that are ready to go and begin with and after, if something like this, God forbid, happens again, that they come back, they have physicals. There ought to be a regular protocol regimen in place to move on all of these things quickly.

This is a real problem that we have identified here this morning.

REALL: I can tell you that of the funds that have been made available to us and that Director Allbaugh made mention to will become available before the end of this calendar year. Our team has identified the number one priority is baseline medical testing and putting funds aside for continuous medical monitoring for that reason.

VOINOVICH: Now, is this money coming out from FEMA? Are you going to be able to use that money then, for the medical side of this thing?

REALL: It is identified in five different categories for use, but yes, we are going to be able to use it for that -- for the medical monitoring. And by all means, Director Allbaugh has been a proponent of getting the funds necessary for us to accomplish our entire mission, not just getting the tools out to the places but actually taking care of the people that are doing the work. He has been very aggressive in that and I appreciate that. It just takes time. It's just now becoming available.

VOINOVICH: Has FEMA identified new equipment that you ought to have in you call your "cache" (ph)?

REALL: Yes. We spoke earlier. I think we have identified on the respiratory and testing side several pieces of equipment that will become beneficial to us and we are going through the process right now within FEMA to make those cache (ph) items nationwide so that all cache (ph)...

VOINOVICH: OK. So, they have identified the new items so that if something happens when you go in there, you would have the stuff right now rather than having to get it from volunteers like you did the last time around.

REALL: That's correct.

VOINOVICH: It was interesting, Mr. Greenberg, about the fact that FEMA recognized a one stop shop and I'm a little surprised -- I am surprised that that was not something that was part of their stock and trade. It had to be suggested to them.

The reason I am raising this is that we had a terrible flood in Ohio when I was governor in 1997. And I came back from an overseas mission for that and wondered, you know, how needed I was. One of the things that I found out that everybody was going to a different place to get the help that they needed. And I suggested this is nonsense. Let's just have one place where people can go and they can go from table to table and get the help that they need.

Was that something that they suggested to you or did you have to suggest it to them.

GREENBERG: No, I think that the model -- first, the city of New York had set up at Pier 84 directly for the families of victims exactly this kind of model. And I think then out of that, FEMA and the number of agencies that were very involved in delivering other help said, well, there are a lot of other victims.

They are a secondary tier, if you will, and it makes sense to replicate and maybe they got it from you. But however it all turned out, I think that model was in effect for many months and I think it was actually quite extraordinary.

It was, as I said, the first time that I ever saw the response of government to poor people being, and I will be frank about this, you are entitled to this service, we want to make it easy for you to get this service rather than what I encounter as a more traditional response -- you may be eligible for this, but we're going to put up road blocks and if you can make it through all these road blocks, well then you will get the services.

VOINOVICH: It reminds me -- it's typical, the Department of Labor dealing with their compensation claims. In other words, it's the whole -- see change in terms of we want to help you get what you are entitled to and facilitate that, which is wonderful, which we should be doing.

I understand there is always this idea that people are trying to rip it off. I mean, it's the other way around. The people that are trying to do that are the exceptions to the rule. Let's help the people that really need it.

You all had a chance to hear from Administrator Whitman and Director Allbaugh's testimony. Just for the record, is there anything that you heard during that testimony that you took -- you disagreed with -- substantially disagreed with that you would like to have in the record here? You heard their testimony. Is there anything you want to comment on in regard to their testimony where you think that perhaps they didn't portray a situation as it was and we need to look at it?

WILS: Senator, the only thing I would like to say is that when it was discussed that we are learning every day and that one thing we have learned to do is be flexible, the only thing I would say is that we are not anywhere near the end of our road yet. We are -- we still have homes and businesses downtown that are not cleaned up. We still have people who are suffering, both emotionally and physically.

So, the only thing I would say is that they continue to be flexible and even more flexible than they currently are. I think there are still a lot of lessons to be learned and I think that they should actually -- we should find a way to document them all so that everybody can see what needs to happen if, God forbid, we should have something like this occur again.

VOINOVICH: So, you would suggest that maybe after a period of time, we don't know what that is, but there will be an end time, we go back and review all of this and then what we would do is at the agencies that are dealing with this, they could develop protocols to deal with it so that if something happens, we have all these things worked out and we wouldn't have to learn again from experience.

WILLS: Absolutely. The one thing that was very clear living through this was that nothing like this had ever been experienced before, that the city, state and federal government had no idea how to handle it and the fact that it has taken a year to put together a cleaning program or a testing program or we still have schools that haven't been able to be cleaned yet. I mean, the fact that it has taken so long to get everything done is really a testimony to the fact that this is the first time that something like this magnitude has happened.

VOINOVICH: I'm glad I was here today, because I was at Ground Zero right afterwards. I took some extraordinary pictures with my digital camera. It is almost as good as the ones that were in the magazines.

Then my wife, Janet, and I were back at the federal court house and then down for the wreath laying. And of course I took pictures of what it looked like afterwards. And it was amazing to me how they were able to get that cleaned up.

But basically you are saying that - my message from you today is that the aftermath is still around and there is still a lot more work to be done and the fact that it is cleaned up - everybody says, well, it's cleaned up now and the idea is, what are we going to do with the - it's not cleaned up. We've got a lot yet that has got to be done.

WILLS: Senator, I would just like to add, they did an unbelievable job and everybody around the United States helped with the job that was done to clean up the site. But I can just show you pictures of one home and I'll give these to you, that it took FEMA and EPA seven to eight months to decide whether to help these people or not.

So, across the street, they were doing a great job. But across the other street, they really have a difficult time of being flexible enough to help people who are in dire need. These people are still out of their homes a year later. Twenty three homes in this building still not cleaned up.

GREENBERG: I guess that what we are saying, in a way, even as we compliment the extraordinary response and the deserved compliment it gets is that as we think about going forward and $2.5 billion for an infrastructure to do transportation and rebuilding, which is absolutely essential to New York, absolutely essential to the economy, absolutely essential even to my clients. It's very important not to lose sight of the individuals who were harmed and to do what government has always proclaimed it wants to do best, which is to help those individuals in the individual ways.

I am buoyed by hearing the testimony that says that there is flexibility and in fact, I've witnessed that flexibility. But certainly in keeping with what you are saying, Senator, keeping all people's eyes on the need for that flexibility is going to be essential as we go forward.

VOINOVICH: If I were you, if you have an opportunity, I would continue to see if you can't follow up with a national media on some of the things that you have talked about today so that you can keep it on the front page or somewhere so that people are paying attention.

Your two senators have done a good job of bringing this to the attention of the senate, but the fact is, we're on with other things right now and sometimes - I'll tell you the other thing, another reason why maybe you ought to be doing it, because we are considering today, you know, dealing with Iraq and the threat to our nation and so forth.

And I think for too many people, 9/11 was just something they watched on TV and it is over with and we are so insensitive, I think, today because of so much that we see. I think this needs to continue to be in the minds of the American people about how - what a terrible, terrible thing this was for our nation - not only for immediately the people that died from it but it's just like, it's just continuing to send out waves and they are still going, aren't they.

They haven't stopped yet, have they? And I think that that is important for us to fully comprehend what this is about.

Does anyone else want to make any comments about what was said here today?

Well, I thank you very, very much for coming here today. I am so glad I was here to hear you.

Thank you.

The meeting is adjourned.

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY) DELIVERS DEMOCRATIC RESPONSE TO THE PRESIDENT'S WEEKLY RADIO ADDRESS, 12/28/2002

CLINTON: Good morning. I'm Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton from New York.

Tonight at the stroke of midnight, nearly 800,000 Americans will lose their extended unemployment insurance. These are Americans who used to work in our factories, our businesses, our restaurants and our neighborhood shops. They've spent month after month searching for work but, through no fault of their own, have been unable to find jobs in these difficult economic times. For them and their families, this has been a holiday season filled with too much uncertainty and not enough joy.

This year did not have to end on such a sad note for them. We passed a bipartisan bill in the Senate which would have continued to allow individuals to qualify for a one-time 13-week extension, providing more than 2 million Americans with the help they needed to pay rent, buy food and purchase clothes for their children.

But the House Republican leadership refused to pass this bill. They ran out the clock and went home for the holidays without even allowing a simple vote.

I was pleased to hear President Bush announce his support for an extension of unemployment insurance in his radio address two weeks ago, and I look forward to working with him in the new year.

I only wish that he could have made that statement several weeks earlier, in time for the holidays. That delay meant that, this month, millions of Americans are without the money they need to get by -- money that would've gone right back into our economy when spending is at its highest rate all year.

Now that the president has endorsed this extension, I urge him to support a meaningful plan, a plan that extends benefits for 13 weeks and covers people who have exhausted all of their benefits. Anything less would leave millions of Americans to begin the new year with empty pockets and little hope.

In my state, 63,000 New Yorkers will lose their extended benefits tonight. And in New York City, 35,000 people, many who lost their jobs as a direct result of the terrorist attacks on September the 11th, are being cut off tonight, left to wonder how they will pay their bills in the new year.

Many will be forced to leave their homes and take their children to shelters. And a new report shows that 40 percent of the homeless population is now made up of families with children. Is that the kind of America we want in 2003?

Our country is at its best when we're at work building cars and computers, opening new businesses on Main Street and in office parks, inventing new technologies and planting new crops. This entrepreneurial spirit and work ethic are the great characteristics that fuel our nation's economic engine.

In the recession of the early 1990s, our country increased benefits five times. Today, our unemployment rate has soared to 6 percent, and Congress and the president have extended benefits only once. And once is not enough.

Extending unemployment insurance is not only the right thing to do for Americans in tough economic times, it's also smart economic policy. Every dollar we provide to the unemployed will be spent many times over. According to the Department of Labor, a dollar invested in unemployment insurance generates $2.15 in our economy.

Now, some will say we don't have enough in the Treasury to extend benefits. But we do. The money is there. $24 billion sits in the unemployment insurance trust fund created for this very purpose, to help Americans when they lose their jobs. That's enough to pay for the Senate-passed bill five times over and much more than enough to cover another 13-week extension.

Tonight, time runs out on the unemployed. But we can start the clock all over again in the new year. The Senate, the House and the president should make a joint new year's resolution that the first order of business in the 108th Congress will be to pass a meaningful 13-week extension of unemployment insurance.

We owe hardworking Americans and our own economy nothing less in the new year. It will come too late for this holiday season, but it's never too late to do the right thing.

I'm Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. Thank you for listening. And I wish you and our country a peaceful and happy new year.

SENATORS HARKIN (D-IA) & LIEBERMAN (D-CT) HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE OPPOSING PRESIDENT BUSH'S PROPOSED FUNDING LEVELS FOR EDUCATION, 1/8/2003

CLINTON: And you keep talking a good game, and you keep doing the photo-ops.

And then in a few years you say, "What did we tell you? Public education just can't make it. There's no point in continuing to put money into public education. Let's just wash our hands of it right now, and go straight to vouchers. Let's privatize education because you know we tried -- we tried so hard, we put the little red schoolhouses in front of the Department of Education. We had all of these little photos-ops all over America. We just talked and talked about how important this was. And guess what? It couldn't happen. Because, you know, we do have a lot of children who are coming from extremely poor surroundings, who don't even have, you know, a parent in the home, let alone two parents, who don't know where their next meal is coming from, who English is not the first language. And yet, you know, we just couldn't do it. So let's just give up on this public education enterprise."

Now, I'm telling you that's what's coming. The unfunded mandate is going to be followed, probably after the election of '04, with a claim that, "You know, we tried so hard. We did everything we could. And, you know, we just can't fix it."

Well, what I think we're trying to say here today is we're not giving up in this legislation. But more importantly, we're not giving up on public schools and we're not giving up on our children. And anybody who thinks we are is in for a fight.

Thank you very much.

(APPLAUSE)

HARKIN: Great way to close this...

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: Superintendent, you're the person on the front lines who does the actual hard work.

HARKIN: I thank my colleagues for being here.

I want to note that Senator Kennedy, but for an illness in the family, obviously, would have been here today.

And secondly, Jeff Bingaman mentioned our departed colleague, Paul Wellstone. Paul and I had many discussions during the development of this legislation. He went one way on it and I went the other and supported it. But he always said, as Jeff said, he didn't think that the resources would be there from the administration.

Next week -- I think it will be next week, anyway -- when the budget comes up next week, the appropriations bill comes up, we'll be offering an amendment that will bring this money back up to the level. It'll be $4.5 billion more than what we had when I was chairman. It'll be $4.5 billion more. And I'm going to call it the Paul Wellstone amendment.

(APPLAUSE)

With that, we'd be -- thanks to all my colleagues for staying here to answer questions. OK if we have any questions?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

HARKIN: I can only speak for myself. Senator Durbin and I have spoken about this in terms of these unfunded federal-type mandates, that if the money is not there, then why should we continue to impose these on our local schools? Perhaps we ought to suspend it. Not get rid of the bill, but just suspend it until such time as we're willing to meet our commitments. I agree with Senator Durbin on that. Again, I'm just speaking for myself.

(UNKNOWN): I do, as well. I think that's exactly the way to go.

CLINTON: Well, I would hope we wouldn't get to that point.

You know, I believe in accountability. I am strongly in favor of the philosophy behind this legislation that was developed under Jim Jeffords' leadership and the Health Committee and Senator Kennedy's strong advocacy and so many of us who've worked on these issues for so long.

But I will not be part of perpetuating a fraud on either our children or the American people. And I think that's what it really comes down to. I'm not going to act as though we did something to help this superintendent and school districts throughout my state when, in fact, I know all we've done is transfer a huge tax burden on their backs, which in a high-tax state, like mine, is an unbearable burden.

So I'm going to watch it very closely.

CLINTON: But I certainly think that, you know, my colleagues are on the right track in pointing out what we think would have to be the consequences were this not to be changed.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

(UNKNOWN): Well, I will, without hesitation, say I will oppose it.

(UNKNOWN): Same, I'm not going to support that. Again, I'm not going to support this, what the president's proposed, $36.4 billion in the first year and what we can do with that in education.

I tell you, ask just about any American citizen out there -- ask their families, school board members, principals -- which they think is the best priority for America. This is where our priority's at. No, I'm not going to support that.

(UNKNOWN): I don't either. This is one year we're talking about there. This isn't the full amount of the bill.

You could make a case that double-taxation on dividends intellectually may have some merit. But the idea that you'd take some $600 billion off the table to provide a tax benefit for 10 percent of the beneficiaries, while simultaneously we're talking about a war in Iraq and devastating problems at home, not to mention staggering state budgets, a problem in education, a problem in education, a problem in transportation, problems in the environment, problems in health care, one has to ask one self, where is this administration's head? Where do they think the money's going to come from?

We're just driving up deficits, once again, in this country, crowding out private capital, causing mortgage rates to go up, college payments to go up, car payments to go up. That's a tax increase on average citizens.

So this ought to be defeated soundly, in my view. And the administration ought to be, by the way, temporarily set aside its commitment to provide additional tax decreases that were adopted in 2001, in my view, as well. These are priorities that are absolutely essential if America's going to succeed in the 21st century.

There's no more important or more fundamental issue than the issue of education. This is an issue that more people talk about in America, politically, but do less about, in my view.

We contribute less than about 2 percent of our federal budget, the entire federal budget, to elementary and secondary education. We're only contributing about four or five cents, six cents maybe out of a dollar for the education of children at the elementary and secondary schools.

There are 55 million kids who went to school in America today; 50 million of them went to a public school; 5 million went to a private or parochial school. Let me just second what Senator Clinton said earlier. I have no doubt in my mind what this administration's about. This administration's about destroying public education. It's about guaranteeing in the future that we're going to have nothing but vouchers for private and parochial schools. The American people need to understand that while we may not be happy with the quality of public education, we need to get together to fix it and not to destroy. And this administration, by cutting back on the funds and walking away from it, is doing just that.

And so, we need to put aside these tax cut ideas and start investing America's wealth in areas that are going to be critically important for our well-being. And none is more important than this one, the education of the 21st-century adults of this nation. And we are short-changing them if we don't do it. That's why we're going to fight as hard as we can.

Thank you all very much.

PRESS CONFERENCE WITH SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY) AND SENATOR HARRY REID (D-NV), 1/9/2003

LOCATION: SENATE RADIO/TELEVISION GALLERY, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, thank you very, very much. You know, last year we created the new Homeland Security Department, but creating this new department without the right components or resources is like building a hospital without hiring doctors or nurse, and without properly filling this hollow shell we will be no closer to a safer, more secure America.

On the first day of the 108th Congress, I introduced the Homeland Security Block Grant Act, which I introduced before, which would provide direct funding to our communities -- our police officers, our fire fighters, our emergency responders. That was my first order of business, because I believe these people are our front-line homeland defenders, and they deserve more help than they've gotten so far.

Also at the top of my list is improving the safety and security of our nation's nuclear power plants, which is why I am so pleased to be here once again standing with my friend and colleague, Senator Harry Reid, to reintroduce the Nuclear Security Act. We are introducing this legislation because not enough was done in last year's homeland security bill to improve nuclear power plant security. We are reintroducing it because my constituents in New York, as well as people around the country who live near one of these plants deserve to have the assurance we've done everything we possibly can to hold these plants to the highest safety and security standards.

New York has six nuclear power plant, and we have millions of people living near one of these plants. In fact, our plants at Indian Point -- very close to where I live in Westchester County -- are in the most highly populated area of our country that has a nuclear power plant. And I have to tell you every time I go shopping or go anywhere in Westchester County, the first question that I am asked is about Indian Point: Are these safe? Is it safe that we can, you know, feel assured that if something terrible were to happen it would be taken care of?

We need new and higher security standards. We need to test the security at the plants, including government run, force on force, mock terrorist exercises. We need highly trained and very well equipped security personnel in adequate numbers to defend these plants at times of heightened states of alert, and we need to assure that the evacuation plans and emergency response and preparedness programs are acceptable.

Now, here is why Harry and I are even more concerned today than we were when we first started working on this at the end of 2001. A recent survey of NRC employees -- Nuclear Regulatory Commission -- shows that one third of employees, quote, "question the agency's commitment to safety, and almost half say they do not feel it is safe to speak up at the NRC." That's according to today's Washington Post.

The Post goes on to say: "Although almost 90 percent of the agency's executive-level employees answered favorably to questions regarding the commission's commitment to safety, less than two thirds of those in the mid-level ranks said the same." And a recent report by the NRC's inspector general found, quote, "NRC appears to have informally established an unreasonably high burden of requiring absolute proof of a safety problem before it will act to shut down a power plant."

And, to top it all off, according to a piece in the New York Times earlier this week, the NRC has ruled that the risk of terrorism is too speculative to be considered when making nuclear reactor licensing decisions. Now, this is hard to take. I don't know what is "speculative," number one, about an attack that we suffered within miles of these nuclear power plants outside New York City. Nor is it speculative to be concerned about what we found in the caves of Afghanistan, which included drawings of nuclear power plants. Nor is it speculative to be concerned about the information we have received from some of the interrogations of suspects with respect to al Qaeda future plans and learn that yes indeed power plants are on their target list.

I will be requesting that the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, along with Harry, and I hope other of our colleagues, will hold hearings to determine whether the NRC is putting the interests of the industry it regulates above the interests of safety and security at our plants.

I am also very concerned that the idea of the revisions to the basic threat that were supposed to have been done a year ago, have not been accomplished yet. Earlier this week the NRC issued an order to all nuclear power plants to enhance facility access authorization, and it took the NRC almost 14 months after September 11th to take this simple, common-sense step toward increasing security. The NRC is simply taking too long. It is either unwilling or unable of its own accord to take the steps necessary to give us the assurance we need.

So that is why that although today we are introducing the compromise bill that passed the committee last year, we view this as a starting point. And we will continue to follow this extremely closely. And we are especially concerned that our initial emphasis on trying to federalize the security force at these plants was met with such a wall of resistance by the energy industry, as well as the NRC -- and then we find out from reports done by the industry itself that security guards do not feel they could adequately defend the Indian Point Plant -- and there are indeed other places in the country where this was true as well. That's why earlier this week Senators Reid, Jeffords and I asked the General Accounting Office to look into the security guard issue. And we will be coming forward with additional plans as we get into the legislative session. But I think it's a little bit of a sad commentary that Senator Reid and I are here today reintroducing this legislation with even more evidence that we have to do something, because the industry and the NRC are not doing enough.

SEN. REID: If this were the only article that appeared dealing with the security of our plants, then maybe we shouldn't be as alarmed. But this is not the only article that deals with the security of our nuclear facilities. Workers question NRC's pledge on safety. The result -- the reason we have this is these workers know we have tried to do something about it.

I was criticized for referring to the people that guard these plants as "rent-a-cops." Well, I didn't mean to denigrate the people that worked in these plants, but I wanted to make the point. That point is that the people who are guarding our nuclear facilities have one standard at one plant, another standard at another plant. They are security that you hire for the lowest bid. That's not a good way to protect these most volatile facilities, nuclear reactors.

The tragedy of September 11th I think taught us many things, and that's an understatement. It taught us the vulnerability of our nation's buildings, and I hope indicated that we should have some resolve. Well, we've in many circles talked a good game, but really haven't done all that we need to do about it. We have directed attention, as we should, to the first responders, the brave men and women who arrive at the scene of these emergencies. And they still have the responsibility in state and local government, but very, very, very few federal resources.

Finally, we are reminded that we must be prepared for today's threats, because today's threats become tomorrow's attacks.

Last year we introduced, as Senator Clinton indicated, legislation to improve the safety of our nation's nuclear facilities. A year has passed -- nothing's happened. That's not acceptable.

Recent reports by the NRC and the inspector general's office paint a bleak picture of the NRC's commitment to safety and certainly to security. This doesn't help. A few days ago the inspector general released a survey -- another survey, one dealing with NRC employees -- and we talked about that at some length this morning.

What will this legislation do? It will establish a task force, chaired by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, to take a comprehensive look at the security of our nation's facilities. It will assign a new federal security coordinator to each nuclear plant. Now, it will not federalize that plant, even though there are some of us who believe that should be done. But it will provide a federal security coordinator to make sure they are doing each -- doing the right thing at each plant. There will be some agreement as to what should be done at each plant -- not a facility having one standard and another facility having another. It will establish a new anti-terrorism team, which will provide additional support to the additional private security forces. It will require the NRC to update the threats to nuclear power plants. It will require the NRC to make a comprehensive review of emergency and security plans. It will require the NRC to establish a new threat level system for nuclear power plants. It will require a new rigorous program to test nuclear facilities against realistic threats, as Senator Clinton has outlined.

In developing this legislation, we have listened to the concerns of the people that work there -- the guards and others -- instead of the nuclear power industry. It's time for this administration to live up to its commitment to make our nation's nuclear power plants more secure. They should join with us. This should be legislation that they support wholeheartedly. Why wouldn't they? These power plants are aging, their old. When they were constructed, there was never any idea that someone would try to do an act of terrorism and cause damage.

You know, we are now talking about a conflict perhaps in North Korea. Do you know why we are backing away among other reasons for a military strike on facilities there? Because of what would happen if that terribly poisonous substance were released. The winds blow toward South Korea. It would be devastating to hundreds of thousands, if not millions of people. That's what we are talking about here -- six power plants in New York, power plants all over the country adding up to over 100. And we have inadequate security. Do you think that we enjoy standing here and broadcasting to the world that our nuclear power plants have inadequate facilities? We don't enjoy that. We don't think that's the right thing to do. But how else are we going to focus attention on something as necessary to the security of this country? The only way we can do it is talk to you folks. Hopefully you will write something about this. This is something that needs to be done, and we shouldn't be the lone rangers out here talking about it. We should have the support of the soon-to-be Secretary Ridge and the entire administration saying, Yeah, that's a good idea -- how are we going to accomplish it?

We would be happy to take questions.

Q Haven't you reached out to Ridge or other members, Senate Republicans?

SEN. REID: The answer --

Q And what kind of bipartisan support --

SEN. REID: The answer is yes. But the administration is focused on how much it is going to cost. It will cost some money to do it right -- not a great deal, but it will cost some money. And we have had a blow-back that anything that costs money -- Fritz Hollings has had the same problem with port security. The answer is yes.

SEN. CLINTON: I would point out that we were able to get a compromise version of this legislation through the EPW committee, and couldn't get any further than that. But we are going to try again.

But I want to underscore Harry's point. You know, this is one of those issues that is really hard to talk about or to contemplate. And I am very frustrated that somehow the administration believes it can do what needs doing with respect to our security without spending any money in order to get it done -- or without asking any industry to do more on its own -- not just the nuclear power industry. We had a chemical plant bill that didn't get anywhere, because the industry was against it. This is very troubling to me. You know, securing our borders, securing potential targets, is everybody's business, and it should be a joint government-business partnership to get it done. But, here we are talking about this 15 months later.

SEN. REID: Let me say this: The people of Nevada -- rather than having a $700 billion tax cut would rather have a $120 million spent over the next five years to make sure that nuclear power plants are safe. What would any person -- you don't have to answer it -- but what would rather have? A $700 billion tax cut or making sure our nuclear power plants are safe? It costs $120 million -- that's not a figure we made up, we got it from the Congressional Budget Office -- $120 million versus $700 billion in tax cuts -- and most of the tax cuts of course go to the rich.

Q What are the prospects of this coming up before the committee soon?

SEN. REID: Well, you know, we don't run the committee anymore. You'll have to ask others. We're going to do everything we can -- that's why we are here today so early. This in my opinion is an emergency.

SEN. CLINTON: You know, one thing I am told will come up before the committee is the extension of something called the Price Anderson Act. That is a guarantee by the taxpayers of America to insure nuclear power plants, because of course they are uninsurable, and there have been historically a commitment to nuclear power that told the energy industry, We'll stand by you, we'll clean up after you, we'll make you whole. When that provision comes up for reauthorization, I think a number of us will be raising these additional questions. If the American public is the financial guarantor of potential losses arising out of nuclear power plant shutdowns, accidents or attacks, or the industry that runs them, where's the equation that includes public safety and security? So it's something that I think we'll have a chance to raise, but of course we have to get some support for it.

SEN. REID: I haven't had a chance to tell you this, but I understand they're trying to work this in -- Price Anderson -- in one of their appropriation bills.

SEN. CLINTON: Yeah. You know, I mean, it really is frustrating. And I think we have to do a better job of explaining to the American public who really gets the dividends out of this administration. I think there's a great dividend in making us safer from nuclear power plant accidents and potential attacks. Clearly they don't see it in that way. So the dividends and the benefits of their policies go elsewhere, and I think that's an unfortunate trade-off, and a bad choice for America.

Thank you all very much.

CONGRESSIONAL PRO-CHOICE CAUCUS NEWS CONFERENCE, 1/22/2003

PARTICIPANTS: SENATOR BARBARA BOXER (D-CA); SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY); SENATOR BARBARA MIKULSKI (D-MD); REPRESENTATIVE DIANA DEGETTE (D-CO)

TOPIC: THE 30TH ANNIVERSARY OF ROE VERSUS WADE

LOCATION: THE CAPITOL, THE SENATE RADIO/TV GALLERY, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. CLINTON: Oh, Barbara, thank you very much.

Well, I want to thank my colleagues and I want to thank Congresswoman DeGette also for being with us here to commemorate this anniversary, but also to sound an alarm because I think that the assault on -- the fundamental right of privacy that was guaranteed in the Roe decision is under attack from all directions. And as you've already heard from my colleagues, this is not just a debate over the future of Roe or even over the future of abortion. This is a debate over the fundamental right of privacy and the rights of women to make decisions about what is best for themselves and their families.

Now, if this were only a debate about abortion, I think that we would still be here and we would be very concerned about the efforts to undermine it through judicial appointments and other means. But what I want the American people to recognize is that it goes far beyond that. A number of us have worked on legislation to improve women's and children's health. And in this past two years, we championed legislation like the Women's Health Act. We fought for the Office of Women's Health at the Department of Health and Human Services to provide new resources so that women would have access to quality prenatal care. I was proud to cosponsor, along with my other colleagues, the Mothers' and Newborns' Insurance Act, which would have provided health coverage for low-income, pregnant women under the Children's Health Insurance Program administered by the states.

We supported equity in prescription insurance and contraceptive coverage provisions, and we were supporting our women in the military who are denied access to reproductive health care in American hospitals overseas even with their own private funds. Yet, even with strong bipartisan support, we could not pass these bills, because the forces that do not want women to have the right to privacy when it comes to the most fundamental human right, control over one's body, were also against all of these other bills that would advance women's health because -- guess what -- women come in a whole package, and we have reproductive health issues as well as, you know, problems with every other organ in our body.

Now I think what we're trying to say today is that we have made real progress over the last 10 years in recognizing the importance of the right of privacy, and we've also seen the decline in the number of abortions. I think that's great news, because, along with Senator Mikulski, I believe abortion should be legal, safe and rare. My husband first started talking about that in 1992. That has been the hallmark, and under a pro-choice president, we saw the rate of abortions going down. So we were doing something right in this country, because, for all kinds of reasons, women were making choices that were right for themselves.

Now I'm concerned, though, that this effort on the part of this administration to turn the clock back not only affects American women but affects women around the world. The reinstitution of the global gag rule, the continuing effort to deny family planning funds for impoverished women in nations around the world, is a terrible signal to send. It will not help the women who are most vulnerable. It will not prevent back-door, back-alley abortions. It will instead increase once again the injury and death that flows from the lack of access to contraception and the lack of access to legal and safe abortions.

So we have a lot at stake in this. And I know there are many women who have grown up with Roe v. Wade and cannot imagine that they could be living in a place that would deny them access to family planning; that they could have a government, like we do now, that takes information off of websites about contraception; or that they could see the end of their fundamental right of privacy. But this -- make no mistake about it -- is the agenda of this administration and their allies in Congress, and we want to sound the alarm.

REP. DEGETTE: Thank you. I'm Congresswoman Diana DeGette from Colorado, and I'm the co-chair of the Pro-Choice Caucus in the House.

I'm very pleased to join with my Senate colleagues today in our commitment to preserving all of the freedoms that Roe versus Wade, which was decided 30 years ago today, have given us.

Since August of 1995, the U.S. House of Representatives has voted to restrict a woman's right to choose 43 times. I've seen recent polls that show, while the majority of American women are strongly pro-choice, they also don't believe that their right to choose will be taken away. Well, guess what: they better start worrying, and they better start worrying today, because now we have an anti-choice leader in the House, we have an anti-choice leader in the Senate, and we have an anti-choice president in the White House. No longer is there a stopgap to a woman's right to choose being taken away.

We expect to see in this Congress a number of bills pass in the U.S. House which restrict a woman's right to choose. But this issue is much broader than simply eating away at the edges. It's broader than restricting a medical procedure or instituting a so-called conscience clause. What this is about is a concerted effort to have a number of votes in the House, which will then go to my colleagues in the Senate. But the ultimate goal is to get members of Congress used to voting anti-choice, so that when judicial nominees are brought to these women in the Senate, they believe -- the anti-choice extremists in this country believe that they will be able to get anti-choice judges and even a justice to the Supreme Court confirmed.

There has not been a moment in history where choice is more at risk than it is today. And I think the women of America can no longer say to their daughters and to their granddaughters that they will have the right to choice. It's time for a wake-up call to America, women, on today, the 30th anniversary of Roe versus Wade. They need to get active. They need to let their representatives and senators know choice is important.

And as my colleagues said, it's not about abortion. It's about a woman's right to make her own decisions about her own body. That is at risk today, and that's why we are sounding the trumpet call to get active to American women.

The Pro-Choice Caucus in the House intends to not just fight against these restrictions against choice. We have a pro-active agenda; we will work with our Senate colleagues to make sure birth control is protected and expanded to make abortions rare and also to codify Roe versus Wade so that our granddaughters will know that they have the same protections that people like me have been able to grow up with.

And with that, I think we're ready to take any questions.

SEN. BOXER: Am I hearing a question? Okay. Thank you all.

REP. DEGETTE: Thank you all very much.

Q Senator Clinton?

SEN. CLINTON: Yes?

Q Can I ask you a question about Iraq?

SEN. CLINTON: A question on Iraq?

Q There's been increasingly harsh rhetoric out of the White House. Yesterday, President Bush going so far as to say, you know, "This looks like a rerun of a bad movie; I'm not interested in watching it." How does that, you know, help or hurt the cause? What do you feel about the change of rhetoric coming out of the White House? Is it a damaging campaign out of the administration on, you know, convincing the American people that this is the right cause, this is the right course?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I believe that the president still has to make his case to the American people with respect to any action that might be taken. And I also believe that we should give the inspections time to work. They may or may not, in the end, be able to do the job of disarming Saddam Hussein in a very difficult environment, but they have been making some progress. And I want to see that played out. So, I voted for the Iraqi resolution. I consider the prospect of a nuclear-armed Saddam Hussein who can threaten not only his neighbors but the stability of the region and the world a very serious threat to the United States. But I do think that the inspectors should be given every means necessary to be successful, and we ought to play this out for a while longer.

SEN. BOXER: Thanks very much.

Q Do you think it helps or it hurts that this kind of tone is coming out of the White House?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I'm not going to comment on that. I'm going to speak for myself.

SEN. BOXER: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR KENT CONRAD (D-ND) HOLDS NEWS CONFERENCE ON THE BUSH ECONOMIC STIMULUS PLAN, 1/22/2003

CLINTON: Well, thank you very much, Senator Conrad, for your leadership on the issue of the economy and fiscal discipline.

And today, as we know, the president traveled to St. Louis to pitch the benefits of his economic plan to small businesses. He talked about how that plan would reach 23 million small businesses and how this proposal was good for small business and good for the economy in the long term.

But let's be clear: The president likes to say he is thinking big and helping small business. But what he's really doing is thinking small and helping big business. There isn't any other conclusion that you can draw if you look behind the rhetoric and the photo opportunities.

In the president's proposal there is one provision that would benefit every small-business owner, unlike the upper tax cut bracket. And there is that one, and that would be to increase the amount small businesses can deduct for investment in technology, machinery and equipment from $25,000 to $75,000.

CLINTON: That is a good idea, and it's actually a stimulative idea. But that's it as far as good ideas that will actually stimulate economic growth when you look at the entire plan with respect to small businesses.

But this provision accounts for less than 1.5 percent of the total cost of the president's package. So that's a very small amount of help for small businesses, no matter how many times they say it or how many photo-ops they stage.

We can do better than that. After all, our nation was built by and is still fueled by small businesses. My late father ran a very small business. And I understand completely how these are the people who are the backbone of what makes America work.

And it is unfortunate that once again we've got this shell game going on, because we really have to stop and ask ourselves, what are our priorities?

And every time we hear the president or anyone talking about his economic package we should pierce through the rhetoric to really understand what the priorities are.

I mean, do we want to use $364 billion to end the tax on dividends? Or do we want to use those dollars elsewhere? Do we want to continue to pass on unfunded mandates to the states, like Medicaid, like Leave No Child Behind education? Do we want to sell short the needs for homeland security?

Well, that's what's happening when the president goes to St. Louis and talks about small business and really gives very, very little to small businesses compared to the other priorities that small business and all Americans actually have.

In fact, I think you could argue that ending taxes on dividends has a direct impact on small business. It will attract investment dollars away from small businesses into corporate stocks that issue tax-free dividends.

It will mean, combined with the deficit, longer-term, high interest rates in a couple of years. It will make borrowing more expensive for small businesses, it will mean states and cities have to try to plug holes and raise taxes, and I think you will actually conclude that this policy that the president's proposing is truly bad for small businesses.

So I think what we're asking is a little truth in lending here. You know, let's make sure we get full disclosure about what's actually in this plan, who it really helps and what the impact on small businesses would be.

CLINTON: The president told small business leaders to meet him in St. Louis, and that he would present them with an economic plan that would provide long-term growth for years to come. But as far as I can tell, he just gave them the small old song and dance about tax cuts, and he sold our economic future right down the river.

CONRAD: Senator Corzine?

CORZINE: Thank you, colleagues and Senator Conrad, for the presentation made. I think it's clear. And being the fourth speaker I'm just going to accentuate a couple of points that others have talked about.

First of all, I think this is clearly an anti-growth package. If you take into consideration its impact on our state and local governments, the negative impact, with their $90 billion of deficits and their raising taxes, there's an offset to anything that's going on in 2003 to stimulate the economy.

I have yet to find the economist who is arguing that the dividend exclusion is going to create any impetus toward growth. Certainly in the short run and in the long run the critical weight is that this is just rearranging who gets what in the American economic system, and most of that, if you look at it, ultimately goes to the people at the top 5 percent of the system.

I can tell you that this point with regard to small business -- and I think the visual charts probably tell you the most -- but even by their own numbers there are 23 million small businesses, give or take a few, in America, and 18 million will get $500 or less, based on the filings that have come out of the IRS and their own analysis of the Treasury, 18 million of those 23 million.

And when you're talking about this 500 businesses that are included in the top tax bracket, you're really talking about S-corps, partnerships, partnerships like one maybe I worked for for better part of 30 years, hardly small businesses in any kind of context. The flow-through concept of how you get classified as a small business is just preposterous, and it is disingenuous to a fault, and it is through and through in how this argument is being framed to the American people.

REMARKS AT THE U.S. CONFERENCE OF MAYORS, 1/23/2003

CLINTON: Thank you all.

(APPLAUSE)

Thank you. Thank you very much, Mayor Garner, it's always a pleasure to be with you. And thank you for that kind introduction.

I'm delighted to be here again. I want to salute Mayor Menino who has done a tremendous job as the president of the U.S. Conference of Mayors. He's been haunting the halls of the Capitol. I know he has worked tirelessly with all of you to make sure that the needs of our cities are addressed, not just in the ordinary course of business with issues such as homelessness -- and we just heard a very powerful presentation about that from Mr. Mangano (ph) -- but in particular with respect to the new demands that you confront when it comes to homeland security.

And I want to personally thank Mayor Menino. I told him he had the quote of the day, "The wolf is at the municipal door." Well, there's no reason we have to let the wolf in, and we certainly don't have to just sit there looking out the window. We need to take action to drive the wolf away.

And one of the ways we can do that is by acknowledging the undue burdens that have been placed upon cities since September 11th. I appreciate my friend, Mayor Garner, talking about my taking up the cause of this legislation, but it was really your legislation.

When we met after September the 11th, it was already abundantly clear that the new strains that were going to be placed on city budgets because of additional burdens having to do with 9/11, then having to do with the horrible anthrax attacks, would mean that the cities had to have additional resources.

So working with you, working with this conference, working with your able executive director, Tom Cochran, we did what we could do, which was to put forth legislation that would guarantee money coming directly to the cities.

Now, so far, I have to confess, we haven't been successful, and for the life of me, I really don't understand why. It is obvious that our cities are the primary vulnerable targets when it comes to the war from the terrorist perspective. We know that great cities like Washington and, of course, New York, have already been attacked.

We also know that we've uncovered plans and information that other cities have been on the list of potential targets, yet we have not taken adequate measures to give you the resources you need.

We have certainly provided the resources that our men and women in military uniforms need, and I was very proud to support the additional dollars that were translated into better equipment and training and compensation, so that anybody who is on duty, defending our freedom anywhere in the world knows that we all stand behind him or her.

Yet our police and fire and our emergency responders are our front line soldiers here at home. And tomorrow, I will be releasing a study at John J. College (ph) in New York City that my staff has undertaken to try to determine exactly how much money our cities and counties have received to help them shoulder the burdens, and it will not surprise you to learn that the answer is not much.

So here we are, all these months later, and I believe that, at the top of our list, going forward, has to be the full funding of the homeland security block grant or some other formula. I have no pride of authorship. I just want to see the money get where it is most needed, and that is in your pockets, your budgets...

(APPLAUSE)

... your police departments, your fire departments...

(APPLAUSE)

CLINTON: I will confess to you that we are not only confronting budgetary problems with respect to homeland security, as you know so well, but the unfunded mandates that have come from our federal government over many years are now coming due with a vengeance. Not only do we face rising Medicaid costs, which affect many of you, we are facing freezes and potential cuts in Medicare budgets, which will affect hospitals in every size city. We know that the requirements of Leave No Child Behind are not being funded with the federal dollars that have been promised. And for now nearly 30 years, we haven't fully funded special education as promised.

We can add up all of these unkept promises. They are bipartisan unkept promises. They go back decades. But the net result is that the decreasing revenues that you confront because of the slowdown in the economy are made even worse because of the ongoing budgetary demands.

Now, I clearly believe that the homeland security issue deserves to be at the top of our list. I'm going to fight for general revenues of some sort coming to states and cities. I was very pleased that in the Senate, at least on a bipartisan basis -- I joined with Senator Rockefeller and Senator Collins to pass an increase in the federal matching rate for Medicaid; we're going to try that again. But we have to have a bipartisan agreement that funding is necessary during this time for the states and cities to avoid even more egregious cutbacks in services and increases in taxes.

You know, it is an irony that the cutting of federal taxes directly leads to, in most instances, the increasing of state and local tax burden. So from my perspective...

(APPLAUSE)

... the overall tax burden doesn't decrease, but it's not as visible, it's not as easy a target. And it used to be a bipartisan agreement going back into the '60s that when we had a downturn in the economy there would be an agreement to provide some countercyclical funding for states and cities. That was done away with and now we're in this dilemma about how we both provide some general relief and then specific funding for the kinds of challenges that you confront.

But it is possible. I am a perennial optimistic. As someone said, "If you had lived my life, you have to be a perennial optimistic"...

(LAUGHTER)

... and so, I am. And therefore, I believe...

(APPLAUSE)

... that this is immanently doable if we speak the truth about what is at stake.

You know, I sometimes refer to Washington as an evidence-free zone. And it is the case that the facts get lost in the argument and the rhetoric. We need you to bring those facts front and center.

And I applaud and thank you for the plan that you've put forth for economic security and stimulus. I will certainly look very carefully at it. These ideas will be put into action, Mr. Mayor, the best we can. We will look for the kind of bipartisan -- really nonpartisan support that should recognize that our cities are not only the engines of economic growth but also of recovery. And that it is not an accident that if we are confronted with future challenges and vulnerabilities when it comes to terrorism, that the primary targets are our cities which represent the true opportunity and potential of America; always have, always will. You are the stewards of that promise.

And I pledge to you that many of us will work with you from both sides of the aisle to make sure you get the resources you need to keep that promise to the people you represent.

Thank you all very much.

(APPLAUSE)

"Inside Politics," CNN, 1/24/2003

WOODRUFF: And we'll talk about that in just a minute. Candy Crowley, thank you very much.

Speaking of which, in New York today, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton took aim at the state of homeland security, saying the president's main idea in recent weeks, eliminating the dividends, tax will not save one police officer or make America more secure.

I spoke with Senator Clinton just a short while ago, and asked her if Tom Ridge is right, that the U.S. is safer now than it was before 9/11.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CLINTON: Well, Judy, I think that Secretary Ridge has certainly worked very hard, and I was pleased to support him for this new position, but I would respectfully disagree.

I think that we have made progress, but we have not done nearly enough to put the resources behind our planning and our rhetoric, and we certainly haven't done enough to make sure that, at our local community level, that the police and firefighters and emergency responders have the resources necessary to be our frontline soldiers, which, indeed, they are today.

WOODRUFF: And whose responsibility is it? Whose fault is it that that has not taken place?

CLINTON: Well, I think it is a problem at the top. I know that, repeatedly, the Congress over the last two years has tried to appropriate the resources that we thought would be necessary to protect our ports, to protect our borders, to provide some direct funding to local communities, and we've not been successful. And even with the omnibus appropriations bill passed yesterday, the across the board cuts and some of the other decreases in spending are coming right out of the very programs that we should be beefing up in order to provide the kind of resources that I think security demands.

And certainly, when we look at the new Department of Homeland Security, they have a very long way to go to be in a position to better coordinate and provide the kind of leadership that we need nationally.

So across the board, I have to say that we aren't very much safer than we were on the morning of September the 11th.

WOODRUFF: Well, when it comes to funding, the president's budget director, Mitch Daniels, is now saying that the president is going to be unveiling substantial increases for Homeland Security in early February, in the next budget, and let me just read you something else.

He said, "We really cannot defend every square foot of America against every threat that some hateful person might concoct." He said, "we're going to have to get better at deciding what threats are most dangerous, most likely, and make sure we're putting our resources against them."

CLINTON: Well, Judy, I don't think anybody would disagree with the idea of prioritizing, but we haven't done very much at all.

I released a survey today where we asked the towns and cities around New York, from New York City to Buffalo, to tell us how much they've received in terms of federal help. And of the towns and cities responding, 70 percent said they haven't received a penny of federal help, and they're digging deep into their own budgets to protect their reservoirs, to respond to, you know, the anthrax scare that we had.

They're trying to deal with the problems that come from being near the borders, or being on a port, and, you know, it just is wrong to say that we can't defend everything, when I don't think we have defended enough yet.

Yes, we may have to make hard decisions, but this administration hasn't provided the funding that is needed.

WOODRUFF: Well, there are those, Senator, who say that when you and others charge that the Bush administration has not adequately funded and organized homeland security, that you are in effect setting this president up, and that if there were another terrorist attack, he would then be in a position to catch all the blame for it.

CLINTON: Well, I'm not interested in placing blame or pointing fingers. I'm interested in providing real security. And maybe I just feel more personally about this than some, because, after all, as a senator from New York, I have had the incredibly awesome experience of trying to help people who were directly affected by these awful attacks.

So today I tried to, once again, put our security needs front and center, and I'll look forward to hearing what the president has to say, but I think we have a long way to go before I honestly can tell my constituents that we are better prepared.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING
ON DEFENSE DEPARTMENT NOMINATIONS, 1/30/2003

CLINTON: No, I believe in the early bird rule.

PRYOR: Mr. Chairman, I don't have any questions.

CLINTON: I especially believe in (inaudible).

WARNER: To follow in the footsteps of a most distinguished, most beloved father with whom I had a strong, wonderful friendship and he often did the same.

SPECTER (?): If I could just add one word about Senator Pryor's folks as well. My wife, Barbara and I are so close to David and Barbara Pryor and we have enjoyed serving with them and I sort of use the word "them" advisedly. When David was a Senator, he made a major contribution to the Senate. He's just a wonderful, warm human being and made a major contribution to the security of this country.

He was somebody who asked some very tough, pointed questions, very useful, very essential that questions be asked of the type that your dad asked. We are just delighted that you, Mark Pryor, are on this committee.

WARNER: I'd like to associate myself with those remarks.

Now, Senator Clinton, we welcome you to the committee.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I apologize for not being here earlier. I, too, was at another event, but I appreciate the opportunity to be here at the first public hearing of this committee that I am honored to serve on now. I welcome the two nominees and look forward to working with you in the years to come on these important matters that assuming you are and I believe you will be confirmed will be within your area of jurisdiction and oversight.

Mr. McHale, on January 21, National Public Radio aired a story about how the military buildup for Iraq is moving firefighters, police officers and emergency response personnel from the front lines here at home in the war on terrorism to the front lines in the Middle East.

Last night CNN ran a similar piece. A number of local officials from Utah to West Virginia to San Antonio say that as many as 10 percent of their first responders may also be in the Reserves. I know that in New York City, 300 of our firefighters are also in the Reserves.

This creates a tremendous dilemma, as I know you are well aware and as Senator Talent was raising with you earlier, because on the one hand, I do not believe we are yet giving our local communities enough resources to take on the additional responsibilities imposed by their new challenges with respect to homeland security. And at the same time, they are going to be losing maybe up to 10 percent.

Certainly in New York we have in some communities even higher than that of the resources they need and yet they, under law, will continue to pay those people, as they should, to keep that job open, as they must, so something is going to have to give here, because we are going to be putting many of our local communities at greater risk, not only for the potential of threats from terrorists, but just in the ordinary everyday work that they are supposed to be doing.

Do you have any idea at this point how many police, firefighters, EMTs; public health officials are being called up?

MCHALE: Senator, I don't. As a private person looking at the prospect of returning to public service, I would anticipate that that kind of information probably is available. I don't know if they have it immediately available, but I think it certainly could be identified through the assistant secretary of defense for reserve affairs, where occupational backgrounds would routinely be maintained as a matter of record.

I can tell you that up until about two or three months ago, after I left Congress and went back to the drilling reserve in the Marine Corps and I was the assistant division commander of the Fourth Marine Division, that's the reserve ground combat division in the Marine Corps Reserve, and just anecdotally, we had many firefighters, many police officers.

I, in fact, read your speech at John Jay College and I am aware of your concerns. I think the Department of Homeland Security as opposed to the Department of Defense will probably have to engage more immediately on that issue than would be the situation for the Department of Defense.

It's a national problem. As an American citizen, I obviously have a concern for the issue that you raised. As a potential official in the Department of Defense, our role would be to support, if I were to be confirmed, the Department of Homeland Security, we would provide unique and extraordinary capabilities to those first responders.

We would have a statutory obligation to transfer to those first responders improvements in technology that might be coming out of the Department of Defense so that if the department developed a technology that was primarily aimed at competency on the battlefield, but had a corollary benefit to first responders at home, that they would become aware of that technology as quickly as possible.

Forgive me if I have taken a tangent to your question, but while it is a vital national issue, the role of the Department of Defense in a supporting capacity would not directly interact with the issue that you have raised.

CLINTON: Well, what about, though, the utilization of Guard and Reserve in order to back up and fill in for some of these positions, because that certainly has been a role and responsibility as we all know who walk through airports and saw National Guards or at the Amtrak station in Penn Station in New York.

So, I think that the coordination is something that we have to watch very carefully and I would hope that in conjunction with the Department of Homeland Security, we would monitor this very closely, because there will be some places in the country that will be particularly hard hit. I don't know how we would fill the gap with 300 firefighters called up in New York City, for example.

So, that will be a continuing concern of mine and I hope that it will be an area in which you will, working with the Department of Homeland Security and the rest of DOD, perhaps come up with some suggestions for us.

MCHALE: Senator, what I can pledge to you is that if I am fortunate to be confirmed, I will talk to Tom Hall, who is the ASC for Reserve Affairs. I will attempt to determine if we have identified who are the first responders serving simultaneously as citizen soldiers.

We have to be acutely sensitive to that and there are two ways in which the Department of Defense is likely to become engaged in support of civil authorities.

One, if we have a unique capability, particularly in the area of WMD, and secondly, the secretary has said, if, in fact, civilian authorities in a given circumstance were to be overwhelmed as they were in terms of airport security immediately after September 11, the recognition of the fact that those civilian authorities had been overwhelmed would be a further justification for DOD engagement.

So, if that situation were to arise, although the president and the secretary would make the judgment call, the department, particularly the guard, would be prepared under those unusual circumstances, to back up the first responders.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. McHale. I also understand that now that the Coast Guard has been moved into the Department of Homeland Security, that there may be an increased role for coordination and oversight.

I was very interested -- you may not have this information at your fingertips, but you or perhaps someone else in DOD or homeland security could provide it, because we have just learned that the Pentagon is sending four Coast Guard cutters and two port security units to the Persian Gulf. Based on our research, this is the first deployment of Coast Guard patrol boats to DOD since Vietnam, so apparently, even though they are now in homeland security, they have been assigned, delegated to DOD.

This again raises resource issues. In New York, we count on Coast Guard facilities and personnel to guard our ports against terrorist threats. We're clearly not doing enough yet with the influx of container ships to try to have a level of port security, so I would perhaps look to you to provide some additional information or the appropriate person within DOD.

If I could, Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit some additional questions on this Coast Guard issue, because it is a very serious one, obviously to many states but particularly given the volume of traffic that we have in the New York port, it's a particularly pressing one.

U.S. SENATOR JUDD GREGG (R-NH) HOLDS HEARING ON SMALLPOX VACCINATION PLAN, 1/30/2003

CLINTON: Thank you for calling this important hearing. I think there are obviously going to be a lot of unanswered and maybe at this point in time unanswerable questions in the face of these new challenges. And I greatly appreciate the work that both CDC and NIH are doing to develop an adequate supply of medications for those who might have side effects, who suffer injuries, lost work time and other consequences as a result of the vaccination. And I do believe we need some kind of system to ensure that they are taken of and compensated.

I can't help but add that, of course, if we had a universal health care system, this wouldn't be as big a concern, but we're going to patch away at the old broken system, and it's just going to get creakier and creakier and squeakier and squeakier and leakier and leakier, and I think that the threat of terrorism combined with advances in the knowledge of the human genome which are going to tell us that we're all vulnerable and susceptible to something should prove to be a spur to our dealing with this issue on a much broader level.

But in the meantime, I hope that we will take seriously the challenges of providing adequate compensation. I've had a different but related experience with respect to the World Trade Center health effects on the workers and volunteers most directly involved. We did with bipartisan support set up a program at Mt. Sinai to begin to screen those people and we had our first report of the outcomes of those screenings, and we have very high percentages, in some cases 50 percent to 80 percent of decreased pulmonary and respiratory capacity, adult onset asthma and many other issues. And some of the people who were construction workers, utility workers, et cetera, don't have adequate insurance and don't have the capacity to either be screened or taken care of. So I just think this has to be put into a broader context.

And from my perspective, there's another related issue, which we've heard about in the news, which is that if we underfund this massive vaccination effort, then state and local public health departments will be picking up the cost, and some are already saying that they can't continue their work, the routine immunizations and other kind of public health work as well.

So I'm very much looking forward to working with the chairman and Majority Leader Frist, along with Senators Kennedy, Mikulski, Durbin and myself and our colleagues in the House to try to come up with a package of legislation that does address these very legitimate issues.

If I may, Dr. Fauci, I know that there isn't anyone who knows more and has worked harder on the HIV/AIDS challenge, and it's clear that we now have, not just with HIV/AIDS, but other conditions, including eczema in our population, a lot of immunosuppressed people, people who are more vulnerable to the side effects, and this is a concern that we all have because of not only those directly vaccinated but the potential contagion effect. What will the impact of these immunodeficiencies have on the number of injuries, deaths and side effects, as best as you're able to extrapolate?

FAUCI: Thank you for that question, Senator Clinton. It depends on the immunodeficiency. For example, if someone has a transplantation, they have a kidney or a lung or a pancreas or what have you, it's very clear and easy that they know they have it, so they would be immediately excluded from any pre-event vaccination program. Obviously, if there's a massive attack, we would be vaccinating them if they came into contact with a person, but we'd make sure we have a lot of Vaccinia Immune Globulin around. We have to do, and that's part of the program, serious questioning to go through the list: eczema, atopic dermatitis, are you on glucocorticoids, are you taking steroids for anything, do you have an immunosuppressed disease that's being treated, like lupus or rheumatoid arthritis, do you have cancer chemotherapy, all of those kinds of things.

There are other things that obviously are of concern is HIV. We need to question people: Is there any possibility that you may be at risk for HIV, and if you are to clearly go and get an HIV test. HIV is one of the immunosuppressive diseases that we have, and if someone is far advanced in HIV, then just inadvertently without knowing it, if they get vaccinated, they could be in trouble. So that's the reason why it's very clear in a vaccination program, which is why a pre-event program where you have the time to go through those multiple menus of contraindications would be very helpful in averting the vast majority of inadvertent vaccinations for someone who would have a contraindication. So we share your concern.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Dr. Gerberding, I recognize that there are studies of smallpox vaccine safety in children currently in progress in Cincinnati and Los Angeles; is that right?

GERBERDING: I'll have to defer to Dr. Fauci on that.

CLINTON: Is that right, Dr. Fauci?

FAUCI: The studies are not going on, Senator. As part of the vaccine program for the dilutional study of the Dryvax, which is now the product that is being used in its undiluted form in the program that Dr. Gerberding described, in the dilutional study if we were going to widely use diluted Dryvax, you have three general components of people: Those who've been previously vaccinated, that study is done; those who've never been vaccinated before, that study's been done.

The third component was in children, but when the clinical trial to determine if it actually was still immunogenic in children, was there any specific, unexpected toxicities in children, even though you wouldn't predict it because that's exactly the vaccine that you and I got when we were children, but nonetheless we needed to do the clinical trial.

When the clinical trial went before the IRB, the Cincinnati group felt that it was a reasonable approach, let's do it. The UCLA group said, "You know, we cannot determine on the basis of the codes that guide you as to whether or not you can do research in children whether the risk/benefit ratio for a child, given the current threat, we just can't make that determination as to whether or not we should go ahead with the trial."

So what they did is that they sent it back to the secretary, and there's a code of regulation that says they need to do that. The secretary then took the problem, had a -- sent it before of Office of Human Research Protection. They had a public comment period. Many of the comments came in with concerns that for children, since they, particularly infants, they have a greater incidence of serious effects, but they felt that it shouldn't go on.

In the meantime, it became clear that we were not going to be using Dryvax on children anyway, because the program would be excluding children, because it would be for health workers, first responders, et cetera. For that reason, the clinical trial in children with Dryvax has now been called off, and we're not going to do a clinical trial in children for this particular product.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON WORLD-WIDE THREATS TO U.S. SECURITY, 2/12/2003

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I want to thank you, Director Tenet and Admiral Jacoby for the hard work that you and your teams are doing.

I just have several questions that have not been addressed yet. In his State of the Union, President Bush proposed a Terrorist Threat Integration Center, a central location, as I understand it, where all foreign and domestically generated terrorist threat information and intelligence would be gathered, assessed and coordinated.

CLINTON: As I further understand it, it would include elements from the CIA, the FBI, the new Department of Homeland Security and the Department of Defense, but that the director would report to the director of Central Intelligence. So far, is that a correct description?

TENET: Yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: One of the difficulties that I still see us struggling with is the coordination between national agencies and sources of information with state and local law enforcement officials. I'm particularly concerned not only about what goes down, but what comes up and the fact that our front-line defenders, with respect to any terrorist attacks here on our own shores, are local enforcement personnel.

What steps are being taken as you design this department to ensure, first, that our local law enforcement officials will receive the information they need in a both timely and thorough enough manner; and secondly, that you will be receiving information?

As I just think about it, an overwhelming task. And, you know, I have to say clearly here in this committee we're focused on the external and international emerging threats and their connections with what goes on here at home, but I really do believe we have not given adequate support to our local law enforcement first responders. And we got to have an intelligence and information-gathering system that works far better than it ever used to in the past when, frankly, there were lots of conflicts as to what information, would or wouldn't be share.

So where are we in the planning of that, Mr. Tenet?

TENET: Be good if Director Mueller were here, but I'll tell you what I know.

CLINTON: Well, you will be the overall director, right?

TENET: This is an analytical component. And essentially what we want to do is, one, get all the threat information together, much as we do this morning, that has law enforcement feed and an intelligence feed, since it's all seamless, to make sure we have the right databases of all terrorist tracking database in one place that's available to state and local governments, to police forces, what we collect overseas, what we can hand over.

The third thing that we think we have to do a heck of a lot more of -- you've put your finger on something -- is give state and local police departments texture and understanding of what they look for, how they use their intelligence divisions, how they use the officer on the beat. This is a daunting challenge. This is something that the director of the FBI is taking on because of his rather direct relationship.

And what we're trying to do in creating this kind of an integrated analytical center is say, "There are lots of things that we can pass" -- you know, for example, we have an excellent relationship with New York City Police Department and the Washington police. Obviously, New York and Washington are special places. But we need to be able to pass to Milwaukee and Seattle and every place else in this country texture, understanding, text. You don't have to give up sources and methods or the human operator, but you need to give those men and women the opportunity to say, "What are we looking for when we go to orange?"

And there's an enormous amount of data -- and we've started doing it -- that we can push out the door about chemical and biological attacks, what to look for, how to protect. I mean, there's an enormous amount of data.

So one of our objectives is to have a place where we can push this out to law enforcement. The bureau can be the proper front end, but that we design more product for our state and local officials to understand what the threat specifically is without having to give up very much.

CLINTON: Well, this is an issue that concerns me greatly. And I look forward to continuing to receive updates on how this is occurring.

Secondly, Director Tenet, last month the BBC reported that British officials believe Al Qaida successfully built a crude radiological device, commonly referred to as a dirty bomb, in Afghanistan. What intelligence do we have regarding the veracity of this report from British intelligence?

And, Admiral Jacoby, if you have additional insight into this, I would appreciate hearing it.

TENET: I would say that BBC and British intelligence may be two separate entities.

We know they had a keen interest in developing a radiological device. And our whole thought process, analytically and operationally, is to prove the negative: that you didn't get one or you didn't get a nuclear weapon.

Now, I have never seen any reporting that suggests they successfully tested radiological device from any source, foreign, our own, the British. I've never seen that reporting. I can go back and check, but I've never seen that reporting. I'll go back and check, but I've never seen it, Senator.

CLINTON: Do you agree with that, Admiral Jacoby?

JACOBY: Yes, Senator. And we have found nothing in our operations in Afghanistan that would lead us back up that trail to suggest that they had achieved.

CLINTON: And finally, if I could, following up on Senator Bayh's point about the FARC, last week, the leader of Hamas, which obviously we know has carried out numerous bombings in Israel, released an open letter that said, "Muslims should threaten Western interests and strike them anywhere." This is a very new development, as I understand the history of Hamas, which has primarily been focused on fighting the Israeli government and the Israeli people.

To what extent does Hamas pose a direct threat now to Americans both here and abroad?

TENET: Well, you're quite correct about where their targeting has been focused on. I might have to go back and talk to Bob Mueller about what he perceives to be that threat here. But the way you isolated it at the beginning is exactly right.

Now, all of these groups -- you know, a group like Hamas in particular operates in the constrained geographic region where they have comparative advantages. But obviously, the concern would be how they migrate those here.

And I'll come back to you on that, Senator. I just don't know enough.

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON FY 2004 DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION, 2/13/2003

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Secretary, I want to follow up along the lines of what Senator Bill Nelson was asking, and also Senator Dayton, because I think that in connected ways they're focusing on the same issues with respect to how we're going to defend ourselves at home.

As I understand it, in response to the threat level being raised to orange, the Pentagon has deployed heat-seeking Stinger anti-aircraft missiles at strategic locations around Washington, D.C., and F-16s have been put on 24-hour alert in Washington, as well as deploying additional detection radars. Can you tell me whether similar steps have been taken in New York?

RUMSFELD: Senator, we don't talk about deployments, and I'd like to take a minute and explain why.

We change how we're arranged from a defensive and a deterrence standpoint from time to time with respect to combat air patrols, as I know you're familiar with how we're doing that with respect to the East Coast and other portions of the country. To the extent we announce them it demystifies the problem for others, the people who would attack. To the extent we regularize it, we demystify it.

So what we do is, we do things on a random -- not a random basis, on an irregular basis. It's not thoughtless, random. It is, in fact, irregular. And it's designed to do that to maximize the deterrent effect and to maximize our ability to defend at times when we believe the threat level requires it.

CLINTON: Well, I certainly understand and appreciate that, and would not want to have any specific information. But clearly some of what's been deployed around Washington is visible to the naked eye, and therefore we know it.

There has been no similar reports of anything visible to the naked eye with respect to New York. And since we also have reason to believe that New York and Washington remain at the top of the terrorist lists of targets, perhaps in another setting I could at least be advised as to what, if any, actions, irregularly or regularly, are occurring with respect to New York.

Let me just move on because I think that it ties into an ongoing concern of mine, which is the readiness of our first responders here at home, whether they are dealing with an Al Qaida attack, such as we saw on September 11th or a retaliatory attack in the wake of military action in Iraq. One of the problems that we are seeing surface, that I talked to now Assistant Secretary McHale during his confirmation hearing, is that many of the people who are being called up, who are pumped, who are ready to go are first responders, they're police officers, they're firefighters, they're EMTs, they're others who provide the first line of defense here at home.

Today I have sent a letter to you, Mr. Secretary -- and I'd like, Mr. Chairman, to make it a part of the record...

WARNER: Without objection.

CLINTON: ... requesting information as to the extent to which Reserve call-ups are impacting on our first responders.

Because as we go forward with the planning that I understand you're doing with respect to how we deal with Guard and Reserve forces, whether we confront redeployments of our end forces abroad, I think we have to recognize that if we're fighting a multi-front war, which we may very well be -- we're know we're fighting one here at home already, as well as against Al Qaida and there may be others to come -- we've got to be sure that our first responders, front-line defenders have adequate force strength.

And there are a number of reports that have surfaced in the press about what local officials are confronting. A number of mayors and county executives have said that as many as 10 percent of first responders are also in the Reserves. I know in New York City 300 of our firefighters are in the Reserves.

And we also know that the cost to our communities at a time of decreased budgets, and I would argue inadequate federal resources for our first responders, means that the police department in New York City spends more than $200,000 a week to cover their reservists and the fire department spends more than $100,000 a week. In a small community like Niagara Falls, police department spent $350,000 last year.

Nobody begrudges that. We want to continue to support our first responders. But I think as you look at the connections between what we have to be ready to do here at home, as well as our force abroad, I hope that you will take that into account.

And it's not only at the local level, clearly it affects Custom officials, FEMA officials, Secret Service and others.

And I will look forward to having a response to this letter, because I know this is an issue that you will have to look into. But I hope that it is part of what we go forward in planning.

And finally, General Myers, I am concerned, as I was when I was first lady, about the unexplained illnesses that many of our men and women returned from the Gulf suffering from. As you may know, I was asked by the president to look into this during the last part of the '90s, and we came up with a independent blue ribbon commission to investigate the issues raised by these undiagnosed illnesses and the treatment that many of our veterans received. And there was a final report submitted to the president in January of '97, including a slate of recommendations to ensure that Gulf War veterans received all the care that they needed.

With U.S. troops once again being deployed to the Persian Gulf, and without us really knowing what caused a lot of the problems, we look at a number of sources.

And I have to say, Mr. Chairman, I think this is an area that we want to go into in some depth here in this committee, because we're seeing the same thing with respect to the first responders who responded to ground zero. The combination of whatever was in the air when those buildings were attacked and collapsed has caused extraordinary respiratory, pulmonary dysfunction and distress. And we're only beginning to try to understand it.

And similarly when we saw our men and women coming back from the Gulf, we know that similar kinds of issues occurred. And now we have the added challenge of biological, chemical and radiological potential attacks, as well.

Now, a year ago, in February 2002, a GAO official testified before the House Veterans' Affairs Committee that while military medical surveillance policies had been established, much still needed to be done to implement the system. And I would hope that we could get a report, General Myers and Mr. Secretary, about what we are doing to ensure proper implementation.

Once somebody is a veteran it may be too late. So I'd like to make sure that our active duty forces are getting the surveillance that they need for medical monitoring and health tracking before being deployed to the Gulf so that we can know and have a better research base to understand what they have been and might be exposed to. And I look forward to getting that information.

RUMSFELD: Thank you.

CLINTON: Thank you.

WARNER: Thank you, Senator.

And I can speak from firsthand experience, having gone with you out to Walter Reed to, quietly in the evening, to visit the veterans that returned from Afghanistan, of the depth of your sincerity with regard to the subjects of which you speak. We thank you. And I do hope that you spearhead on this committee those efforts.

Senator Levin, I think we've conducted a very successful hearing.

If you have no further comments, we thank you, Mr. Secretary. We thank you, General. And we thank you, Dr. Zakheim.

END

COMMITTEE MEMBERS HOLDS A HEARING ON THE DOD BUDGET, 2/25/2003

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And Mr. Chairman, I listened carefully to Senator Nelson's questions about the Philippines. Will there also be additional information available about current involvement in Colombia, too, that the committee could be advised of?

WARNER: I will advise the senator there's no reason why that question could not be asked if you are able schedule-wise to join us at the closed session.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I want to start by thanking General Shinseki for his incredible work. General Shinseki has done a tremendous job on behalf of the Army, and I'm very grateful to his years -- his lifetime of service. And look forward to your continuing service in whatever form that takes.

Admiral Clark, in late January, the Pentagon announced that it was sending eight Coast Guard cutters and several port security units to the Persian Gulf. As I understand it, this is the first deployment of Coast Guard patrol boats overseas since the Vietnam War. Is that correct as far as you know?

CLARK: Actually, Senator, cutters have been deploying with us periodically and working up with us. Part of our agreements is that in time of crisis, they will come work for us. The only way to make that work is to periodically do it.

So they periodically are deploying with our carrier battle groups.

CLINTON: And what are the numbers that are currently deployed?

CLINTON: Do you have that?

CLARK: I'm sorry, I don't. We'd be happy to get that for you.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Admiral.

You know, because in New York, as well as many other coastal states and cities, we count on the Coast Guard to guard our ports against terrorist threats and other emergencies like the one we just had the other day with the explosion at Staten Island. The Coast Guard was the first responder. We couldn't have responded without their lead and assistance.

So I would like some additional information that I will submit to you in writing so that I have a better idea of the criteria that are used to deploy the cutters, how long they're expected to be deployed, and what are the missions that they perform, and how we anticipate replacing those functions that are going to be left behind as they deploy with you.

I want to ask each of the chiefs a question that has been a concern of mine for many years, ever since President Clinton asked me to look into the Gulf War Syndrome. And I went out to Bethesda. I went to Walter Reed. I met with a number of veterans who returned from the gulf suffering from unknown symptoms. And I became convinced in my own mind and based on the research that we were doing that this was real. This was something that had to be addressed. And the president, as you know, appointed a commission to do so.

Now, with U.S. troops being deployed again to the Persian Gulf, I know that you're spending a lot of time and attention trying to make sure that we don't send young men and women to war where they're out of harm's way in a conventional and traditional sense, but they return home debilitated and have to be separated from the service and have ongoing chronic health conditions.

So I would appreciate each of the services giving me a brief overview. And then I'd like to arrange a briefing that my staff is currently working on to get more in-depth information. Because clearly the February 2002 GAO report before the House Veterans Affairs Committee seemed to conclude that while military and medical surveillance policies had been established, still a lot needed to be done to implement the system. And I think we want to do everything possible to protect our troops this time around.

If I could just have a brief overview, comment, from each of the service chiefs about that. And then, as I say, I look forward to a more in-depth briefing.

General Shinseki?

SHINSEKI: Senator, I would say, first of all, we all share the concern coming out of the last gulf operation. And the conclusions were less conclusive than we would like. There was a variety of issues that continue today to be studied.

I think since that last operation, however, we have expanded our detection and sensing capabilities in some rather significant ways, not just in chemical, but also biological threats.

And I think we are concerned. We have gone back to look at what the conditions might have been then. We pay attention to it, better detection, better training. But still, there are a host of unknowns here exactly what the causes were of that gulf illness.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Admiral Clark?

CLARK: My problem is a little different than General Shinseki's. Our issue is providing fundamentally protective gear for attack at sea. And we have built in -- some built-in systems to protect our people inside the ships.

I would just tell you that we've made significant investments. In an open forum, I would put it this way: We've made significant investments and we're ready.

CLINTON: General Hagee?

HAGEE: We share your concern, Senator. As General Shinseki mentioned, we have vehicles, platforms out there that did not exist 10 years ago during Desert Storm, platforms that can identify and detect chemical and biological agents that are in the air and in the ground.

We have also collected information on every single one of our Marines so that we have a good medical data baseline to try to -- if anything happens -- to try to determine what change has occurred.

CLINTON: I really applaud you for that. And I hope that every service can move toward that. I think that's so -- we have found post-9/11 in New York the fire department had baseline screenings. The police department didn't. It's much more difficult to figure out what the exposures lead to when you don't know what the starting point was.

So I very much appreciate what the corps has done on that.

JUMPER: Senator, I agree with General Hagee. I think the baselining activity, plus the steps that have been set up to gather data around the locations, is much more sophisticated than we saw last time. And hopefully the root causes of these things can be determined in time to be of help.

CLINTON: Well, I think you.

And, Mr. Chairman, I think this has not only implications for our men and women in uniform, but rather significant civilian ramifications as well. And I greatly appreciate the chiefs taking this on as an issue. And I look forward to following with great concern what we learn and how we respond.

WARNER: Well, Senator, I know firsthand of your deep concern about the veterans who returned from Afghanistan and other far-flung parts of the globe as to their health. And I commend you for those initiatives that you've undertaken.

Senator Roberts.

ROBERTS: Thank you.

Gentlemen, thank you for your leadership and what has been referred to by General Jumper and Admiral Clark and obviously all at the table, as your favorite word, for persevering in your command and quite frankly here at the hearing.

And General Shinseki, well done, sir. You have provided outstanding leadership, and I think your legacy is going to be better transformation of the legacy weaponry. And so you've achieved a great deal, and we thank you for that.

SHINSEKI: Thank you, sir.

ROBERTS: Thank you for working with our former commandant, Jim Jones, who is the SACEUR, as you know. I think before a hearing some time ago I said we didn't need two tips and two spears. We needed one tip and one spear. And we have done that in regards to working with the Marine Corps and the Marine Corps working with you, sir.

So we thank you for your innovative leadership.

SHINSEKI: Thank you, sir.

ROBERTS: As a survivor, along with Senator Levin, of Senator Warner's forced march which was disguised as a CODEL to possible war zone countries where we are fighting and, in my opinion, winning the war on terrorism, I want to say that we have an obligation to meet with a number of men and women in uniform on the front lines. As chairman of the Intel Committee, I want to go out and check the intelligence to our war fighters. And we went to Kuwait, Afghanistan and to Qatar and to other locations. And we survived. I think we did, Carl. I'm not quite sure.

But at any rate, I can report that the cooperation between our intelligence and our military personnel is as close as it has ever been. We now have in place information systems that will allow rapid access to current intelligence from the commander all the way down to the Marine or soldier in the field.

So I think we are now -- it's my judgment at least -- we are really learning the lessons of Desert Storm and September 11.

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped we wouldn't spend too much time arguing about who constitutes the greatest threat to us right this second. Is it Saddam Hussein or Kim Jong Il or Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei in Iran or Osama bin Laden? They are all major threats, all challenges to U.S. security here at home. They get worse (inaudible) if not acted upon. They all represent very unique geopolitical circumstances. They demand very tailored situations or solutions. And they all demand action now, but different kinds of action.

I have more or less a speech on this, and I would ask permission that my full statement be inserted in the record at this point.

WARNER: Without objection.

ROBERTS: I want to go first of all to the commandant and ask him a question in regards to SOCOM. And I know that they have a lot of operations, everybody has operation stress. But I understand we have 81 Marines, five sailors, organized, trained and equipped for special reconnaissance and direction action, other special operations missions who will be under the SOCOM operational control by October of this year. I understand the answer is yes. Is that correct?

HAGEE: That's correct, sir.

ROBERTS: All right. I hope that we can continue that partnership.

I'm going to get down to your war fighting lab in Quantico as soon as I can. I apologize for not coming sooner. And one of the questions I had as we were out to Camp Commando and Camp Coyote out there in Kuwait, I was so proud of our Marines who are operating basically in a sand trap and still performing and training their mission. And I'm not surprised at this.

You already answered this question in splendid fashion about our WMD capability. And I thank you for that answer.

I have a question for General Jumper. You remember the old combination, the baseball combination, you and I aren't too far off in age difference, of Tinkers to Evers to Chance?

JUMPER: I'm afraid not, sir.

ROBERTS: You don't?

JUMPER: You got me.

(LAUGHTER)

ROBERTS: Well, anybody else? Somebody say they remember that, will you please...

CLINTON: Over here, Pat. I remember.

WOODRUFF: Two of Washington's most polarizing political figures have come together to promote a shared concern. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and House Majority Leader Tom DeLay hosted a movie screening last night to publicize the needs of America's foster children.

Our conversation on that subject is coming up just a little later this hour. First, though, their thoughts on a potential war with Iraq. I started by asking Senator Clinton if she agrees with President Bush that Iraq has been given every chance to disarm, and that we're just weeks away from war.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CLINTON: Well, I think that's the unfortunate conclusion that one has to draw from any objective reading of the evidence, not just in the last months, but going back more than a dozen years now. So I think that the president's made the right decision to go back to the United Nations. I always believe if you can have a larger group of people behind you, not only for the military action, where we don't really need their help, but for what comes after, that's preferable.

But I also believe that at some point, this has been in Saddam Hussein's hands from the very beginning. He signed agreements that he has failed to keep, and even now has refused to cooperate with the inspectors.

WOODRUFF: And, Mr. DeLay, no more chances? You agree we are just days, weeks away?

TOM DELAY (R-TX) HOUSE MAJORITY LEADER: This has been a long time in coming. It started at the end of the Gulf War. And it has taken all of this time for us to finally understand that this man has no intention of being part of the international community. And that he has no intention of honoring his agreements.

In fact, he has gone even beyond that in building weapons of mass destruction, of supporting terrorist organizations. And we have tried every way that we know how to avoid war. And it looks like because of Saddam Hussein, we might actually have to go to war.

WOODRUFF: And if the cost is as high as we're now learning it may be, the administration saying $95 billion, an enormous amount of money, will that be worth it, Senator?

CLINTON: I do have serious questions about the cost, the length of the commitment that we will have to make in Iraq and to the Iraqi people. I believe that we have to have more information in the Congress and among the American public to make a good judgments about what we need to be doing. I am worried that it seems inconsistent and unsustainable for the president to be asking for large tax cuts before we know what our continuing obligations are.

I would like to see us just take a deep breath, deal with Iraq if we have to, understand exactly what we've gotten ourselves into, because in the briefings I've received, there's a lot of unknowables. You hear that from the people at the Pentagon and the State Department. And I don't believe that we really fully appreciate the cost that we may be embarking upon.

WOODRUFF: Mr. Leader, do you have any of those concerns? And do you see the inconsistency that the Senator describes between the war costs and the tax cuts?

DALEY: This is where we probably get a divorce.

CLINTON: An amicable one.

DALEY: Yes. This is -- I believe, strongly, from my experience, that if you give tax relief, it grows the economy. And from the economy, you raise the revenues to pay for this war and this government. The opposite just doesn't work, and if we're going to pay for this war, and we have to pay for this war. If you go to war, you go to win. And you're going to have to pay for what it takes to win.

WOODRUFF: And so any price is worth it?

DALEY: Keeping the American people safe, winning this war on terrorism, of which Iraq is a central part, yes. Whatever it takes to win the war on terrorism and keep the American people safe is worth it.

CLINTON: Well, we'll have to have a continuing conversation about this, because I did support the president. And I did so based on, you know, my assessment of what kind of potential threat Saddam Hussein did represent and the need, frankly, for the world community to accept responsibility. But I do believe that caution is in order right now with respect to the fiscal condition of our government, and the cost that we're going to be incurring and the unintended consequences.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WOODRUFF: A little later this hour, Senator Clinton and Congressman DeLay, Majority Leader DeLay, talk about working together, though, to improve the lives of America's foster children.

Coming up, reconstructing Iraq after the war. How much will it cost? And who will call the shots? I'll speak with an expert on rebuilding.

(MARKET UPDATE)

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

WOODRUFF (voice-over): It's time, again, to check your "IP IQ." The District of Columbia was placed under the jurisdiction of Congress on this date, February 27, in what year? Was it A: 1801, B: 1857 or C: 1903. The correct answer is A. Congress officially began to exercise authority over Washington, D.C. on this date in 1801.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WOODRUFF: He's conquered Hollywood, but can Arnold Schwarzenegger make it on the campaign trail? Some new poll numbers could hold a clue. I'll be back with that story.

(NEWS ALERT)

WOODRUFF: Well, as the United States moves closer to a war with Iraq, there's increasing discussion about the country's future after Saddam Hussein. The Bush administration is talking about having an American administrator run post-war Iraq.

I asked CNN Iraq analyst Kenneth Pollack at the Brookings Institution if that's a good idea.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

KENNETH POLLACK, CNN IRAQ ANALYST: Well, it's certainly some thing that could work, but I think it does run some risks. And I think it will be harder to make a U.S.-led reconstruction of Iraq work properly, because there are a lot of countries around the world who are very concerned that the United States is planning to invade Iraq, because we want to get our hands on the oil wells, because we want to set up a new colonial system in Iraq, also because you do have a lot of countries who are very opposed to U.S. unilateralism in general.

And that creates a set of problems that any U.S.-led reconstruction of Iraq would have to deal with that might not be there if it were, say, under the umbrella of the United Nations. Those are things like getting additional countries to come on board and contribute to the reconstruction. If it's a U.S.-led operation, it's going to be harder to get other some of these countries to come on board, to contribute troops to the stabilization force, to contribute money, etcetera.

We're also going to need to get the nongovernmental organizations, the NGOs, which have critical skills and critical manpower that are going to be necessary for reconstruction. I myself have been talking to a number of those different groups. And they all suggest that they're going to be very leery of coming into a situation where it's the U.S. running the show. They'd be much more comfortable having the United Nations at least leading the project, even if it was the United States that was doing the lion's share of the actual work.

So I think it does set things up to make it a much harder reconstruction effort.

WOODRUFF: It remains to be seen whether the U.S. would be willing to do that, though.

Ken, what about the president and what we're hearing from the administration that they believe Iraq can become a democracy?

POLLACK: I don't think that it's a sure thing that we can turn Iraq into a democracy. And I think it's very unlikely, even if we success, that we could do it quickly.

WOODRUFF: But what do they have working against isn't it?

POLLACK: Well, that's just it. Iraq is a small, relatively underdeveloped country. It's a Third World state. They don't have a very good history with democracy. The only real experience that they had was a period under British rule, where they had a kind of constitutional monarchy, but it really never worked as such. So they don't have a whole lot of experience.

They have deep ethnic fissures. They have a long history of mistrust among those different ethnic groups. And you have a lot of people inside of Iraq right now who don't particularly want a democracy. They'd like to return to some other form of dictatorship. The key is that each of them would like to be the next dictator. And these are all different kinds of issues that are going to have to be overcome.

And, as I say, we've seen them overcome in other places around the world. There's no question about that. There's no reason why it's impossible in Iraq. But what we've seen is, even when you can overcome it, it takes quite some time.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WOODRUFF: CNN's Iraq analyst, Ken Pollack.

Just ahead: The Republican push for labor support hits a roadblock, an update on the challenges facing organized labor and why some union leaders are so angry with the Bush White House.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WOODRUFF: Efforts by the White House to peel away union votes from Democrats next year just got a little harder. Labor Secretary Elaine Chao yesterday angered union leaders when she cited at length past examples of union corruption during an appearance at the winter meeting of the AFL-CIO. Chao's remarks are just the latest example of what some labor leaders say are a string of anti-union actions by the Bush White House.

Here's CNN senior political correspondent Candy Crowley.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CROWLEY: Don't be fooled by the Hollywood, Florida, site of the AFL-CIO's winter meeting. Organized labor has fallen on hard, cold times.

JOHN SWEENEY, PRESIDENT, AFL-CIO: This administration has actively sought every opportunity to pull the rug out from under working Americans.

CROWLEY: Layoffs are up. Union membership is down. The adrenaline is running.

ANDREW STERN, SEIU PRESIDENT: This is enormously important, that someone be able to beat George Bush.

CROWLEY: It's not that anyone expecting organized labor, one of the Democratic Party's biggest contributors, to be Bush enthusiasts. But et tu, James Hoffa?

JAMES HOFFA, PRESIDENT, TEAMSTERS: And I think that this administration has veered dangerously, since the convention, towards a policy that leaves working people out and working families out. And I think that they're not responsive to what's going on.

CROWLEY: This is the guy the Bush administration has been wooing a bit, looking to make dent in the solid wall of union Democrats. But, at the moment, they seem to be solidly looking elsewhere.

An AFL-CIO endorsement is a big deal, worth its weight in worker bees, votes, and contributions. Every Democratic candidate would like it. It's why five of them trucked down to Florida for the meeting. It's the stuff dark horses dream of.

HOWARD DEAN (D), PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: A very good endorsement -- excuse me -- I mean a very good reception -- what most people really want is somebody who can win. And I think we're going to have trouble winning with somebody who is from inside the Beltway.

CROWLEY: Richard Gephardt is the emotional favorite. The Missouri Democrat has working-class roots and the best pro-labor record of the '04 bunch. The only thing the AFL-CIO wants more than a pro-labor Democrat is a Democrat who can beat George Bush.

STERN: It has to factor into endorsement. This is not a crusade. This is trying to win an election for the future of the country. And it's enormously important to us that whoever we select be someone who can win.

CROWLEY: And that is Gephardt's to prove.

REP. RICHARD GEPHARDT (D-MO), PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE: Certainly, I am a candidate who can win in the industrial heartland of the country. And that's where George Bush will be beaten.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

CROWLEY: It will be some time before the AFL-CIO makes an endorsement, but labor leaders are determined to rev up their political apparatus ASAP. The union envisions volunteers working not just a few months before an election, but year-round, a network to mobilize members not just on behalf of candidates, but on issues before Congress -- Judy.

WOODRUFF: They're sounding very practical.

CROWLEY: Yes.

WOODRUFF: They want a winner.

CROWLEY: Yes, that's exactly it. And that's what the Republicans said last time around. Give us somebody who can win.

WOODRUFF: That's exactly right.

All right, Candy, thanks very much. Appreciate it.

Well, Donna Brazile and Bay Buchanan will debate the president's labor pains and his plans for rebuilding Iraq.

That's just ahead on INSIDE POLITICS.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WOODRUFF: With us now: former Gore campaign manager Donna Brazile; and, in Los Angeles, Bay Buchanan, president of American Cause.

Let's talk first about Iraq, the president saying last night -- we've heard other statements coming out of this White House -- that the administration, post-war in Iraq, likely to be run by an American, not only that, that they have great hopes for a democracy in Iraq.

Bay, are these realistic and smart plans for the administration to be making?

BAY BUCHANAN, PRESIDENT, AMERICAN CAUSE: Well, I always worry when you start talking about what you're going to do after the war. I'd kind of like us to focus on the immediate future, which is the war, and make certain we do that well and win it outright. And, obviously, we will.

But this is what concerns me, Judy, when I heard the president. Not only did he say we are going to disarm Iraq, which is his purpose there, but also free a people and set up a democracy. And we're going to have a role model for the region. And, in the meantime, we're also going to encourage these people to also move towards democracy. And we will resolve the Palestinian-Israeli situation, an enormously utopian, expansive role for the United States in the Middle East.

I think, if we win this thing and set up something and try to get out of there as quickly as we can, that might be advisable over what he's talking about.

DONNA BRAZILE, CHAIRWOMAN, VOTING RIGHTS INSTITUTE: Well, Bay, I agree with you, because every time the president opens his mouth, that's another billion dollars.

And I tell you, the cost of this war is enormous. Already, the administration is talking about $90 million and then, of course, the post-war...

WOODRUFF: Ninety billion.

BRAZILE: Ninety billion -- thank you, Judy -- $90 billion -- can't pronounce a billion right now. And then, all of a sudden, you have this cost of rebuilding Iraq and then maintaining control of the police.

And one of the things that I think they need to be careful -- Mr. Hussein has been carefully orchestrating over the years, making the people rely on him for everything from police and fire to food rationing. So this is going to cost an enormous amount of money, a lot of time and resources. And I don't think no Americans should be sitting there, and especially American military personnel, and running that country.

This is why you need the U.N. You need the U.N. support. And the U.N. should go in there and help. If we go to war, the U.N. should be there to try to help a government post-war Iraq.

BUCHANAN: You know what concerns me with what Donna is saying, Judy, is the fact that we're doing something, obviously, which the president feels is going to be enormously beneficial to the neighbors, to the region, even to the world.

And yet we're doing this and we're being asked to pay not only for the war, but also to pay money to Turkey, to pay money to Israel. They're asking for $15 billion extra. All these countries also want us to pay for the right to come in and defend them against this tyranny. It doesn't make sense. And I think it's time for the American people to hear from the president, look, if we're going to pay for it, we've got to cut some of this foreign aid out. We've going to take care of the defense because we're going to go in and solve some problems.

But the U.N. and Israel and Turkey, they can't be having our money as well.

WOODRUFF: And there may be other payments to come in order to get that U.N. along with us.

BUCHANAN: Absolutely.

BRAZILE: Absolutely.

WOODRUFF: Just quickly to this story, domestic political story, I was just talking about with Candy Crowley.

And that is Elaine Chao, the labor secretary, down meeting with organized labor leaders, ticked off a list of organized labor corruption. And let me just quickly read you what the president of the Machinists Union had to say after he listened to her to Secretary Elaine Chao, whose name is Thomas Buffenbarger.

He said: "I felt a little appalled that a labor secretary would come to the meeting prepared to attack the labor movement. She came prepared with her book of sins. It's like Satan at the gates of hell."

(LAUGHTER)

WOODRUFF: Donna?

BRAZILE: Well, you know what? I think all of my friends -- I talked to a couple of labor leaders today. And they were surprised that she came down there and threw the book at them, so to speak. She burned the only bridge that he had to the labor movement. The Teamsters and others are furious at her remarks. And I think that this administration is going to have to work overtime to repair its relationship with labor leaders.

WOODRUFF: Bay?

BUCHANAN: In fairness, I don't understand why anyone would take a litany of terrible things a group has done and read it to them. That wasn't necessary, I don't think.

But she walked into the lion's den. These individuals, the union leaders, were already angry as they can be with the president, because he managed to get rid of union protections for the homeland security employees. And, also, he's asked for additional financial disclosure from the unions. And they're very, very upset with these.

She walks in and adds to their furor. I don't think she needed to do that, but I don't know that she was going to win. They were ready to embarrass the president's person no matter what.

BRAZILE: Bay, and these leaders are already upset because workers are losing their jobs, their health care, and these companies are going bankrupt. And she walked in and said, essentially, no to raising the minimum wage and yes to tax cuts.

WOODRUFF: We're going to live it there. Donna, Bay, thank you both. It's great to see.

BUCHANAN: Thank you.

BRAZILE: Thanks, Bay.

BUCHANAN: Thank you.

WOODRUFF: Still ahead: rating Hollywood stars. Are they getting raves for protesting more? Bill Schneider will be back with more poll numbers.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WOODRUFF: TV and movie stars are often judged by their ratings or their performance at the box office. But our Bill Schneider has some other numbers that my interest some of Hollywood's outspoken figures.

Bill, all right, when celebrities speak out on political issues like war with Iraq, does it affect how popular they are with the public?

SCHNEIDER: Well, on the issues, it has very little effect. Only about 10 percent of Americans acknowledge that, when an entertainment celebrity speaks out, it has any effect on their views of the issue, but it does affect their views of the celebrity.

Take a look. Martin Sheen, Alec Baldwin and Barbra Streisand have been outspoken critics of President Bush and the war with Iraq. Most Democrats have a favorable opinion of them, but not most Republicans. Martin Sheen's popularity drops off about 20 points among Republicans. President Bartlet is not their man. The same thing happens to Alec Baldwin.

The really partisan figure is Barbra Streisand, who raises money for Democrats. Her favorability drops 40 points among Republicans, people who don't like certain people. Now, here's a celebrity who is not particularly liked by either party, actor Sean Penn. People who go to Baghdad are not the most admired people in the world.

And here's a celebrity who is above party: Arnold Schwarzenegger, a Republican, married to a Kennedy. Schwarzenegger is very highly regarded by both parties, which may be why he's taken very seriously as a potential Republican candidate in California.

Now, ah, you say that's because men like him. Well, you're wrong. Schwarzenegger is more highly regarded by women than by men. In fact, he gets a 78 percent favorable rating from Democratic women. Remember, he sponsored a measure for after-school programs for children in California. Could the Terminator being the real compassionate conservative?

WOODRUFF: Well, women like the Terminator, too.

SCHNEIDER: Yes.

(LAUGHTER)

WOODRUFF: All right, Bill Schneider, thanks very much.

Crossing the aisle for a good cause -- when we return, how two lawmakers who disagree on so much came together on a shared interest in children -- more of my conversation with Tom DeLay and Hillary Rodham Clinton.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WOODRUFF: More now of my conversation with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. Their shared interest in helping foster children brought them together in a working partnership that probably has raised a few eyebrows around Washington.

I spoke with them last night at the screening of a film about foster care.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

WOODRUFF: Senator Clinton, Majority Leader DeLay, with all due respect, talk about an odd couple.

(LAUGHTER)

WOODRUFF: I mean, it is hard to think of two public figures, elected officials, who are more diametrically opposed in their views. But the two of you have come together.

But my first question is, who is Felix and who is Oscar?

(LAUGHTER)

DELAY: Maybe we ought to flip for that.

CLINTON: That's right. Exactly.

DELAY: I'll take Oscar.

(LAUGHTER)

WOODRUFF (voice-over): What brought them together is the man in the middle, Antwone Fisher, the subject of Denzel Washington's critically acclaimed film about foster care.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP, "ANTWONE FISHER")

UNIDENTIFIED ACTRESS: Nobody wants you.

UNIDENTIFIED ACTOR: Nothing. Worthless. I hate you.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WOODRUFF: DeLay and Clinton discovered their shared passion at an adoption bill signing ceremony back in the late '90s, when he was one of her husband's most powerful political enemies. But when it came to the rights of foster kids, they put their differences aside.

DELAY: A lot of people just really don't want to talk about these issues. These children, many of them have been severely abused and neglected, have been taken from their home. They have issues that they have to deal with.

And what happens to them is something people really don't want to face. But we have to face it. We have a whole generation of children out there that -- thousands of them -- that are in the foster care system. And we need to build a system that gives them a stable home that is -- and that they're raised by people that truly love them and want to see them succeed.

WOODRUFF (on camera): But what's to stop that from happening?

CLINTON: In all of the years I've been involved on behalf of foster children, it's kind of out of sight, out of mind. The children are often from poor families, disadvantaged circumstances.

Antwone Fisher, whose movie we're screening tonight, was born in prison. His mother was a minor. And he was immediately taken from her. I think that if an individual child can be brought to public attention, there's often an outpouring of concern. The problem is, we have literally hundreds of thousands of children, about 550,000 of them now, in the foster care system. Every one of those children has a story.

To me, it's a failure every time we keep a child in foster care for that child's entire life. There should be a decision made to either reunite a child by trying to help a family get back on its feet and take care of its children or we should remove the child and try to find a good, loving home in the foster care system, but, much more importantly, try to find a permanent home.

WOODRUFF: Mr. Majority Leader, if the two of you can work together on something like this, are there other issues that you can come together and work on?

DELAY: Well, I'm sure there are. We just have to look for them.

(LAUGHTER)

WOODRUFF: Have you talked about that? Are there any other things you've discussed that you might work together on?

DELAY: Not really, but I'm sure there's something out there that we could work together on.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: Well, the problem is that we're going to see how well we can actually accomplish what we've set out to achieve here. Tom would probably be in trouble in the place he comes from if he worked with me too much. So I don't want to get him into any trouble. We want to take care of the children and do everything we can to give these children a better life.

WOODRUFF: Are you in any trouble over this?

(LAUGHTER)

DELAY: I don't think so. I think people are wide-eyed about the fact that we can come together and work on something. It's really important. And it's important to convince people that we need to design a system that has the best interests of the child...

CLINTON: That's right.

DELAY: ... at heart and a system that connects people rather than files, that you need people-to-people contact.

These children need a safe, permanent home with a foster parent or a parent that they know that that's going to be their home for as long as they're in the system and they know that these people are doing it, they're taking care of them, because they love them.

WOODRUFF: We're going to leave it there, but we hope you'll let us know when you decide the next issue you're going to work together on, because we will want to talk to you about that.

CLINTON: You'll be the first to know.

DELAY: Absolutely.

(LAUGHTER)

WOODRUFF: Majority Leader Tom DeLay, Senator Hillary Clinton, thank you very much. It's good to see both of you. We appreciate it. Thank you.

DELAY: Thank you.

CLINTON: Thank you.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WOODRUFF: As Americans face the prospect of another war, many parents and children would like a reassuring presence on their television screens. Well, one of the best-known faces to do that has died.

Fred Rogers, the gentle, soft-spoken host of Public Television's "Mister Rogers' Neighborhood," died of stomach cancer in Pittsburgh today. He was 74 years old. On his show and in special public service announcements, Fred Rogers and his familiar cast of puppets helped generations of children deal with difficult subjects, including the Persian Gulf War more than a decade ago and, more recently, September 11.

Mr. Rogers was honored by presidents for his half-century career in children's television and his contribution to the nation. Above all, he'll be remembered in the smiles of children and the grownups that they have become.

Mr. Rogers, we remember you.

That's it for INSIDE POLITICS. I'm Judy Woodruff. Thanks for joining us.

CHAIRMAN HOLDS HEARING ON NOMINATIONS, 2/27/2003

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Woodley, I understand your nomination will also be considered by the environment and public works committee on which I serve and I hope you will forgive me if I focus my attention today on the other two nominees. I will look forward to having an opportunity to discuss issues with you before the EPW committee.

Ambassador Brooks, much of the nation's work in counterterrorism will be, as I understand it, managed and funded by the newly established Department of Homeland Security. The Department of Energy and the National Nuclear Security Administration have led discussions to establish a joint sponsorship agreement with DHS and they've identified five DOE labs that will directly support homeland security and have special relationships with the Department of Homeland Security.

At this time, the list of labs include Livermore - Lawrence Livermore, Sandia, Los Alamos, Pacific Northwest and Oak Ridge. After several discussions with the principles involved, it appears unlikely that this list will include Brookhaven as one of the designated key laboratories, even though Brookhaven's capabilities are important and relevant to the technology development mission of the DHS.

I am concerned about this refusal to consider Brookhaven as one of the special labs. It is clearly a critical facility that is performing an extraordinary amount of high level and essential work that I believe is directly relevant to the needs of homeland security and national security.

So, my question is, what are you doing to ensure that the capabilities of all the DOE labs are brought to bear on these problems and what about the role of Brookhaven. Is it possible that Brookhaven could now or in the future be included as a key DOE laboratory in the area of homeland security?

BROOKS: Senator, the precise answer to the last part of your question I'm going to have to refer to my colleagues at the Department of Homeland Security, but let me make a couple of comments about how we got here.

First of all, I don't want anything that anybody in our department or homeland security has done or said to be taken as some indictment of Brookhaven. Brookhaven has been supporting our non- proliferation programs and my former responsibility Brookhaven supports our radiological assistance program, which is part of our emergency management area.

When we began the discussions with the Department of Homeland Security, we were primarily focused on the particular problem -- programs that for which responsibility is being transferred. Those programs are all of our chemical and biological programs which will be transferred to the new department on Monday and our nuclear smuggling (ph) program.

In those particular programs, Brookhaven has not played a particularly large role. So, our focus in our initial discussions with the Department of Homeland Security has been on the seamless transfer of ongoing programs.

I don't believe that there is any intent to exclude future consideration of Brookhaven or the other Department of Energy national laboratories, but our initial focus was, as I say, on the laboratories, which had ongoing programs. The agreement we are working with the Department of Homeland Security would not preclude involvement of other national laboratories.

I'll be glad to carry your concerns specifically to my homeland security colleagues.

CLINTON: I really appreciate that, Ambassador. In part I do, because I think radiological potential for attacks is as important and maybe even more likely in some instances than chemical and biological given the ease of putting together a dirty bomb, then, of course, other nuclear terrorist potential as well.

So, I think there are some artificial lines that might be in the process of being drawn, that I'm not sure are going to make that sort of seamless transfer and the integration of the issues and DHS as smooth as they could be.

But Ambassador, I also would like to ask in response to the committee's policy questions, you state that you favor securing accounting for and disposing of weapons usable nuclear material beyond the former Soviet Union. But that the countries typically identified for such assistance, such as India, Pakistan and China, have thus far shown no interest in U.S. assistance.

Are there other nations that you believe could benefit from expanded non-proliferation programs and secondly, do you think we're devoting enough resources to securing and accounting for and disposing of nuclear material in the former Soviet Union.

BROOKS: The second one is easy -- yes. We are not now in the former Soviet Union limited by money. We are limited by the ability of a somewhat cumbersome and bureaucratic Russian system to absorb assistance. So, there's no question that right now the resources that Congress has provided in '02, '03 that I hope will be provided in '04 are more than adequate.

With respect to other countries, the principle area that we need to focus on is research reactors that use highly enriched uranium fuel. The notion here is to try and get those converted so they don't need highly enriched uranium and then get the highly enriched uranium fuel, which is by definition suitable for weapons use back.

You saw that in the operation that the State Department and we and others led in Yugoslavia. We are working those discussions in other countries. I'd like to be a little non-specific about where we...

CLINTON: That's fine.

BROOKS: ...where we are talking. I think that is the biggest area. Most of the highly enriched uranium -- there are a lot of reactors everywhere, but they use low-enriched uranium of much less concern.

Most of the highly enriched uranium in the world is in the countries you have mentioned or in countries in Western Europe where you have a -- we're always in discussion with our friends about how to improve security, but the issues are a whole different level. They have the knowledge and the resources.

So, I don't think that there is a large, unmet need except in the countries I referred to in my statement and cooperative programs require cooperation.

CLINTON: I might want to follow up in a non-public hearing on some of the others.

BROOKS: I'd welcome that opportunity, ma'am.

CLINTON: And if I could, Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask Dr. Cambone, based on his answers to the policy questions, you state that with much of our military based inside the United States and our role in protecting the nation, there are likely to be many areas of common concern in potentially coordinated action with the Department of Homeland Security.

When George Tenet appeared before this committee two weeks ago, I asked him about the need to ensure that the new terrorist threat integration center directs proper intelligence to local and state law enforcement agencies and this is one of our continuing problems and it is something that I'm sure will never be resolved satisfactorily to all parties involved.

CLINTON: But nevertheless, it is important that we have as clear an idea as possible about the type of intelligence, about the type of threats within our country that you will be sharing with the TTIC and how that intelligence will flow to local officials and if you could, would you briefly describe the state of play in the thinking about how that is going to work.

BROOKS: Yes, I would. There are two, at least two dimensions in which the department will interact at the state and local level. One has to do with the relationship of the base commanders. They, in turn, working through the command that we set up in Northern Command, looking to do what is called anti-terrorism force protection activities. That is the physical security of the installations.

That implies an interaction with the local authorities to assure that communications are properly done, information is shared. If there are people who are observed outside the fences of these installations, that is often shared daily. There come reports on the sharing of information between our people and the law enforcement people in the communities.

The TTIC, as it is called, is designed to enable the flow of broader information intelligence data back out to those who need it to include local and state officials. And the key to this is going to be and I must say it's in its very early stages and I have not been involved in the detail of its construction.

But the key to it is going to be to separate the information from the sources. And that is something that we need to learn to do. It is unfortunate that we oftentimes lend the credibility of the information to the source. And so, therefore, you tend to send the sourcing along with the information as a way of validating the information. But once you have done that, of course, you can't disseminate the information very far, because you put the source at risk.

So, one of the interesting cultural changes we are about to undergo and have begun the process of beginning is to separate the collection from the analysis. And if we can learn to do that, and they are struggling to learn to do it, I think then that flow of information will be a lot easier.

Now, that all has to be coordinated through Governor Ridge's people at homeland. They are the ones who are charged with the lead. But the secretary has made it plain that we are to be very active in this effort.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON FY 2004 DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION, 3/6/2003

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And, I want to thank you and particularly, Senator Allard, for raising the important issues about discipline and behavior at the academies. And I appreciate the seriousness with which the secretaries are addressing this very crucial issue that obviously concerns many of us, not only those of us here on this dais, but people all over our states and indeed the country.

WARNER: Well, Senator, I thank you. You've spoken to me on several occasions about your concerns on this case.

CLINTON: Well, thank you. And I know that in the great scheme of things where we have 200,000 of our men and women on the knife's edge of going into harm's way, some might wonder why we're raising this, but in deed, I think it demonstrates the strength of our system and the commitment to our overriding values. And I am very proud that it has been raised and followed through in such a professional manner.

I also want to express my appreciation to the secretaries for their response to the question that the chairman asked toward the beginning of the hearing concerning General Shinseki's testimony before us a week or so ago. I understand completely that we're talking about unpredictable, in the words of Secretary Rumsfeld, annulable factors, perhaps, but I think that the manner in which you responded to that question and referred to General Shinseki's personal service with a comparable set of circumstances was very welcomed. And I for one appreciate it. And I think that the range that we're attempting to understand that Senator Levin has consistently questioned every witness about is an important one for us to continue to probe. And I thank you for the way you responded to that inquiry.

I have a series of questions. I will submit them to the record. And with respect to a question, Secretary Johnson, about Coast Guard deployments, I will be submitting to the record a letter that I'm sending to you with respect to more information about the call up of Coast Guard ships. Last week Admiral Clark informed me that the Coast Guard cutters have been periodically deployed with Navy carrier groups to ensure their readiness to work with Navy ships in times of crisis. However, according to a Coast Guard spokesman, this is the first time the Coast Guard combatant ships have been deployed in support of a national contingency in 30 years. Indeed, one news report indicates that the Coast Guard has sent one-fourth of its patrol boat fleets from the mid-Atlantic and New England to the Gulf. And, as I have stated on numerous occasions, we in New York and other coastal states, particularly along the east coast, count on the Coast Guard to be part of our homeland security to guard our ports against potential terrorist threats, as well as to provide assistance and leadership in responding to emergencies such as the recent barge explosion on Staten Island where the Coast Guard was the first responder on the scene and helped to contain that accident.

So, I will be asking for additional information about how many current Coast Guard cutters, including patrol boats, are currently deployed and the criteria that are used to determine deployment, how long we're expected to see them deployed overseas and the missions that they are currently performing and any provisions or planning with respect to replacing their necessary functions into the future. Because, obviously, as we are looking at the multiple challenges that we're confronting it's imperative that we think ahead and I don't know that deploying Coast Guard cutters in times of heightened alert will always be a very good idea and it may be necessary, but we may have to look for alternatives. So, I will look forward to receiving those questions answered.

Similarly, Secretary Roche, I am deeply interested in the work that is done at the Air Force Research lab in Rome. Have you had a chance to visit the lab? I would love to host you and be there with you when and if you do?

ROCHE: I would be delighted. That's the sort of stuff, that if you know my past, it turns me on. Unfortunately...

CLINTON: Well, I wasn't inviting you to be turned on, Mr. Secretary.

ROCHE: ... (inaudible).

CLINTON: I'm only kidding, I'm only kidding. I couldn't resist.

ROCHE: I meant electronically research, ma'am...

CLINTON: I know, I know, I'm just kidding.

ROCHE: I would be delighted to join you there. It's a great place and it's done some very interesting work and it's also doing some very good work for our special operators.

CLINTON: Well, it would be a great pleasure. And, obviously, the work that's being done developing these revolutionary cyber security technologies are one of the most important investments we need to be making with respect to our cyber infrastructure and the protective technology that is required. So, I hope that we'll have a chance to do that sooner instead of later.

And, finally, I would just echo the questions and concerns of my colleague, Senator Ben Nelson, about first responders. This is another one of those issues that has to be taken into account as we plan for the future. I know Secretary Rumsfeld has apparently expressed concern about the heavy reliance that our forces have on reservists and guards for the kind of deployment that we're now experiencing. And, of course, in many communities around our country, we're deeply dependent upon them in our firehouses and our police stations and our emergency rooms. So, I think we're going to have to consider how to better deal with the demands on both ends of our security spectrum, both here at home and overseas, as we look at the reserve components.

Mr. Chairman, the secretaries have been very helpful in responding to concerns that many of us have expressed about individual reservist situations about the question that Senator Nelson raised, possibly married couples with children both serving in the same combat area. If there is any kind of formal statement or policy that has been adopted on this, we might want to get that just so that we all know if they're individual service policies, we need them, but if there's something that is being developed across the board, it would be very useful because we're -- many of us are receiving a lot of questions from, not only constituents, but from mayors and county executives and others who are facing these tremendous fiscal crisis that they are currently undergoing and having to pay the reservists costs. We're just trying to get our arms around what we might be doing going forward. So, I look forward to receiving that.

WARNER: Thank you, Senator, that will be done.

JOHNSON: Mr. Chairman, if I could...

WARNER: Yes.

JOHNSON: ... comment about the Coast Guard. We'll provide all the information you asked for. The partnership between the Navy and the Coast Guard has always been strong. It's even stronger now. There are some things that military people cannot do boarding ships and so forth, where Coast Guard members have that authority. We'll provide the information on the ships that go forward. But, that partnership is tremendous forward and in the homeland. We are supporting the Coast Guard here very, very much. And we'll provide the information to you.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Secretary.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON FUTURE OF NATO, 3/27/2003

CLINTON: Well, I appreciate the last exchange very much because I share Ambassador Grossman's opinion about the importance of this alliance and the role that it will play in the future, not just what it's done in the past.

But I want to get back to the point that was made both by the chairman and the ranking member about the opportunity for some kind of process that leads to modernizing, reforming, whatever word we wish to use, with respect to the way NATO functions.

How exactly are you going to pursue that?

FEITH: Senator Clinton, first let me just say that before you came both Doug and I expressed our condolences on behalf of the State Department and the Defense Department for Senator Moynihan passing.

CLINTON: Thank you.

FEITH: And I wanted to do that to you personally.

I will have to consult with Ambassador Burns. I'll have to consult with others in the administration about what the best mechanism to do that is.

Senator Levin and others raised this a year or so ago. We debated it, and you remember at that time what we were concerned about was what if countries weren't very democratic, how would we deal with them?

And now we're concerned with countries who block...

CLINTON: That are too democratic in our point of view, which is what we're hearing...

FEITH: Fair enough, but who block NATO's way forward.

So I don't mean to avoid your question, but I don't want to get locked into a process today that's going to solve today's problems, which might not be next year's problems.

And so I committed to Senator Levin that I would -- we would take a look at this. I will commit to you that we'll talk to Ambassador Burns and others, and we will meet our obligation to put this into the thinking of the alliance.

WARNER: If I could interject. That's a very important question that you raised, Senator Ben (ph), and Senator Levin, and then I joined him, jointly have made a request that a formal communication back from the Department of State to this committee once that procedure has been reviewed and decision made as to how or how not to implement it.

GROSSMAN: That's a perfectly fair way to put it.

CLINTON: And I really appreciate that, because I am a very strong supporter of NATO and the Atlantic alliance on which it rests, and I am particularly pleased at the expansion that has been undertaken.

And I think it is an opportunity not only for us to meet in a new century the goals that the Secretary Feith described to Senator Pryor, but to think anew about what additional opportunities and goals we should be pursuing.

So I can't stress enough that this is essential, in my view, to saving the alliance in more than just name. You know, that is not what we want.

Secondly, I think that the conversation that has gone on, particularly with respect to France and to a lesser extent Turkey, illustrates the contrary to what the implication might have been.

In fact, I think it illustrates quite strongly the need for us to redouble our efforts to repair whatever damage has occurred within the NATO alliance and to redouble our efforts to build strong relationships.

I'm particularly concerned about Turkey. And I know that Secretary Grossman has a special interest, having hosted me there, and I think I have visited every one of the NATO countries, both members- elect and others.

With respect to Turkey, I think that it's important that our country not send a mixed message about democracy. You know, it was unfortunate. But I think that the ambassador's explanation about a new administration coming in, in a sense, one that had frankly been on the outside, one whose relationship with the Turkish military was at best an unknown, at worst perhaps not even that good.

There was a lot of very important negotiation to be undertaken with our ally. And I think it's especially important that we pursue it now with the new government of Turkey.

And I also hope that we will redouble our efforts. And I know this administration has made a very concerted effort on behalf of public diplomacy. But if we are going to be a coalition of democracies we can't just expect the people in those countries to rubber stamp whatever their governments proceed to do, despite what our assessment might be.

So I just want to make sure that we are supporting the NATO alliance, we're supporting the Atlantic relationship, and we are looking for ways to strengthen it going forward.

CONFERENCE CALL BRIEFING ON THE DEMOCRAT AMENDMENT TO THE SUPPLEMENTAL TO ADD FUNDING FOR FIRST RESPONDERS, 4/2/2003

SEN. CLINTON: Well, yesterday Senator Mikulski, Senator Schumer, Senator Daschle and Senator Corzine and I on behalf of our Democratic colleagues announced a new Homeland Security package to be included in the emergency supplemental as an amendment. I believe that the president's proposal last week was a good start, but it's not nearly enough for what we need to do here at home in order to fight this two- front war. Our amendment will bring a total of $4.3 billion including $3 billion in grants to local communities to help cover these extra costs. And in New York, this provides a significant increase in money over what the president's proposed and what came out of the Appropriations Committee yesterday. It's a difference between 87 million in the chairman's mark or 140 million. And that's the case for every state, because every state does need additional money, as we know from a number of surveys that have been done, so that they can purchase the equipment they need or the new communications systems they require and to hire and train the personnel that is called for under these circumstances.

Now, in addition to the money that will go directly for first responders, I was very pleased that we included the idea I presented back in a speech at John Jay College in New York City last January to put aside a billion dollars for high threat areas. I have spoken on a regular basis to Secretary Ridge. I have presented to him my ideas about how we can get money more directly to the high threat areas, such as New York, such as Baltimore with its port, such as other places in our country. And we know that when the threat level goes up nationally the dollars spent in our urban areas goes up as well. In New York City we're spending a total of $5 million a week because of Code Orange and in New York State $7-1/2 million. The president only set aside $50 million to cover these costs. And, you know, New York would have exhausted that whole national commitment by the end of next week.

The Conference of Mayors says that the cities are spending an additional $70 million a week for Code Orange, more than the president asked for, the overall allocation of money.

So, I'm very concerned that we don't have enough money and we are pushing our cities and our counties and our high-risk areas into terrible financial straits, on top of all the other economic challenges they're facing. And this Democratic alternative, which I hope will have bipartisan support, would get more money out more quickly to everyone and would recognize that some areas need greater help, such as New York City.

Senator Mikulski?

SEN. MIKULSKI: Well, thank you very much, Senator Clinton.

First of all, I think we all recognize that over the last 18 months, ever since the horrific day of September 11th, the responsibilities of our nation's local police, fire and other first responders, like emergency medical personnel, have skyrocketed. And the fact is that in the president's supplemental, there's just not enough money to meet homeland security needs. It doesn't meet the needs of state governments and it doesn't meet the need of local governments. What our supplemental to this supplemental is -- that's what our amendment is -- is puts in not only more money, but it puts in more money where needed and it does it in a new way. This $3 billion for first responders grants to states meets a need that continually emerges when you talk with local officials, which is the money stays at a state level and only trickles down locally. What this will mean is that 80 percent of the funds must go to local communities and it must be spent in 30 days, so it doesn't just sit with the coordinators of the coordinators while they coordinate the criteria.

SEN. CLINTON: (Laughs.)

SEN. MIKULSKI: The second thing is that it also goes to high- threat areas. We in the capital region -- we in the capital region are a higher high-threat area, not (both ?) Baltimore City, but Montgomery, Prince George's, Anne Arundel County. These are -- we are contiguous to the District of Columbia, and because of the federal assets in our state, we are enormously high-risk. One county, Anne Arundel, has the National Security Agency; the United States Naval Academy; the state capital; as well as access to the Bay Bridge; while we're at it, an airport; and is 20 miles from a nuclear power plant. Like, we've got real issues here. This is why this $1.45 billion for high-threat urban areas is absolutely needed, because the criteria is based on both population and on risk.

And really the architect of the framework has really been Senator Clinton, and she should be -- and Senator Schumer -- they should really be acknowledged for that.

I also like the fact that it builds on existing programs. I am the creator of something called the Fire Grant Program. This was in effect even before September 11th, because we knew our first responders, the fire department, needed better equipment, they needed better communication equipment, and they needed training. And you can't do this on fish fries and bingos. So many of our fire departments really had to forage for funds. This does this, and then it also builds on the COPS program. So I think it brings the money to the local communities, spends the money on what is needed, helps our first responders be ready for all hazards, whether it's a terrorist attack or whether it's a tornado.

And in my own city of Baltimore, when there was a train caught on fire in a tunnel, with the possibility of toxic fumes engulfing the city, we didn't know if it was a predatory act by a terrorist. We didn't know if it was an accident in a railroad tunnel. But what we knew was that our firefighters were literally descended into hell to find out what was wrong and to risk their lives to do it. They needed the equipment. They needed the communications equipment. We need to support them for whatever challenges they face. And if we're going to have Liberty Shield, we need to make sure that we protect the protectors and also help local communities not have an unfunded mandate.

SEN. SCHUMER: I -- okay. I guess I'm next. This is Senator Schumer, and I'm sorry to join you all a little late.

The bottom line is that homeland security is every bit as much a federal responsibility as is fighting the war on terrorism overseas. And that's what the amendment that -- Senator Mikulski, Senator Clinton and I are trying to establish.

The bottom line is, you go to police and fire departments throughout the country and certainly throughout New York state, and they are stretched beyond belief. Number one, they have their usual job: making the -- keeping the streets safe and -- from both crime and fire. And second, the budget cuts are hurting them, and they're losing people. A lot of reservists go into the fire and police departments. But third, with the advent of 9/11 and particularly the war in Iraq, they have new responsibilities, and that is true whether you're in New York City, whether you're in Buffalo, whether you're on Long Island, whether you're in the North Country. Every part of our state we have seen that.

And up till now they have been given almost no dollars to help, even though the war on terrorism, both domestically as well as abroad, is a federal responsibility.

Our amendment tries to rectify that to a decent extent. We take account of the needs throughout the country, and so some money is distributed to just about everybody, because every place has needs.

But we also take into account that there are certain places -- and New York state has a whole lot of them, as does Maryland and many other states -- that have high need. And there we add and wall-off an additional billion-point-045 dollars to go to the high-need areas.

And the bottom line is, if you talk to your police and fire departments, they are really, really stretched. They are now lobbying for our amendment. They are calling senators on both sides of the aisle and asking them to support them. And we are hopeful that we can pass this amendment.

One other point I'd make -- and I know that Hillary and Barbara join me in this -- both Senator Daschle and Senator Byrd have been completely supportive of this, and we very much appreciate it. The amendment will come up tomorrow. We'll have a great debate, and hopefully we will be able to send the dollars to the localities.

One other point that Barbara mentioned, and I'd just like to underscore because it's so right; we make sure the money gets to the localities. All too often, federal programs go to the statehouse and the localities see dribs and drabs years down the road. But here, 80 percent of the money must be distributed to the states within a very short period of time.

Okay, I think we're -- I'm finished, so I guess we're ready for your questions.

SEN. MIKULSKI: We are.

Q Senator Clinton, I know that you've said in the past that you've been able to get 48 or 49 votes for your amendments related to homeland security. What hope do you have that this time you'll be able to go over the top in the Senate?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, we're working very hard to work with our Republican colleagues. The amendment that we have drafted does really provide for additional funding for all of the needs that we've been told by mayors and police chiefs and fire chiefs and others across our country that are so desperately needed. And that's not a Republican or a Democratic issue, that's a national security, homeland security, defense issue.

And I know that my colleagues are talking to their Republican colleagues on the other side, just as I am, and we're hoping to be able to put together a majority. Now, we know it's going to be a challenge. But if you look at the facts about what's needed, our amendment comes much closer than the chairman's mark in meeting these needs.

SEN. SCHUMER: And we have Republican governors who have spoken out and have said that this is a real need.

SEN. MIKULSKI: I think Senator Schumer points out an excellent point. State governments all over America are facing a real fiscal crisis.

In my own state of Maryland we have a billion point eight shortfall that we're trying to -- that Governor Ehrlich is trying to close the gap, working with the General Assembly. He needs all the help he can get, as do the local communities, because of the -- we're -- he's got a shortfall. The capital region is the high threat. And local governments are stretched to the limit as well. And one of the other points that also is happening is that people realize local governments have no place to go for their money except to state governments and to local property tax. They just don't have it. So if they're putting money into overtime and these things, this affects what they can do for libraries. This affects what they can do for schools. This affects what they can do for community and recreation projects. So this is really, I think, developing into a bipartisan initiative because they cannot cope with an unfunded federal mandate because of their own budget crises.

Q Senators Clinton and Schumer, Aaron Baker (sp), WROC in Rochester, New York. Two questions for you. How feasible is it that the Rochester-Monroe County area is not only served by the Rochester Fire Department, a paid department, but much of the county is served by volunteer departments who have a considerable amount of high tech industry in their areas. Wayne County has the Ginna nuclear power plant. A lot of the suburbs have Kodak and Xerox plants. How feasible is it for, say, Joe volunteer fireman to get a hold of some of this money that's going to need to be used to protect some of these areas?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, that's part of what the plan will do. Eighty percent of the money will go directly to the larger communities, because even our volunteer departments often rely on local paid departments in the event of some terrible problem. But the states will get 20 percent, and that 20 percent will be distributed to smaller communities, to the kind of needs that you're pointing out. And the states are also going to have to do an assessment of what our critical infrastructure is. And you've just named several of the kind of plants a facilities that will count in this critical infrastructure.

SEN. SCHUMER: You know, one other thing I would say, we don't -- none of us think that this is going to cover all the needs. There are many needs. New York City came in and estimated $900 million is their need. And obviously not all of that will be covered here. But it's a big start. And if we can establish this precedent, which is so important, that our police and fire in the large cities and the smaller towns need some kinds of help, we can follow through on that.

I think that's really -- that is really the key here. Is everyone going to be covered by this, and is there going to be adequate money to cover all the needs? No. But we thought that this was a very significant, good first step, and that's how we came out with this number.

Q And my second question is, money that you're giving -- you said you give a bunch of it to the state first -- right? -- and then they filter it down? Is that correct?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, the formula will require that the money go directly to the local communities within 30 days of it being received.

SEN. SCHUMER: Eighty percent of it.

SEN. CLINTON: Right, 80 percent. And then 20 percent will stay with the state to deal with the kind of broad issues that you're discussing as well as others.

Q That 20 percent, I'm just a little concerned. New York State is facing an unprecedented, huge budget deficit. Are you worried -

SEN. MIKULSKI: As is Maryland.

Q -- some of this money is going to be used to pare off that deficit?

SEN. CLINTON: No. That -- this has to be used for homeland security. But you make a good point. I mean, one of the reasons why we wanted to write the law also that 80 percent of it had to get out within a month to local communities is to make darn sure it did.

Q Just to follow up on what Senator Schumer just said about establishing a precedent. This is Julie Davis with the Baltimore Sun. If you could all respond. A couple of Republicans -- Tom DeLay mentioned that he's wary of creating a new federal revenue-sharing idea here for homeland security. Senator Stevens voiced some concerns at the markup yesterday about having the federal government take what really should be some local first-responder responsibilities. How are you planning to counter those arguments that we're hearing from -- mostly from Republicans, but obviously it's being used to counter the effort to create a bipartisan consensus on this issue.

SEN. SCHUMER: Go ahead, Barbara.

SEN. MIKULSKI: Well, first of all, I think that Mr. DeLay is really out of line here. I think when we -- we have to support our first responders not only with words, but with deeds, and put money in the federal checkbook that they have the resource, the equipment and the training so we can protect the protectors as they protect us. And I'm very disturbed about that type of skimpy kind of conversation because it really nickels and dimes our first responders. Now, whenever there is a great tragedy, we all want to go to parades, they put Teddy bears at sites, we say a grateful nation never forgets.

Well, I don't know if Tom DeLay wants to forget that he promised that a grateful nation would never forget, whether it was the firefighters at the twin towers, whether it was the Pentagon. And by the way, my own state of Maryland, when the Pentagon was on fire, dashed across the Potomac in the doctrine of mutual aid to be there, and we were there night and day to really be able to help with the rescue mission there. And I think it's inappropriate to make those kinds of comments by Mr. DeLay; it nickels and dimes our first responders. And when we say a grateful nation never forgets, I think this is the real kinds of ways we show we mean what we say.

Q Senator Schumer and Clinton, it's Bob Hardt from the New York Post. What's your reaction to Senator Stevens' suggestion that the firefighters and police officers just donate their overtime, that they're a big reason why there's so much of a need for additional homeland security money right now?

SEN. SCHUMER: Well, the bottom line is that you talk -- many of our firefighters in New York are already holding down two jobs. Salary has been low, it hasn't gone up in a long time, the city's cupboard is bare, they're asking them actually to give back. And they can't support a family in a decent way on their present salary. So to say donate the overtime is really unfair. Most of these folks -- so many of them that I've met work at their fire job, work at another job, and then barely have enough time or energy to take care of their families. I don't think that's fair and that's right, and I'd just like to underscore what Senator Mikulski just said, which is that this is our responsibility. And we promised the firefighters, police officers and others, do the job. And you know, to the credit of, you know, our local officials in New York -- and I imagine this is true everywhere -- they're not slacking on security. They know security must come first. But you can't ask people to do that and -- without providing the resources. It's -- sooner or later, you pay the piper.

SEN. CLINTON: You know, Bob, our police and firefighters make sacrifices every single day. You know, they show up ready to answer the alarm without the right protective suits and masks they need in case of a chemical or biological attack. They sacrifice knowing that if tragedy strikes again, they still don't have the radios they need to communicate with each other. And they sacrifice knowing that, you know, their buddies may get lost because the city didn't pay for the continuation of the numbers that are needed because of the budget problems.

And you know, I think it's something we should be thanking our police and firefighters for. The sacrifices that they make, I think, are already more than sufficient. It's time, you know, for us to sacrifice for them. And just as we're doing our best to support our men and women in military uniforms, you know, we're doing our very best to support our men and women here at home.

And many of the firefighters who lost their lives on September 11th were not even on duty. They answered the call because they knew they were needed, you know. So I -- I -- and the other point I'd make is, look, when the president or Secretary Ridge raise -- raises the threat level, or when we send troops into Iraq which, you know, causes people to have to be more vigilant, those are not decisions made at the local level, you know, those are part of the decisions made by the administration believing that all of this is in our national interest. And how can we turn our backs on the frontline soldiers that we expect to defend us at these times?

SEN. SCHUMER: And, you know, the firefighters --

SEN. MIKULSKI: Well, you know, just think of --

SEN. SCHUMER: Go ahead, Barbara.

SEN. MIKULSKI: Just think, you know, when the shift changes, or when the third watch begins, a firefighter or a police officer is leaving their home and they kiss their wife good-bye and they say, "Don't worry, honey, I don't know if I'll -- I don't know what time I'll be home, and I don't even know if I'll be home at all. But don't worry, your federal government has asked me to donate my overtime."

Well, what a thing to say. What a thing to say to those families.

Now, you've given me a good idea, though. You see, I think now when the tax bill comes up, I might do a 1 percent homeland tax break -- tax -- tax, a new tax on corporate bonuses. And so let them donate to the homeland security.

SEN. CLINTON: Great idea, Barbara!

SEN. MIKULSKI: I might do it just in the -- that essentially everyone who gets a corporate bonus of over $500,000 donates 1 percent into homeland security.

SEN. CLINTON: Yeah, what if we -- what if we asked all these people who are getting this huge tax cut to sacrifice for America at a time of war? You know, as far as I can tell, you know, nothing's being asked of them.

Q Senator Schumer, good afternoon. This Angel (sp) at WCBS Radio.

SEN. SCHUMER: Hi.

Q You touched on before how much New York City needs. Under this plan, what would the city get?

SEN. SCHUMER: Well, it's unclear exactly what the city would get. We know that the money in the general fund will be distributed on a per capita basis, and that will give us -- you know, depending on the overall amount that passes, but if our amendment passes, we'd get close to $200 million on that. And then, of the high-need money, I think we'd get a significant percentage, so, clearly, in the hundreds of millions. Not as much as -- again, not as much as the mayor has laid out, but we'll come back and fight another day. But certainly a lot better than they were doing a couple of days ago.

Q Senator Mikulski, how much would Maryland get?

SEN. MIKULSKI: We estimate that under this amendment, Maryland would get 56 -- it would get $56 million; it would get $21 million more.

Q Are there provisions -- this is Eric Kelderman from the Gazette Newspapers in Montgomery County. Senator Mikulski, are there provisions in this amendment to decide how the money would be distributed from the states to the localities, or would they just --

SEN. MIKULSKI: It would be an 80 percent -- 80 percent of the money that would come to the state --

Q For instance, how much would go to -- how would they decide how much goes to Montgomery or Prince George's or St. Mary's or whatever?

SEN. SCHUMER: The per capita --

SEN. MIKULSKI: I would be based on population and risk.

SEN. SCHUMER: Correct.

STAFF: One more question.

Q This is Christine Hall from CNSNews.com. I'm wondering whether any of you have any reason to think that the administration would view your amendments as friendly, whether they're actively working against them, or just sort of not taking a stand on it?

SEN. SCHUMER: Well, thus far, the administration has really not supported our amendment. And in general, on homeland security and paying the dollars we need, they have not been supportive.

They have been supportive of high-needs areas, getting, you know, a fair proportion of the pool. But they've had the pool be so low that no area will really get what they need, high-need or otherwise.

We would welcome their support. Just as, you know, they want America to be behind them on the war overseas and just about every one of us has, we think we need them to be behind our firefighters and police officers in the war on terror here.

Q Can I ask one other quick question?

SEN. MIKULSKI: Excuse me. I'm going to have sign off to go to something. Senators Schumer, Clinton, thank you for including me. I'm proud to be part of this amendment, and you know, just look for our statements and our fights on the floor.

SEN. SCHUMER: Right.

SEN. CLINTON: Thanks, Senator

SEN. SCHUMER: You know, we're going to sign off, too. Thanks, everybody.

Q Could we just quickly clarify, on the localities, money, who decides what -- which localities are at the highest risk?

SEN. SCHUMER: The -- that would be decided by Secretary Ridge.

Q Okay. Thanks.

SEN. SCHUMER: Okay. That's for the risk. But the rest of it is --

Q So for population --

SEN. SCHUMER: -- is based on per capita, yeah.

Q Thanks.

SEN. SCHUMER: With a -- you know, first, there's a little set aside, so that every state gets something.

Okay?

Q Thanks, Senator.

SEN. SCHUMER: Thanks, everybody. Bye.

Q Thank you.

JUDY WOODRUFF, CNN ANCHOR: At the height -- thank you for joining us.

At the height of the Clinton impeachment controversy and the scandal over Monica Lewinsky, one question that went unanswered was, what was then first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton thinking? Well, now, of course, she is an elected member of the United States Senate and she's decided to reveal at least some of her personal thoughts about that difficult time.

Here's CNN's Jonathan Karl.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

JONATHAN KARL, CNN CONGRESSIONAL CORRESPONDENT (voice-over): At the time, her body language seemed to tell the story, but, until now, she hasn't.

As the Clintons left for vacation in Martha's Vineyard in August 1998, after President Clinton admitted betraying his wife, their dog Buddy was the only member of the family willing to keep the president company. If the excerpts obtained by the Associated Press are any indication, she vividly recounts how, during the height of the Monica Lewinsky scandal, the president woke her up one morning in the White House to tell her the truth about his affair only 48 hours before testifying about it and telling the rest of the world.

"I could hardly breathe," she writes. "Gulping for air, I started crying and yelling at him, 'What do you mean? What are you saying? Why did you lie to me?' I was furious and getting more so by the second. He just stood there saying over and over again: 'I'm sorry. I'm so sorry. I was trying to protect you and Chelsea.'"

On vacation in Martha's Vineyard, she said she felt profound sadness and unresolved anger: "I could barely speak to Bill. And when I did, it was a tirade. I read. I walked on the beach. He slept downstairs. I slept upstairs."

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WILLIAM J. CLINTON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I did not have sexual relations with that woman, Ms. Lewinsky.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KARL: Months earlier, when he made his famous public denial, he was also lying to his wife in private. Mrs. Clinton believed him and, famously, went on national television, unwittingly repeating his lies and denouncing the reports about Lewinsky as the product of a vast right-wing conspiracy.

After learning the truth, she said she confronted one of the most difficult decisions of her life, whether to stay married to Bill Clinton. Remarkably, Hillary Clinton has been mum about this for five years, even avoiding the subject during an intense campaign for Senate in New York in the year 2000.

HOWARD WOLFSON, FORMER HILLARY CLINTON CAMPAIGN SPOKESMAN: She is a private person. I think people do know that about her. And this was something that she wrestled with while she was writing the book. But she decided that this was part of the public record, through no fault of her own, and that it had to be dealt with in the book.

KARL: The book won't be out until next week. Until then, she's not saying much about it.

H. CLINTON: I am a private person. And it was difficult to write the book. But I wanted to give a complete accounting of my eight years in the White House with my husband. And it was an extraordinary privilege to have that opportunity. And so I had to, I thought, write about the very many high points and good times, as well as the more difficult ones.

BARBARA WALTERS

Good evening. You have been hearing everyone else talking about Hillary Clinton this week. Tonight, it's her turn. The First Lady, who remained publicly composed, even inscrutable through an endless series of White House scandals, is finally opening up. Her new autobiography, a memoir, titled "Living History" is already a publishing phenomenon. And almost unheard of one million copies printed for its release tomorrow. In great part, it is a wife's deeply personal account of being betrayed in front of the entire world.

BARBARA WALTERS

But over the next hour, 55-year-old Hillary Clinton answers many other questions people have been asking for a long time. How did she and her husband survive the countless investigations? How much was her fault? Do her ambitions now include the presidency? And the big question, why are they still together? I interviewed Mrs. Clinton in three pivotal places in her life. The Illinois neighborhood where she grew up, the house in Chappaqua, New York, which she and her husband call home, and, of course, Washington, DC.

video clip from campaign party

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) It was a sweet, shining moment, Hillary Rodham Clinton, First Lady of the United States, former First Lady of Arkansas, elected in her own right, as a US Senator from New York. But this election night celebration would also be a farewell to the limelight. Senatorial etiquette holds that new Senators keep a low profile, and the junior Senator from New York has been careful to do that. She's gotten high marks from colleagues for doing her homework and learning the ropes.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Tougher than being First Lady, being a Senator?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Different. Very different.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Different. Yeah.

(Voice Over) I caught up with her at the capitol between votes.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You know, you have been working on so many bills with Republicans, many of whom wanted to impeach your husband, voted to impeach your husband, many of whom killed your health care bill. How do you turn old enemies into allies?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Well, we can disagree, and of course we do disagree. But I have found allies on all kinds of issues. I've even begun working with Tom Delay on adoption and foster care, an issue we both care deeply about.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Now, he was the leading voice in the capital to impeach your husband. I mean, no hard feelings? No remnants?

You know, I don't ...

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Are you a saint? How do you get on with this?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

No, no, but I'm a Senator. And my job is to represent New Yorkers. And I can't feel that there's anything personal about it.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) 2004, the presidency. Suppose, okay. You can do the question. But suppose these Democrats, maybe the same ones who said you should run for the senate, say you must, for the sake of the party, run in 2004. Would you categorically say no?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I would tell them to take a deep breath, probably two aspirins and get a good night's sleep.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Would you say no?

Absolutely, I'd say no.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Okay. No to 2004. 2008? I know you're not going to tell me whether or not you'll throw your hat in the ring. Okay.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Of course.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) But do you think that if you did, is this country ready to accept you, do you think, as a national candidate?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I don't have any intentions or plans of running. I'm flattered that the question gets asked. I ...

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Everyday.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

... and I hope that it will lead to a woman running for president. And we have a lot of good women.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) She wouldn't rule it in or out. But Hillary Clinton's political history is one of evolution.

video clip of hillary clinton

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) For instance, she was virtually born a Republican. Her father, Hugu, was a rock-ribbed GOP supporter. And Hillary Rodham grew up in the solidly conservative suburb of Park Ridge. The future Democratic First Lady actively campaigned for Barry Goldwater in the 1964 election. Her mother, a closet Democrat, had all been abandoned by her own parents as a child. And Hillary Clinton's life long interest in children has its roots in her mother's painful experience.

It is a great place with lots of memories for me. This is where ...

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) We brought Senator Clinton back to Park Ridge several days ago, back to a town that actually hasn't changed as much as the rest of the world over the past 30 years. You wouldn't be surprised to meet Ozzie and Harriet on the next corner.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You write that there were, like, 47 kids to play with here. And everybody, the kids could ride their bicycles and walk down the streets and ...

That's right. It was such a safe, nurturing community to grow up in.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You used to come home everyday for lunch?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I did. Everything was within walking distance or bike riding distance. The school, the church, the park. Everything that was part of my life.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) So, if I go back years ago and I open that front door, I would find a very happy little girl?

Well, you would.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) I understand you had your first date in this movie theater?

This movie theater. And I hate to tell you, so many years ago, fourth grade ...

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) Every Saturday afternoon, it was the Pickwick Theater. And afterwards ...

Exactly. The best olive burger in America.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) ... Hillary and her friends would head for one of the nearby restaurant, as she and I did the other afternoon.

BARBARA WALTERS

In high school.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) In high school.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Right.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) And you lost.

I did.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) And one of the students, one of the guys said, of course, you lost. A girl can't be president. Yet, whatever happened to that guy?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Well, actually, I've seen in years since. But that was a very common attitude. You know, when I was a little younger than that I thought I wanted to be an astronaut and I wrote off to NASA and they wrote back saying, you know, we're not talking girls. There, there were these differences.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You went east to college, to Wellesley in Massachusetts, an all- female college. And you were the first student ever to speak at a Wellesley commencement, and you are so fiery that "Life" magazine put your picture, at that time, as one of the country's most effective young commencement speakers. It was a big deal. What was your message?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

My message really was that, you know, young people should be taken seriously. We deserve to be listened to. And that politics should become the art of making possible what seems impossible.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) After you graduated from Wellesley, you went to Yale law school. You were one of only 27 women out of 235 students, and you were kind of a star because people knew a little bit about the Wellesley and the "Life" magazine and so forth. Yet, you say it was Bill Clinton who was hard to miss. Why was he hard to miss? What did he look like?

Well, he looked like a Viking. He had this big, bushy, brownish reddish beard and longish hair, and he looked very imposing. Here was this Rhodes Scholar from Arkansas who had a lot to say and knew exactly what he wanted to do with his life.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Were you attracted to him from the beginning?

Oh, from the very beginning.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Really?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Yeah, from the very beginning. In fact, there was a point at which I still hadn't really met him, and I was sitting in the library and he was standing just outside the door and he was looking at me and I was looking at him and I finally thought, this is ridiculous, 'cause every time I saw him on campus I just couldn't take my eyes off if him and he was always watching me. So, I put my books down, I walked out and I said, you know, if you're gonna keep looking at me and I'm gonna keep looking back, we should at least know each other. I'm Hillary Rodham. And he told me his name. He tells people that he couldn't remember his name. But it, it was an immediate attraction and it was just a, a life-changing experience to have met him.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) From, from day one.

From day one. Yeah.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You write in the book that one of the things that first attracted you were his hands.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

He has these beautiful hands. Very long fingers. And I've watched those hands age along with us over all these years, and I, I just kind of mark our relationship in watching those hands over decades now.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You were really besotted, weren't you?

It's an old-fashioned word that I plead guilty to. Yeah, besotted is a good word.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Again and again Bill Clinton asked you to marry him, and for more than two years you put him off?

I did.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Why?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I did. You know, he's like a force of nature. He is so overwhelming. And I knew I loved him, I knew I was in love with him. I knew that there wasn't anyone who made me happier, that I had more fun with, that I found more interesting. But, I also didn't want just to follow along in his wake.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Were you afraid, in effect, that he would sort of, that his largeness in every way would swallow you up?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I think there was some of that, because he is larger than life and I think people know that.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Your mother-in-law was amazed that her son was going to marry you. She said, "He used to bring home beauty queens." She said, please forgive me, "You wore no make up, you had big glasses." And she wrote, "I would grind my teeth and I would wish I could sit Hillary on the edge of my tub ...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

That's right.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) ... and give her some make-up lessons."

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

And that's exactly what she said. And, you know, she was an American original.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) What did you look like that made her say that?

Well, I didn't wear any make-up, I cut my own hair, and I did wear my big old glasses. But she was a strong woman with a great heart. And she was surprised that Bill and I were in love, and that he kept asking me to marry him and I kept saying, "Wait a minute. I'm not sure," because of course she thought, who wouldn't immediately say yes to her son? And eventually, you know, I learned how to use make-up and I got my hair looking a little bit better so it all came around okay.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You were young. You were smart. You had a future in Washington. But you gave it up to be with Bill Clinton, to move to Arkansas where you had no friends, no family, no traditional roots there in any way. And one of your best friends said, why on earth would you throw away your future?

You know, I've had to at so many points in my life listen really hard to my own feelings. Sometimes my family and my friends have said, do this or do that, or don't do this. I just knew that I had to take that step. So, I followed my heart and I went to Arkansas.

BARBARA WALTERS

In 1978, Bill Clinton was first elected governor of Arkansas. And as his wife, Hillary Rodham Clinton, found herself in unfamiliar territory. She was no Southern Belle, but she tried her best to fit in. She eventually swapped her big horn-rimmed glasses for contact lenses. And it was in Little Rock that the stage would be set for the Clinton's political future in Washington, and for the scandals that would plague them throughout their White House years. We talked about Arkansas at the Clinton's new white house where they live today.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) Home base for Bill and Hillary Clinton these days is a beautifully renovated farm house in Chappaqua, 50 minutes north of Manhattan. They have a smaller house in Washington where the Senator spends half of her time. But this is what they call home.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

We really try to be together as much as possible. And this is where, you know, we've really feel like we've made our family home.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Does the President come to Washington, too?

He does.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) I have to ask you a current events question. Your husband recently said that he thought, especially if a president was young, that he should be able to run again in his lifetime. Right now you can run for eight years and then that's it.

Mm hmm.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) So, do you think that maybe the law should be changed so that Bill Clinton could run again?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

You really have to ask him what he thinks about that. I, I'm a supporter of two terms, to make sure we don't have anyone who gets too powerful.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) One more question, when we talk about -homes, so forth, how's Chelsea? Where's she living?

She's finishing up her studies in England. And she'll be back in New York in the fall, which is great news. And she's kinda making her own way in the world now.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) And now she'll be closer to mommy.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

That's good, don't you think? I'm all for that. I think any mommy is all for that.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Well, let's go into this beautiful home.

Thank you. We're glad to have you here.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) When we arrived in the Clinton's family room, the Senator and I picked up the conversation where we left off in Park Ridge. We talked about her time in Little Rock.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Well, let's go back to Arkansas. As the wife of the governor of Arkansas, you were a progressive and modern woman in a traditional society. Did you have trouble fitting in?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Well, it was an adjustment for me, but I loved Arkansas. And the people of Arkansas were not only very good to me, but I made some of the best friends that I've ever made.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) You write about your early years as the wife of the governor, and you talk about the oddity of my dress, my northern ways and the use of my maiden name.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Right.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) And those three things ...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Right.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) ... made it a little difficult.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Well, you know, I didn't have an accent, a southern accent, anyway. And you know, I had worn blue jeans and work shirts and, and big old sweaters all during law school, so I did have some adjusting to do.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) While your husband was governor you write that you were essentially the bread winner in the family.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Right.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You made investments in the commodities market, you dealt in real estate, White Water, you worked for the Rose law firm, all of which at the time you thought were very innocent, all of these things came back to haunt you. Was there anything you could've done differently?

Well, Barbara, of course all of those things were made into political issues. And after all of the years of investigation, and all of the looking under rocks and all that was done, of course there wasn't anything wrong. I think I could've certainly explained myself better and maybe been more aware of the appearance. I'm sure in hindsight I could have done a better job explaining myself.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Senator, I have to ask you about some of the things you write about, and they're difficult questions to ask and probably difficult to answer. When Governor Clinton decided to run for president, a woman named Gennifer Flowers claimed that she had a 12-year affair with your husband.

video clip from jennifer flower press conference

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Your husband told you it wasn't true. Did you believe him?

I did.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Years later, under oath in a deposition in the lawsuit, your husband did admit that he did have a sexual encounter with Gennifer Flowers. How did you reconcile that with what he told you all the years earlier?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Well, you know, Barbara, we've been through a lot together now, over many years. And as I also write in the book, we have spent some time having marriage counseling, which I highly recommend to people, especially people who led such busy lives as we did over so many years together. And I think I'll leave it at that.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) The Gennifer Flowers stories made headlines and almost derailed your husband's campaign. There were the, the accusations that he was a womanizer. You had to deal with that. How'd you deal with it?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Well, you know, those are private issues that you have to deal with. But what I admired about that campaign was the way the American public really got it right. You know, they wanted to make a decision about who they thought would be best for them and their families. And that's what they did.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) In spite of some of the problems in the campaign, your husband defeated George Bush and became president.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) And in addition to being First Lady, you're a mother.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

That's right.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) And one of the people whom you went to for advice was a former First Lady, Jacqueline Onassis, and that was very meaningful to you. What, what did she teach you. What did she tell you?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Yeah. Oh, Barbara. You know, she was so warm and kind to me. We talked about raising children in the public spotlight because she had done it with such grace and success. She stressed how you could never let your child become kind of an object of all this public interest, because it would ruin them. You had to keep making sure they didn't feel entitled or indulged. And I took those lessons to heart.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You also asked Mr. Onassis about your appearance. You said, "Should I change -should I change my look?" That was the headband days.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Well, yes, that was the headband days. And here I am, you know, hardly an icon of fashion, asking one of the 20th century icons. And I really appreciated her response. She said, oh, be yourself. You know, just do what you feel right about. It, it was a funny conversation. You know, tell me, Jackie, what do you think? Oh, just go be yourself. And it was good advice.

ANNOUNCER

When we return, the decision that backfired, big time.

ANNOUNCER

When Hillary Clinton's Journey continues, next.

BARBARA WALTERS

Hillary Clinton was never simply Bill Clinton's wife. She was always a woman with her own accomplishments and ambitions. And in the world of politics played at the highest level, that would both set her apart and set her up for constant scrutiny and attacks. She had to cope with the health care fiasco, the suicide of Vince Foster, and the emergence of a woman named Paula Jones.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You became First Lady like no other First Lady before you. You had your own interests. You got involved in public policy. No First Lady had done that without being severely criticized. Did you realize what you were getting into?

Oh, my goodness. What I got myself into I never could have predicted. You know, I tell a story in the book about how then- Governor Mario Cuomo said to me, boy, what did you do to make your husband so mad at you? And I said, what are you talking about? He said, you'd have to be really mad at somebody to put them in charge of health care.

video clip of congressional hearing

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) But Bill Clinton did put his wife in charge of a task force on national health care reform, and the group labored for two years amid controversy and criticism. But with it all, their proposals failed to attract support in Congress.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) After the health care bill was defeated, the Democratic party lost control of both the House and the Senate in the midterm elections. Did you blame yourself? And did your husband ever blame you?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Oh, my husband never did. But there's no doubt that the disappointment people felt over our failure on health care certainly kept a lot of Democrats at home, and kind of inspired a lot of opposition on the other side. I believe that I probably in some way helped to contribute to those losses. It made me feel terrible.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) One of the most tragic events during your husband's first term was the suicide of Deputy White House Counsel, and your close friend, Vince Foster.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) And there were the investigations into the cause of his death. The more vitriolic newspapers almost went so far as to, to say that it was murder.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

That's right.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) And all the investigations later determined it was a suicide. But it was a terrible time.

Well, you know, Barbara, that whole year was one of incredible highs and terrible lows. You know, you go from seeing your husband sworn as, as President of the United States on January 20th, and a few months later on, by my father's bedside in an intensive care unit watching him die. A few months after that our good friend, someone we cherished, kills himself. And then, before the year is out, Bill's mother dies. It's hard no matter what color the house you live in. But when you're in the White House, and your husband as a 24-hour a day job, and you have public responsibilities and duties, I, I think it's probably even harder to keep going.

So, when I think even about that it, it just makes my stomach knot up. And you know, certainly, both Bill and I and all of Vince's friends have asked ourselves a million times since then, what could we have done? Is there some word we could have said, some action we could have taken that might -possibly have prevented this terrible tragedy?

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) In the middle of all this, in the middle of your husband's first term, a woman named Paula Jones accused the president of making unwarranted advances to her years before, and she filed a civil suit against him for $700,000 in damages. Did you, for a moment, believe her?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

No. No. And, you know, when the judge threw out her case and said it was without factual or legal merit, I think that about summed it up. But I'm not saying it's easy, those were difficult days, but it was what I had to do.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) I can barely remember a week that went by when one of you wasn't being criticized and investigated. There was Travelgate, there was White Water, there was the handling of Vince Foster's death, there was the health care bill, there was everything.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) And I remember, we did an interview in the middle of all of that and I said to you ...

On a very cold January day.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) On a very cold, snowy ...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

That's right.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) ... January day.

Mm hmm.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) And I said to you then, how did you get in this mess where your whole credibility is being questioned?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Oh, I ask myself that everyday, Barbara, because it's very surprising and confusing to me.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

No, in retrospect, everything that was thrown at me, everything that was said turned out to be without basis in fact. But that didn't help at the time, because we had this out of control, zealous prosecutor who was on a partisan campaign to undermine Bill and me and everyone else. And what I regretted the most was the way so many innocent people were caught up in this. You know, when Bill ran for president, in effect, he put himself into that position, and I gladly went along, because I believed he would be a good president for our country. But so many other people who were totally innocent and just standing by were caught up in this, in this relentless series of investigations. And that, to me, is still a very painful part of that whole experience.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Looking back, we've talked about so many of the difficult things, if I asked to you pick the major accomplishment of those first four years, what comes into your mind?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Turning the economy around. It breaks my heart that in two and a half years we've gone back into huge deficits and debt and jobs are down and people are falling back into poverty. I just find that heartbreaking. But, those first four years were tough but very good for the country.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) The Clintons got out of country more than any first family before them. Together or separately, or with Chelsea, they visited 78 countries during Bill Clinton's presidency. Hillary Clinton made a milestone trip to Beijing where she spoke passionately of women's right in a country where they were extremely limited.

FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON,

UNITED STATES

It is a violation of human rights when babies are denied food or drowned or suffocated to their spines broken, simply because they are born girls.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I think that it did make a difference. Part of what I had to learn, and this may sound, again, a little naive and I, I plead to that, is that the First Lady of the United States is judged, assessed, held accountable, not simply or even primarily by what she does, because, of course, it's a role, it's not a job. And it is a, a role that comes with whom you are married to, not what you, yourself, do. And so, therefore, she is judged as much as a symbol as a person.

ANNOUNCER

Sex, lies, and the aftermath of Monica. Hillary Clinton's rage and pain.

ANNOUNCER

"Hillary Clinton's Journey, Public, Private, Personal," returns. Once again, Barbara Walters.

BARBARA WALTERS

No doubt, the first thing many readers will do when they get Hillary Clinton's new autobiography is turn to the index and look up one name, Monica Lewinsky.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Senator, I have to go back now to perhaps the most difficult time of your life, and it is something that you write about very frankly. Wednesday, January 21st, 1998. You write that your husband woke you up, sat on the edge of the bed and gave you some troubling news. What did he tell you?

Well, he told me there was going to be a newspaper article that alleged that he had some kind of a relationship with a young woman. And he said he was very upset about the article, and he wanted me to know before I got up and read it in the paper myself. And he told me it wasn't true.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Did you believe him?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I did believe him. You know, by that time, Barbara, so many accusations had been made about me that were just extraordinary, outrageous accusations. And I knew they weren't true. And I knew that for whatever reason people felt obligated or compelled to make them. And so, it didn't seem unusual to me that something like this would be said.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) One more false rumor?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

That is what I believed, yes.

video clip of monica lewinsky

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) For seven months before your husband admitted to you what he had done, there were reports and mounting evidence of a relationship. Late night phone calls and logged visits and gifts. Did you just dismiss all of it?

I really didn't think it added up to a lot. You know, I really looked at it from the perspective of, oh, my gosh. You know, one more hurdle to get over, one more problem to deal with. And one of the ways that I kept going all those years in the White House was to, you know, do what I could to try to figure out what was happening, to cross examine my husband to feel like I knew ...

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Which you did. You asked him ...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Which I did.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) ... again and again?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Absolutely. But then to go on, because, you know, given the atmosphere we had lived in since really 1992, there was so much that literally could have knocked us off kilter. And certainly, I could have found myself just constantly reacting to what was said.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Then on Saturday, August 15th, just as he had done before, your husband woke you up. This time he had something different to say.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

That was probably the worst moment that I can even imagine anyone going through, because what he told me that morning was that he had not leveled with me or anyone else. He had not told me the whole truth about what the relationship was. And I was, I was furious. I was dumbfounded. I was, you know, just beside myself with anger and disappointment. You know, I couldn't imagine how he could have done that to me or to anyone else. And that's what I basically told him on that long-ago morning now.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You write, "I could hardly breathe. I started crying and yelling at him, 'What are you saying? Why did you lie to me?'" What did your husband say? How did he explain it?

He just kept saying that he was very sorry, over and over again. And I could tell that he was. But that wasn't much comfort. I was still furious, and stayed furious for quite some time. But he just kept saying over and over again, you know, I'm sorry. I'm sorry. I'm sorry.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Terrible time.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) You told your husband he had to tell Chelsea.

I did.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) What did you say to Chelsea?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Well, I'm going to continue my policy of not talking about conversations with my daughter. But it was a terrible time for all of us, as a family.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) There is that picture that we all remember of you and the president and Chelsea and the dog, Buddy ...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Right.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) ... walking into the helicopter when you were about to go off on a vacation in Martha's Vineyard, which I'm sure you had no desire to do.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

That's very true. That's very true.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) And you write that Buddy had a special role.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Buddy was the only member of our family who wanted to be with Bill. I think that's fair to say. Imagine going through what is a very personal, private, painful time in front of the world. And you owe obligations to your country that you have to keep fulfilling. People who don't wish America well are looking at this closely. And the president has to continue being president. You have to carry on. And so, you become almost divided because personally, it was excruciatingly difficult. Publicly, we had to carry on.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Then, here you are in Martha's Vineyard in a borrowed house, now, the four of you ...

Buddy ...

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) ... you, the president, Buddy, yes, and Chelsea. What was that like?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

It was lonely. Very, very difficult. I wasn't talking to my husband. I didn't have anything to say to him. I was so disappointed and angry.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Did you consider separation or divorce?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

It certainly crossed my mind. You know, I wasn't in a position where I've read about some people who, you know, threw their husband's clothes out the window on their lawn. I couldn't do anything like that, although, you know, I, I could have wrung his neck for a million reasons. I thought about everything. And that's all I spent my time doing, thinking hard. There were many people who were very kind to me during that period. And I mentioned some of them in the book, some good old friends but some unexpected people like Walter Cronkite and his wife who called me up and said, we're gonna take you sailing.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I was in no mood to go sailing. He insisted, you've got to come sailing. We want you to come sailing with us. It was such a kind gesture. Getting through those days was very hard. They were long, long days. But the time away helped me enormously.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) I don't think people realize how strong your faith is. It goes all through the book. It must have helped you then.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

It was the primary source of help to me. I was raised with faith, and that's a great gift to give a child, and I have relied on it. I've relied on prayer. I had to reach deep down into my own faith and ask myself, you know, what is it that I thought was right to do? And there were many people who were giving me all kinds of conflicting advice, and I appreciated their interest and their support, but ultimately I had to get on my knees and I had to pray and I had to look for answers that only could come to me. You have to decide to do what you think is right, because your friends won't be there at 3:00 in the morning.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Were you ever able to explain to yourself why your husband did it?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Well, I think I learned a lot, especially during the counseling that we had. The counseling, you know, led me to believe that this was a marriage and a love that I wanted to try to preserve, if it could be. And I was willing to try.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) At one point you describe what your husband had done as a sin of weakness.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

It clearly was. You know, a friend who's something of a theologian said to me during this period, that there were two kinds of sins, sins of weakness and sins of malice. And I think that, you know, my husband has so many strengths and is such a fundamentally good person with a good heart, it was a question for me whether this particular wrongdoing, or sin, was something that we could work through together.

ANNOUNCER

When we return, the lingering question of trust.

BARBARA WALTERS

Would she or wouldn't she? That was the question almost everyone was debating as the Monica affair played out before the world. Would Hillary Clinton stay with the man who had betrayed and humiliated her? We know the decision she finally came to, but how did she get there? How did she hold her head up and defend President Clinton in what was surely the most difficult days of her life?

video clip from president clinton's impeachment hearing

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) Then came the impeachment hearings and the Senate trial.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) And you argued in front of Congress, as a matter of fact, that you could divide your feelings about your husband and your feelings about Bill Clinton as president. You said that your husband's actions were deplorable, but they were not impeachable. Is that how you got through all of that horror of the impeachment and the trial and the Starr report and everything else?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I was -caught in a circumstance where this was my husband and I felt that the only people who had a right to judge and hold him accountable for his private behavior were Chelsea and me. Those were the people that he had most betrayed. But he was also my president, and I thought, had done a great job as president despite a constant barrage of efforts to personally destroy him and undermine him. And therefore, I had this unusual experience and this rather unique perspective. So, while I was still somewhat unsure about my marriage and its future, the jury was really out about whether the marriage would survive, whether I wanted it to survive. I was absolutely committed to fighting this terrible misuse of the Constitution and abuse of our legal system, because I thought it was terrible for our country.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) If I asked you straight out, was there and is there a right wing conspiracy to destroy your husband's presidency, would you today say yes?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I would say that there is a very well-financed, right wing network of people, it's not really a conspiracy because it's pretty much out in the light of day, that was after his presidency from the very beginning. Really stopped at nothing, even to the point of perverting the Constitution in order to undermine what he was trying to do for the country.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) In the midst of all this, Hillary Clinton was approached by Democrats to run for a New York Senate seat about to be vacated by Daniel Patrick Moynihan.

video clip of hillary clinton campaign party

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) Her friends advised her against it. And when you see her on the stump today it's hard to remember how difficult a decision it was. She wasn't even from New York. In November 7th, 2000, she was elected the state's junior Senator. At her side, one of her biggest supporters, Bill Clinton.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) You write that when you ran for the Senate, you became closer to your husband, 'cause you were talking about something else besides your own personal problems. But was there a day, was there a time, when you said, I forgive him? This marriage will go on.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Yes. Yes. It took a long time, but I reached the point where I decided that I was either going to have to forgive and let go of the anger and the disappointment that I had felt or we weren't gonna have a marriage. And both of us worked very, very hard to reach that point.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) What did your husband say when you told him it's okay. We're going to go on?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

He was very relieved and grateful, because that's what he'd been asking for. And it was something that we, you know, had to work toward. I didn't just wake up one day and decide. It took quite some time.

video clip of bill and hillary clinton

BARBARA WALTERS

(Voice Over) Do you trust your husband totally today?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

You know, we've really been tried and tested. And we are at the point now that we're looking forward. I hope that we'll grow old together. That's how I look at our future.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Okay. I have to ask it. What if he does something in the future that is similar?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

You know, that will be between us. And that will be that zone of privacy that I believe in. But right now, I'm very, very hopeful and very committed to our marriage and our relationship.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) There is the big question, what people most want to know and it's this, how could you stay in this marriage? There is something in your book on page 75 that I thought answered the question, and I have underlined it. Would you read it?

Sure.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) If you memorized it it would be fine.

I, I think, I have not memorized the book.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) I know you haven't seen this. But ...

I'll have, oh. Oh, right. "I'm often asked why Bill and I have stayed together. All I know is that no one understands me better and no one can make me laugh the way Bill does. Even after all these years, he is still the most interesting, energizing and fully alive person I have ever met. Bill Clinton and I started a conversation in the spring of 1971, and more than 30 years later we're still talking."

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Thank you, Senator.

Thank you.

ANNOUNCER

In a moment, some final thoughts.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Hillary Clinton's memoir ends with her last day in the White House. But I dare say, as her journey continues, she'll have plenty of material for a second autobiography. It's not beyond the realm of possibility that she would become not only the first First Lady to be elected Senator, but also the first First Lady to become president. And that raises an intriguing prospect. Bill Clinton as the first president to become a first man or first spouse or whatever? So much has happened to this couple, that it seems anything could happen. Stay tuned. I'm Barbara Walters. For all of us at ABC News, good night.

"This Week with George Stephanopoulos," ABC, 6/8/2003

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) 2004, the Presidency. Suppose, okay, you can do the question. But suppose these Democrats, maybe the same ones who said you should run for the Senate, say you must, for the sake of the party, run in 2004. Would you categorically say no?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON,

DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK

I would tell them to take a deep breath, probably two aspirins and get a good night's sleep.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Would you say no?

Absolutely, I'd say no.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) What about 2008?

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Well, she doesn't tell them to take two aspirins for 2008. She says she has no intentions or plans of running, but there are many good women and she hopes they will look at a woman. So 2004, no, 2008?

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Maybe?

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) At least this book clears up a lot of things, George, that she won't have to face in a campaign.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) We all can't wait to see what she does clear up. But meanwhile, she's serving in, in the Senate. And she has to serve with a lot of people who led the fight to impeach her husband.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Absolutely. She's even got a bill for foster care with Tom Delay, whom you know is one of the, one of the major forces in the impeachment of her husband. So I asked her about that and I said, you know, how do you turn enemies into, into allies? And I said, are you a saint, because she was saying, well, no hard feelings, everything is going fine. I'm going to quote what he says. She says "No, but I'm a Senator and my job is to represent New York and I can't feel that there's anything personal about it." So I think that she has now, whatever her feelings are for the future, she's making friends on both sides. Up until now, with the spotlight on her this week, with everything, because she's a junior Senator, she's kept a very low profile. She has not, you know, hogged anything. You would not know that she was not just another Senator, except that, by the way, she constantly has secret servicemen with her.

(Off Camera) And what do we learn about her famous claim she was being pursued by a right wing conspiracy?

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Well, look, I mean, there's no question that they did things that, that led to investigations. If they'd settled originally with Paula Jones and the President wanted to settle with Paula Jones when she wanted $700,000 and Hillary, Senator Clinton, then Mrs. Clinton said no, no, no. If they'd settled there probably never would have been an investigation. Nevertheless, she says that there was and probably still is a right wing, not conspiracy, because she says it's out in the open, but that, that kind of attitude and intention exists. We asked her about that, George.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) If I asked you straight out, was there and is there a right wing conspiracy to destroy your husband's Presidency, would you today say yes?

I would say that there is a very well financed right wing network of people that was after his Presidency from the very beginning. Really stopped at nothing, even to the point of perverting the Constitution in order to undermine what he was trying to do for the country.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) No backing down there, Barbara.

BARBARA WALTERS

(Off Camera) Yeah. And she thinks that the impeachment was the subversion, the subversion of the Constitution.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Okay, Barbara, we're gonna be watching tonight. It's going to be, let me say one more time, on ABC tonight at 7:00 Eastern time, 6:00 Central, 10:00 on the West Coast. Thank you very much.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 6/10/2003

LARRY KING, HOST: Tonight, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, her first live TV interview about her new tell-all book, the woman everybody's talk about. We'll talk as much as we can in depth and personal next on LARRY KING LIVE.

Good evening -- I think. And welcome to LARRY KING LIVE. I don't see myself, I assume we're on.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, or should I say "Harry Potter," is our guest. Tow hundred thousand copies, according to Simon and Shuster, sold yesterday of her book "Living History." What do you make of that?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well I'm very gratified.

KING: Surprised?

CLINTON: Well, surprised because I guess it sent some kind of record. But yesterday when I did the book signing in New York City, I had such a good time. About 1,000 people were able to come through before I had to leave. And you know they were so encouraging and telling me how glad they were that I had done this book and giving me advice about, get back to health care, Senator. It was really wonderful experience.

KING: Why did you do this?

CLINTON: Well you know every first lady -- and you know this so well, because I think you've interviewed everyone, I don't know how far back -- but many of my predecessors -- and I always enjoyed their books. I thought they gave us insight and information about what the experience was like in the White House.

So long before Bill's term ended, I began thinking about trying to do the same. And I'm really glad I did, because although it was difficult in many respects, it gave me a chance to talk about the full range of the extraordinary time I had.

KING: Was it cathartic?

CLINTON: You know I've gone through it now and I think I can pretty much say I've closed the chapter having tried to describe as best I could what those years were like for me.

KING: Has it been hard to talk about the Lewinsky thing and the things you had to deal with?

CLINTON: Yes.

KING: Hard?

CLINTON: Yes, it was hard. I mean you know that. It was hard because these were very personal, private, painful matters that unfortunately were made public and I regret that.

But given the fact that they were, they became part of history, not just my personal history. So when I had to sit down and write the book and think about what would go in, I felt obligated to address these issues.

KING: You do think, though, that once it came out it was a journalistic story?

CLINTON: Yes, yes.

KING: If you were an editor of the paper would you have followed the trail?

CLINTON: It was. I just regret that it was made public for very partisan, political reasons that I don't think were good for the country. And the American people figured that out and they really stood by the president as opposed to those who would have ended his presidency.

KING: But what about the author, what about Hillary? She has to stand by and yet be hurt.

CLINTON: You summed it up very well.

KING: Supporting your president and you're pretty mad at your husband.

CLINTON: That about sums it up.

KING: Was that conflicted feelings?

CLINTON: It was having to carry these two competing feelings in my head and heart at the same time. I was, as I say in the book, ready to wring his neck. I was so upset and angry with him, very disappointed.

And yet at the same time, he was my president. And I had this additional, rather unique perspective. I had been on the impeachment staff in back 1974 and I had actually researched the historical and legal grounds for impeachment. And I knew that what was being attempted against this president was absolutely out of line with what the founders had thought, what people had always believed was the basis for Constitutional impeachment.

KING: Clear up something for us. You've written this details of how he told you, the morning he told you, the grand jury. Others are saying you had to know before. There's a book out that said David Kendall told you before. Now no one knows it better than you.

CLINTON: That's right...

KING: What do you make of the stories that you knew before?

CLINTON: Well one of the reasons I did want to write book was so many people are on the sidelines saying I should have done this or I would have done that or in some way talking about my life without having lived it. and I have. So I think I know a little bit about what I did and what I knew.

You know back in January of 1998 when my husband woke me up the first time and said there was going to be a story in the paper, I cross examined him, I asked him some hard questions. But I really didn't have a lot of trouble believing that this was one more in a long series of accusations because by that time I'd been accused of so many things. There had been front page stories around the country that had no basis in fact, that said all kinds of things about me.

So, I viewed this as another in a line of those kinds of accusations. And one of the things that I did to get up every day and keep going was really not pay attention to the press.

KING: Didn't read the paper?

CLINTON: I did not read the paper.

KING: Didn't watch the news?

CLINTON: I did not watch the news. I was focused on doing what I thought of as important, the issues I cared about, working on things like children's health and foster care and the like.

KING: So when he told you is when he told you?

CLINTON: When he told me is when he told me. And of course, David Kendall, who's a dear friend as well as my lawyer, has said that account is not true. And so I think we can put that to rest.

KING: Can you say you were shocked? Is that a good word or..

CLINTON: I was so upset. And I was...

KING: Upset more than shocked?

CLINTON: Well, shocked, upset, dumbfounded. You know, as I describe in the book, I couldn't believe that what he had told me and everybody else, for a very long period of time, was, you know, not the facts.

KING: Did you at all, when this happens to someone -- I've interviewed a lot of psychiatrists over the years. They say one of the first things the injured party feels is guilt. What did I do wrong? Did I do something that led to this? Did you feel that way?

CLINTON: Oh, I don't think I felt that way about that particular instance. But it is the case that we did have to work very hard to decide whether we were going to stay married. And we did have counseling. I write about that...

KING: Did you lay any blame at yourself?

CLINTON: Well I think in a marriage you have to be honest and ask yourself, you know, what is my role? What is my responsibility?

You know, marriage, like any relationship, has two people involved in it, whether it's a problem at a particular period in time or a difficulty that you have to confront together. So I certainly asked myself a lot of hard questions.

KING: How, Hillary, did he explain it to you? I know you, you didn't let it go at just this was a passing affair. How did he explain what happened?

CLINTON: Well, in the book, Larry, I say that that's his story to tell. I have told this from my perspective, you know?

KING: His book well tell it?

CLINTON: Well, it's his story to tell. He has to decide, you know, how much he does share and what he does explain.

But I think what was important to me is that when I found out, I had to really figure out how I was going to keep going. You know, on the one hand, I had this horrible personal betrayal that I had to deal with. On the other hand, he was not only my husband, he was my president. And I thought what was being done to him was really out of bounds. He should have answered to me and to Chelsea...

KING: So you could think both things at the same time? He's being done wrong but he did me wrong.

CLINTON: That about sums it up. That sounds like a country western song.

KING: That's sort of like -- yes. That's sort of like spinning around, though, isn't it? You could go nuts.

CLINTON: Well, it was very hard. It was very hard because -- but I think anybody who's been in these positions, it may not be my particular set of circumstances...

KING: A lot of the population has.

CLINTON: Well, certainly. And you know, if you're a teacher or a doctor or drive a forklift, as I say in my book, you know, you've to go on with the public part of your life. But you don't have the whole world watching you.

You know at the very time that this awful experience was unfolding in our personal lives, I knew that my husband was getting briefed on a regular basis about whether or not our intelligence could pinpoint bin Laden so that we could try to launch missiles at his training camp and remove the threat that he posed.

KING: But didn't the pain supersede that?

CLINTON: Of course the pain in the beginning was overwhelming, but...

KING: I mean you didn't go to bed thinking about bin Laden?

CLINTON: No, but I put that in the book because I want people to understand what was at stake here. Which is why I feel so strongly that the politics of personal destruction which were waged against us was terrible for our country.

KING: We'll take a break and come back and ask about the private lives of public people. Our guest is Hillary Rodham Clinton. The book is "Living History." Don't go away.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: We're back with Senator Clinton.

Why didn't you get divorced?

CLINTON: Well, I had to ask myself that. It was a very prominent question in my mind. And we had to work really hard to decide what was going to happen with our marriage. But...

KING: Did it come -- almost think of that? I mean, was it...

CLINTON: Well, I certainly entertained it. I think anybody in my position had to or would have.

But, you know, as I write in the book, we've been together now more than 30 years, started dating in law school, started working together. We're very proud of the daughter we raised. We've been through a lot with our families. We've done so much for each other. And we decided that, you know, we really wanted to grow old together. So we made that decision.

KING: But you had, even as you said in the "60 Minute" interview, which you write about, you had other trials in your marriage.

CLINTON: Well, I don't know any marriage that doesn't have trials. You know, thankfully most of them are pulled out for people to dissect and analyze. But we were certainly, you know, able to say that we had worked through a lot of things and yet we never had the intense and focused effort that we put in after August '98 with the counseling and really trying to, you know, ask some of the hard questions that need to be asked in a marriage.

KING: How much of a public life is my business?

CLINTON: You know, Larry, I think we've gone from one extreme to the other. I think if we look back on our history, we had some very effective public servants who may have had some problems in their personal life and people who were perhaps paragons of personal behavior but were not good publicly to our country.

And what I want is for people to recognize that those in public life, like all of the rest of us, are human beings. You know, we have our strengths and our weaknesses, our faults and our abilities. And I often think of this old Irish saying that if our sins and flaws were written on our forehead we'd go around with a cap over our eyes because none of us could, you know, bear that constant exposure.

KING: But when you choose the life you chose, you choose to lay bare the other aspects, right? You're open for it.

CLINTON: Well...

KING: When you run for re-election, everything's fair.

CLINTON: In recent days, in recent years, that's become certainly the practice. But you can look back on our history and know that that wasn't always the case.

But it is what it is. And so you have to live with the rules that are currently in place. And one of the reasons why I believe in public service is because I think it's important to try to keep the focus on what those of us in elected office are trying to do on behalf of the country and I must say the American people got it straight and right from the very beginning. They understood that this was between us, as it would have been between them in a marriage, and that what was important is the job that Bill was doing as president.

KING: What do you think of Monica Lewinsky?

CLINTON: You know...

KING: What do you think of her?

CLINTON: Well, I have to say that, you know, as I write in the book, I think that everybody's privacy in this situation was invaded and I regret that. And I think was unnecessary and I really do believe it was part of a concerted effort to use whomever to try to end this presidency, mostly because...

KING: (UNINTELLIGIBLE) it were a Republican, don't you think the Democrats would have had a concerted effort to...

CLINTON: I don't...

KING: ...get that president. You don't think so?

CLINTON: I don't think so.

KING: You really don't?

CLINTON: I really don't, in part because I don't think they're very good at it. They don't really have that kind of mentality.

KING: The Democrats are not good at...

CLINTON: No, that's not what they worry about or think about in large measure.

I think that you can disagree with people and debate over their positions with issues without engaging in the politics of personal destruction. And that's what I really regret and hope we never go back to that.

KING: The other instances that came to light -- you don't dwell a lot on Paula Jones or Gennifer Flowers. You don't mention Katherine Willey. Reason?

CLINTON: You know, all of those things were investigated and looked into and, you know, they're part of history. And I'll leave it to other people.

KING: I know that. But personally to Hillary, personal feeling to you. You know about the investigation. How do you feel?

CLINTON: You know, I have talked a lot in this book about how I feel. But I also believe in the continuing right of every person to have a zone of privacy, which is an expression I've used and I still believe in. I have tried to, you know, let people have a better idea of what I think and how I feel and how I reacted.

KING: But not everything?

CLINTON: Not everything. I don't think that's appropriate.

KING: How did Chelsea handle it?

CLINTON: I'm going to leave that to her. She's an adult now. I don't talk about her, as you know, going all the back to the beginning Bill's run for the presidency. But I'm very grateful that, you know, she is a wonderful, level-headed young woman with a life of her own.

KING: What's she doing now?

CLINTON: She's still studying over in England and she'll be finishing up this summer.

KING: She serious with this young man?

CLINTON: I would get in a lot of trouble if I started talking about that.

KING: Do you like him?

CLINTON: Oh, I -- yes, I do. I do. I think I have a lot of respect for her judgment.

KING: We'll take a break and be back with more of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. The book is "Living History." It's already set a one-day record. Over 200,000 copies sold on the first day it was available.

Don't go away.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: On July 20, 1993, this program came to you live from the White House. The guest was president Bill Clinton. And halfway through that interview we asked him if he would like to stay an extra half hour. He said he would. Everybody came in my ear, the producers and others, said get him off at 10:00. He's got to be at off 10:00. When we finished, he looked like what the hell is this all about? I didn't know. We didn't know that Vince Foster had killed himself that day. You were in Arkansas that day?

CLINTON: I was.

KING: Were you watching the show?

CLINTON: I was watching the show.

KING: We announced he was going to stay and you played a part in getting him off, didn't you?

CLINTON: I didn't know about what happened until Mack McClarty, Bill's old friend who was then chief of staff in the White House. I was in my mother's house in Little Rock with Chelsea, and he said I have something terrible to tell you and told me that Vince had died and that it appeared to be a suicide. And you know, we were both just -- we couldn't talk. And Mack had grown up with Vince, and he and Bill and Vince all knew each other going back to childhood. And then Mack said I have to ask your advice about something, Bill is on live on LARRY KING LIVE, and he just agreed to do another half hour. But what should we do, because I don't want him to find out on live television.

KING: I had a police wire and called all in.

CLINTON: And would have been a police wire or maybe the AP or someone would have had it. Mack don't you think we ought do something?

I said yes. I said he shouldn't learn about one of his dearest friend's death on live television.

KING: Did you know he was depressed?

CLINTON: None of us knew. As I write in the book, I think every one of us has searched our minds for some clue we missed, something we could have done or said that might have made a difference. You know, Bill tried to get him to come over, I think the night before he killed himself before he -- to watch a movie and he didn't come. I write about the last conversation I had with him some weeks before, I was so busy and caught up, going to our first overseas trip to Japan, and I didn't have much interaction with him. And I write about how I canceled a dinner because I couldn't make it. And in retrospect we learned a lot about depression.

KING: What did you think about the rumors with you and Vince Foster?

CLINTON: That's the kind of thing, I paid no attention to it.

KING: Was it befuddling to you? How did you act.

CLINTON: When you have people who will literally say anything, and we did, I know that in the eight years I was in the White House I was accused of everything including murder. I mean it was a terrible time.

KING: Murder.

CLINTON: Yes. It was awful. And you get to a point where you read these absurd charges, and you just think to yourself, don't these people have any better things to do than make up things about people?

And I shut it out and shut it off and don't pay attention to the any of the stories. Which is why as I said earlier I could shut out story that I heard in 1998 for so long.

KING: You were able to do that, someone could tell you, a friend, a story about you and Vince Foster in certain magazine and you could not read it?

CLINTON: There were so many stories, I can't even begin to tell you. The stories were endless.

KING: Why do you think people don't like you?

CLINTON: Well, I think there may be some reasons why people don't that are certainly legitimate, and that's their perfect right to make their own conclusions. But I really do think a lot of it had to do with Bill's agenda, Larry. There are two very different views about the kind of America we should want to live in and have in the future. And when Bill won, it just absolutely amazed and infuriated some people because they thought they had a lock on the presidency forever.

KING: Why you?

CLINTON: Look, I'm outspoken. I have strong feelings and opinions. I had always worked. I continued to try to help my husband, not only in his campaign but when he got to the White House. So, I think a lot of factors all happening at the same time. But at the bottom of it all, there is a very different view about what should be done in this country. And I'm on one side of that, along with my husband and about half of the country, and the vast right wing network or agenda or whatever you want to call it.

KING: You still believe in that?

CLINTON: Absolutely, I don't think there is any doubt about it.

KING: You wouldn't take that statement back.

CLINTON: I say in the book that it may not be a conspiracy because after all that suggests something secret and behind closed doors, this is out in the open. People who are very much tied in and connected with trying to promote a particular political and ideological perspective.

KING: Did you read "Primary Colors"?

CLINTON: No.

KING: See the movie?

CLINTON: No. Poor Joe in is really going to upset with me.

KING: The book purported to be about you and Bill and running for office and your life, and you have the discipline not to read it?

CLINTON: I do. I do. I don't think I've read any of the books that have been written about me. Some of the statements made, of course, or some of the charges have been brought to my attention. But I had to make a very fundamental decision. And it really goes back to my childhood and the way I was raised. You know, my mother, who had a very tough life, but gave me every ounce of love and attention she could possibly muster, always said to me, you have a choice every single day.

Are you going to act and do what you think is right or are you going to react and be somebody else's pawn in their life and their story?

So ever since I've been a little girl, I've tried to do what I thought was important and what I thought was right. And I certainly needed that by the time my husband got into public life and particularly when he decided to run for president. Because it was relentless. And it was a never-ending series of all kinds of accusation and stories, which if I had spent all of the time reading what other people were saying about me and worrying about what they thought, I'm not sure I would have gotten out of bed in the morning.

KING: On this program in 1997 a caller asked if you would ever run for office and you said absolutely not.

CLINTON: Right.

KING: You reiterated.

CLINTON: Right.

KING: What changed?

CLINTON: I had no intention, no desire. I did not think it was in my future whatsoever. When we got toward the end of the White House years, and people started asking me to run for the Senate and very knowledgeable, politically sophisticated people, I said no, that's absurd, that's ridiculous, I'm not going to do that. But as I began to think about everything I cared about and all of the issues I worked on for so many years on behalf of women and children and families, I decided I would continue to do that. And spend a lot of my time trying to get people who work in the body I'm part of to do what I thought was important.

KING: Do you think you would have beaten Giuliani?

CLINTON: We can't rewrite that history. I think it would have been a great race and I was ready to run it.

KING: We'll take a break and come back with some more moments. We'll touch as many bases as we can in our remaining moments with Hillary Clinton. Your watching LARRY KING LIVE don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLINTON: I am honored today to announce my candidacy for the United States Senate from New York!

I will work my heart of for the next six years for all of you. Thank you. Thank you. Thank you. And god bless you all.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: A few more item. Why did you not discuss the pardons?

CLINTON: Well you know that is really my husband's story to tell. And he'll have to do that. Those were his decisions.

KING: Didn't you as citizen have some thoughts about it?

CLINTON: I'll leave that to him to talk about.

KING: Didn't bother you at all?

CLINTON: We'll leave that to him.

KING: The president promised $20 billion to New York after 9/11. I think he gave $10 billion. Are you disappointed?

CLINTON: No, we actually got...

KING: You got the rest?

CLINTON: We got a promise of nearly $21 billion, and we still need help and we're still working to make sure the money that the Congress appropriated actually gets out to New York and that...

KING: So they haven't reneged?

CLINTON: No. But we're still fighting to get the money where it needs to go.

KING: How did the Rose Law Firm's Whitewater billing arrive into the White House?

CLINTON: You know I write about that in the book. And believe me if there had been anything unusual about that, you would have been still hearing about it because there were certainly a lot of questions raised.

But the fact is that when they showed up they proved what I'd been saying, so...

KING: You don't know how they got there?

CLINTON: No, I don't know how they got there. But they proved what I was saying. And you know every investigation of that whole matter also proved what I had been saying, which was this was a losing real estate deal and unfortunately they spent $70 million basically to say the same thing.

KING: How do you feel about Susan McDougal?

CLINTON: I think she has been very courageous and I write about her in my book. I think that standing up against the full onslaught of the special prosecutor and the sort of partisan attacks that she was under took a lot of courage.

KING: In the Senate yesterday, Assistant Attorney General Michael Chertoff came up to be a federal court appeals judge. The vote was 88-1. You were the one.

CLINTON: Right.

KING: Why?

CLINTON: Well during that time when he was on the staff of the committee in the Senate, a number of the young people who worked in the White House were, I thought, very badly treated by the Senate staff investigating Whitewater. And a number of those young people were put under tremendous pressure, legal bills that they had to run up. And I just didn't think it was handled appropriately or professionally.

KING: So you didn't think him worthy of a judgeship then?

CLINTON: Based on my firsthand knowledge of what went on during that period. But, you know, that's over. That vote is gone and part of history.

KING: Could have skipped the vote, couldn't you?

CLINTON: You know, there were several of these young people who asked me to express the only way I could the very difficult feelings that they had in the way that they were treated by that staff.

KING: So you were making a statement?

CLINTON: Yes. I mean, you know, it was a single vote. But it stood for a lot of what I think was wrong during that period.

KING: Have about two minutes left. There will be a movie about you. And the word is Sharon Stone is going to play you. Do you have a reaction?

CLINTON: Well, I'm obviously flattered. Wouldn't anyone?

KING: Will you watch that?

CLINTON: Probably not.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: You know, I'm too busy living my life. I cannot live other people's ideas of my life. I cannot worry about what other people say about me.

If readers get one thought from this book, it is that you have to live your own life and make the choices that are right for you. And whether you're the only person who listens to your heart and thinks hard about what you should be doing, that's the road you have to take.

And that's what I've tried to do in my life. And, you know, I ended up in the middle of this incredible situation here in Washington and a lot of people were taking very extreme positions about me. But what I've tried to do is to just follow what I thought was right every single day.

KING: Going to run for higher office? What's higher than Senate? Governor.

(LAUGHTER)

KING: Are you going to run for governor one day?

CLINTON: I have no interest or intention to do that.

KING: How about president one day?

CLINTON: I have said I have no intention to do that either.

KING: But intention is not -- we're not going to the '97 statement, right? I will not run.

CLINTON: Well, I guess that just proves that, you know, you have to only say what you believe and what I believe is I have no intention to do that at this time.

KING: Would you describe the marriage today as strong and healthy? Or am I putting words in your mouth?

CLINTON: You know I think now that we're back into something resembling a normal life, which is a great gift to us, you know, we're having a terrific time.

KING: You wrote the book in longhand?

CLINTON: Well, I had a lot of help, and I am very grateful for the help I had. You know, people were a wonderful team. But I did. I wrote in longhand. They had to type it up because I have not mastered the art of thinking on a computer. I go from my head to the fingers.

KING: How is president doing with his book?

CLINTON: Same thing, writing it in longhand. And...

KING: That's due when?

CLINTON: Next year. And he's having a great time doing it.

KING: Good seeing you, Senator.

CLINTON: Good to see you, Larry. Thank you.

KING: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, former first lady and author of the just released memoir, "Living History," sold over 200,000 copies the first day.

"The Early Show," CBS, 6/11/2003

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's book appears to be heading to the top of the best-seller list. According to bookseller Barnes & Noble, "Living History" has already set a one-day record for sales for a non-fiction book. On Tuesday, the former first lady sat down with CBS News correspondent Dan Raviv to talk about the book and some of the personal revelations she's made.

DAN RAVIV reporting:

So far, she says the book tour's a delight. Everyone's being nice to her. She admits, that's a surprise.

You're all the time described as a divisive person, as a polarizing person. Look, you're smiling at me. You don't--you--you don't mean it to be that way. And yet, when we hear about $70 million spent in investigating you and President Clinton, whose fault is it? And, frankly, is $70 million that bad? Federal investigations always cost a lot of money.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON: Well, I suppose it depends upon who's being investigated.

Unidentified Man: William Jefferson Clinton, president of the United States is impeached.

RAVIV: An abuse of the Constitution, partisan--her description of her husband being impeached, though she was angry at him for lying to her about sex with the intern. Did she have to write about that, almost to justify the $8 million from the publisher?

You felt like you had to go into that personal area?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Dan, it was a very--it was a very difficult choice, but here's what I concluded. Things that should have remained private and personal were made public, and I regret that. I think it was wrong, and I hope it doesn't happen to anybody else in public life. And so when I--when I realized that these things had been made public, I didn't see how I could write about my eight years despite all the wonderful things I had to remember and account in the book, without recognizing that this was now part of history. I couldn't act as though it hadn't happened. And so...

RAVIV: There's part of you that wouldn't want to reveal what went on between you and Mr. Clinton?

Sen. CLINTON: I--I don't think anybody should. And I think that it was very unfortunate for our country and unfortunate for the presidency. And what I try to do in the book, is to really explain to the reader that on the one hand, this was a terrible experience and a betrayal for me as a wife, as--as--at a personal level. He was my husband, but he was also my president. And so although I was very concerned about and unsure about the marriage, I was absolutely convinced that what was being done to the president was wrong.

RAVIV: Her book has become her new platform. She is fighting old battles, but also looks to the future, perhaps to move back to the White House as the first female president.

You might run in 2008?

Sen. CLINTON: I have no intention to run.

RAVIV: But she's certainly not ruling it out. For THE EARLY SHOW, Dan Raviv, CBS News, Washington.

CHEN: Dozens of copies of "Living History" allegedly signed by Senator Clinton are already up for sale on eBay.

Still ahead, we'll get an update on the condition of Luther Vandross when we talk with his mother about her son's health and about his music.

Plus, the boys in the band Smashmouth will be here to do their part to save the music. But first, these messages and your local news.

SENATORS CONRAD BURNS AND HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON HOLD NEWS CONFERENCE ON E-911 BILL, 6/12/2003

BURNS: And I'm just delighted that Senator Clinton from New York -- I think the last time I said that I heard she was from Arkansas; I had to race back to the floor and correct that before -- you know she's got these body guards that travel with her now and they come after you...

CLINTON: Because of you.

(LAUGHTER)

BURNS: I know. But I had to go back and correct it.

But she has also brought a perspective to this issue that I think needed to be brought to the issue and raises the awareness of it in the public eye. So I welcome her and thank her for her good work on this.

CLINTON: It is such a pleasure working with Senator Burns on any issue, but particularly this one because it's such an important matter that goes to the real heart of how we take care of each other. And whether it's Montana or New York or any place in our country, we now know that we have the technology that we should be putting to use in order to enhance our emergency services -- and we're not -- and that's what this legislation is aimed to fix.

So I very much thank Senator Burns who's really been the leader and the voice for this and is the co-chair along with me of the congressional E-911 caucus. But I really have to thank all of you who are in this room because you are the ones who have kept this issue on the forefront of our minds.

And John has just been tireless along with everyone associated with Nina (ph), and Diana, I thank you and AFCO because these two organizations have made sure that we really are hearing from the people on the front lines across our country and for that I'm grateful.

I think that as we introduce this legislation, we have to keep in mind why we're here and what this is about. In a few minutes, I will have the honor of introducing to you two women who will speak firsthand about why this is important. Their experiences and the tragedies they suffered are ones that motivate me everyday to try to make sure we get this legislation passed along with our House counterparts who are working as well.

Now, in New York, our state started tapping wireless customers with a 911 surcharge on their monthly bills back in 1991. The surcharge which to date totals $1.20 a month has raised nearly $300 million in revenues, almost all of which have been diverted for things that have nothing to do with E-911 deployment and infrastructure and that goes right to the heart of what Senator Burns was saying.

CLINTON: It's very frustrating when you have a state that was farsighted enough to put the surcharge on for this purpose, and yet year after year in our state capital the money doesn't go there.

And some of you were here a few months ago when I introduced Assemblyman David Koon, who's been the leader in our state because of the personal tragedy he suffered when his daughter was desperately seeking police assistance, having been kidnapped and then unfortunately, tragically brutally murdered. They couldn't find her. They didn't know where she was.

Two hundred and twenty one million paid in 911 surcharges by cell phone users in New York has been used to fill holes in budgets in New York, and that's just plain wrong because this is about how we respond to emergencies, but it's even more importantly about how we prevent emergencies and how we prevent tragedies of all kinds.

Now, just recently I was pleased that the state legislature in the budget in New York included a $100 million bonding authority provision that can be used for grants to public safety answering points, the PSAPs, for 911 infrastructure training, all of the pieces that need to be put in place in order for this to work. And I wish that it had been $300 million, which is what we've asked for and which is what we've collected in 911 surcharges, but I think it's important that at least we've got this legislation on the books.

I also wish that the debt service for the bonds would have been legislatively designated as being paid for out of the surcharge. But that's not the case, it's going to come out of general revenues. But at least we're on the boards with this innovative approach toward getting the dollars we need in New York.

Now, this bill, I think will take us even further. And there are several provisions which will absolutely close the circle on what we're trying to do. Creating this national task force to increase federal coordination among federal, state and local emergency communication systems, emergency personnel and public safety organizations is one of the things that we heard from all of you, that there is no constant, reliable communication in every part of the country. We hope to be able to fix that.

The bill would authorize $500 million in much needed matching grants, as Senator Burns said, to all kinds of jurisdictions to be able to do this work. And finally, and very importantly for New York, this bill will hold states accountable so that we don't see the diversion of 911 surcharge revenues for other purposes.

Now when we look at this problem it's easy to get caught up in the legislation and the statistics, but I want to remind us why what we're doing is so critically important. As many of you know, tragically this past winter in New York four young men were lost in a boat in the waters off of New York City. Just, you know, four young high-spirited, energetic students who were going on an adventure that I bet every single one of us can think back and remember something we did comparably.

No, not Conrad, though, I know that.

And tragically they called for help. That call got through, but it wasn't responded to and there was no infrastructure in place to be able to pinpoint their location.

CLINTON: Two of their mothers are with us, and I would like to ask them to come forward now. Mrs. Badillo (ph) and Mrs. Duffy (ph) will tell you in their own words about their sons and about what they've been doing over the past months. They have been tireless, lobbying in Albany, speaking out, trying to ensure that what happened to them doesn't happen to any other mother or father in New York or elsewhere in our country.

And I would like now to ask Virginia to come forward, and then Barbara Duffy (ph).

VIRGINIA BADILLO (ph): Good morning.

On January 24, my son Henry Badillo (ph), Max Barino (ph), Charles William Baker (ph) and Andrew Melikoff (ph) were in a boating tragedy. At 9:58, Henry made a desperate 911 call on his cell phone to dispatch operators and told them that the boat was taking in water off the coast of (inaudible) Long Island Sound. His last words were, "Oh, God, we're going to die."

Rescue crews didn't start looking for the boys until 14 hours later, in part because they couldn't locate the boat's location. Our sons were recently recovered, from January 24 to May 19, Max being the first, Henry the last.

If the 911 enhancement had been in place, our sons could have been alive today. The parents of these boys support the federal funding and oversight to upgrade the E-911 system with emphasis on improving local emergency callers -- PSAPs -- ability to locate wireless callers.

Thank you so much, Senator Clinton and Burns and everyone who has been involved in this enhanced 911. Hopefully we'll be the last parents to lose our children in this type of accident. And thank you everyone for your support. Thank you.

BARBARA DUFFY (ph): Virginia and I are here today on behalf of our children, but also on behalf of all the other fathers and mothers who use cell phones as a method of safety for their children.

My son was going to turn 18 this year, and he was looking forward to being able to vote for the first time. And we're very excited that there's been bipartisan support in New York State and now on the federal level to do the right thing. And he would be very proud to see government working.

And we'd like to thank everyone who was involved in New York State and now on the federal level for making this a reality, and we hope that we're the last parents who have to stand in front of you having suffered a tragedy.

BARBARA DUFFY (ph): Thank you.

BURNS: Questions?

By the way, there's one thing we failed to mention -- not only the testimony of these two mothers, but we could retell that story many times. But this also sets up a task force and it coordinates the agencies between Justice and Homeland Security, the Departments of Interior, Transportation, FCC and, of course, with the local agencies, just it sets up that task force so that these agencies communicate.

We find out that we set up with some plans, and they're grand plans, but they bog down because one agency doesn't correspond or communicate with another. And so this sets up a task force we hope to get through that bump, so to speak, that barrier that we always have of turf and walls and, of course, communications.

So with that, we'd take some questions. Yes, sir?

QUESTION: Senator Burns and Clinton, there's been a lot of criticism over the sky-rocketing federal deficit. Where do you expect Congress to find the $500 million a year to pay for this grant program?

BURNS: Well, that's a good question. Have you got any ideas?

I think, you know, whenever we start talking about authorizing money and then it boils down to the will and priority. In other words, are we funding some programs that Americans can do themselves or is it the purpose of government to provide an infrastructure so that the imagination and ingenuity takes over from there.

When you boil this down, sure it sounds like a lot of money of the federal government. When you look at all of the communication centers that have to be reworked and that technology brought up to speed, it's really not a lot. And so they're still going to have to do some very imaginative things in each one of our states and jurisdictions in order to get this done. It boils down to a matter of will and a matter of just why we're here and what the role of the federal government should be.

CLINTON: I would just add that, you know, to me this is fundamental to homeland security. This is part of the national effort we're undertaking now with our new department and with our commitment to providing the infrastructure and resources to make us safe here at home. So this goes right up at the top of the list with border security and port security. Because we don't have this system, a lot of what we think we're getting by investing in homeland security will not be as effective.

QUESTION: Is there any provision in there -- I haven't read it -- on dealing with the portability of cell phone numbers?

BURNS: No. Not yet. That's a different issue.

QUESTION: But there has been some talk about attaching something like that to this legislation.

BURNS: Well, there may be talk of it...

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

BURNS: We got to understand, you know, you've got a lot of private entity that is involved in this. And we also have an economic situation of deployment. Then I think we have to boil down and look at our priorities, look at our priorities. Right now we can, using wireless, route that 911 call into the nearest first responder. We can do that now.

When you start talking about portability, then you're talking about another issue. Yes, it's important, but basically I think we've already made the first hump in portability and that is guiding the 911 into the right first responder; and number two, and locating them. That's the first two priorities. Let's don't throw an economic situation in here where we don't get either one of them done in a timely fashion.

CLINTON: I think that's a very important point. We're trying to walk before we run. We know we may need to run eventually, but let's try to get this national system up and going.

You know, one of the problems -- and you allude to it -- is, you know, if you've got a 202 area code on your cell phone and you're in Montana enjoying the dirt between the light bulbs, you know...

(LAUGHTER)

... and something happens to you, and you call in, it may be more difficult to find, you know -- we've had those stories, where, you know, you call 911 and it rings in Washington instead of, you know, in Missoula or somewhere.

So I think that our challenge, though, is to get the national infrastructure going. And we expect, frankly, the private sector to be a partner in this and to innovate along with us and to help us get the answers that we need. But right now we're kind of letting everybody off the hook. You know, the states have an excuse, the local communities have an excuse, the private sector has an excuse -- everybody's got an excuse. And I think both Conrad and I are trying to figure out a way to clear the field of excuses so that we can get a system in place.

QUESTION: Step me through this process of certification, because I can envision a situation where the states are not diverting funds, but the localities are diverting the funds. So, you know, I mean, would that then make the whole state not eligible or not that locality or what?

BURNS: Well, I think we'll probably hold the states. I think once the states get it -- I mean, the majority of states that I have visited have said, "You give us the money if it's designated to go into it."

Most states have set up communications departments through Homeland Security that advise the governors on their needs for emergency communications needs. And with that high a visibility I have an idea that that money will go to those communication centers or where it is needed to put this in place.

BURNS: States are a little closer to the people and counties are a little closer yet. And the closer you get to the people, the better use of the money most times. OK?

Yes, sir?

QUESTION: I was going to ask you (inaudible) that OMP thing is on the House side there's some discussion of (inaudible) on that issue. But also on the House said they wanted to deal with the issue that some of these rural carriers, the one that always carries the rural are going to have trouble maybe meeting some of the standards for FCC and providing some overall flexibility for them. Is that something you would at least look at as part of your goal (ph) system goes forward?

CLINTON: Well obviously, you know, we've put together what we think is a bill that has the main components in it, and that we believe can have bipartisan support in the Senate and we can actually get it passed. There's such a thing, as you know, called a conference committee. If the House tries to do something a little bit differently, obviously we're going to sit down.

But the important goal for us is to get this passed. It's going to take some time to get it implemented. It's going to take time to get the money not only authorized, but appropriated. We want to get on the road with this. So I hope that whatever comes out of the House will be compatible enough and not controversial so we can try to get a bill this year to the president and get on the road with this QUESTION: You have yet to appoint a leader (inaudible)?

BURNS: Yes.

CLINTON: Yes.

BURNS: I will tell you everything takes longer -- Murphy's Law takes over here. It just does in this town of what I call 17 square miles of logic-free environment. And then if it's good, everybody wants to have a little fingerprint on it. We've got to deal with that. And we can deal with that, because that's what they pay us to do.

CLINTON: Is that what they pay us to do?

BURNS: Yes, you don't need the money, huh?

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: Could you walk us through some of the penalties, if there are any involved with the states non-compliant with this?

BURNS: Well, they would just lose any kind of federal funding that...

QUESTION: Is that as well as the implementation of the technology in that state?

BURNS: Yes, well, in other words, if they misuse the funds, then they're taken out of the business of even applying for a grant, matching grant.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

CLINTON: That's what we hope that won't happen.

BURNS: That's right.

CLINTON: It's kind of, you know...

BURNS: I think you underestimate the power of sheriffs' departments and communication centers and the power that they have with the state legislatures. You've got to remember that they all respond. They're just like we are. And they respond to those emergency situations. And you know, this -- not all the answers are here. And so it's -- we've got all of the answers, you just don't have the right questions.

(LAUGHTER)

No, I can't say that. But really, we underestimate the power that state legislatures and governors have. And at the local people, I'll tell you what, what really spurred this along was the local people says hey, that money is not getting down here.

CLINTON: Right.

BURNS: And it energized the New York State Assembly and it energized the people in Helena, Montana. And it wasn't very long, they were here. And remember, we got -- there's a lot of politics. This doesn't start here nor does it end here.

CLINTON: And this is kind of a political squeeze play here.

BURNS: Yes.

CLINTON: We've got the local people who are adamant about this, and that's why I don't frankly worry about what happens in the counties, because I think they're chafing at the bit to get going.

CLINTON: And we've got now, you know, a very good piece of legislation here in the Congress so we're going to get this done. And many of the states -- look, we know the problems the states have -- I understand that very well and this money has been diverted for, you know, in many instances projects and expenditures that are also important but that's not the point. The point is the money should have gone where it was intended to go and this is aimed at getting that done and that's what we hope will happen.

BURNS: Trying to rearrange their priority list.

CLINTON: That's right, exactly.

BURNS: Yes sir, last question.

QUESTION: Is there any estimate of how much (inaudible) it would cost to get an E-911 system up and running? It looks like with matching grants it would be $1 million in funds in total, is that enough or is more needed?

BURNS: It's eleven o'clock, we got another press conference.

(LAUGHTER)

I'm glad you led into that, that's just a little teaser for this, you know. You got to stick around -- more to come, right after this. We got to go pay some bills now, the commercial comes.

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

BURNS: Thank you very much for your interest. We really appreciate that.

"Inside Politics," CNN, 6/27/2003

WOODRUFF: I sat down with New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton about a wide range of issues yesterday, including the White House-backed Medicare reform bill. Senator Clinton opposed the measure. She says it doesn't go far enough. Senator Edward Kennedy, however, decided to support the bill. He was a leading supporter. I asked Senator Clinton if she thinks Kennedy made a mistake.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CLINTON: I think he believes given the fact we have a Republican president and Republican majorities in both Houses, that this is the best we're going to get, and we should take it as a down payment. And I understand that position. I don't agree with it, but I certainly think it's a credible, supportable position to have.

WOODRUFF: You don't agree with it. And the other piece of this is, is doesn't it take a potentially good issue for the Democrats off the table and let the president have a victory here?

CLINTON: Well, I don't think about it like that. I mean to me you're supposed to be doing the work for the people who send you to Washington and the politics will take care of itself.

What I'm worried about is the substance of the compromise that I'm afraid will come out of a conference committee between the House and the Senate. You know clearly everyone wants the same goal, a prescription drug benefit. I believe it should be in Medicare. I think that we're looking down the road at so much confusion and so many problems for seniors to try to understand what this means. People are going to be paying benefits for a service that they're not going to get for part of the time. I mean there's a lot that just doesn't make sense about this proposal.

WOODRUFF: Turn to the Supreme Court, a lot of discussion and speculation about whether there will be a vacancy, a retirement on the Supreme Court right now. If there is, if the president picks a replacement is it automatically going to be a bloodbath, do you think, in the fight for confirmation?

CLINTON: I think it depends upon who the president nominates. You know, just this week we've had two landmark decisions, one upholding the role of diversity as a compelling state interest in the admission process to higher education and the other upholding the right to privacy. So clearly a great deal of concern that if we have someone who is so extreme that they couldn't work with the remaining justices, that they would come at these issues from way outside the mainstream of American jurisprudence, then I think there would be a problem. But there are so many thoughtful Republicans who could be nominated, and I hope the administration, if a vacancy opens up, will choose to go that route.

WOODRUFF: Now some Democrats have written a letter to the president saying this should be a collaborative process, that he should consult with Democrats. Now it's my understanding that Republicans did that when your husband was the president. He didn't necessarily agree to do that, I understand. And if that's the case, why should President Bush do it?

CLINTON: Well I think there was a lot of consultation during the Clinton administration. And in fact there were oftentimes a senator from a home state of a nominee who would say no and the administration abided by the rules of the Senate and didn't go forward, and we're not seeing quite that same courtesy now. And, unfortunately, many nominees who were well qualified, who were within the mainstream of American legal thought were held up, never given a vote, filibustered and unfortunately, were not given the chance and honor to serve our country on the bench.

I think what the letter that a number of my colleagues from the Judiciary Committee meant in the effort to try to work collaboratively with the administration was to say you know we're willing and more than willing to meet you more than halfway on a nominee for the Supreme Court. Please pick someone who isn't a poke in the eye, who isn't an extremist and let us work collaboratively with you.

WOODRUFF: Let me ask you about the 2004 election. We have at least nine Democrats out there who have declared they want to be president. They're out there work, they're giving it their heart, they're campaigning day and night, they're pouring their passion, but are they getting their message across? It seems to me they're having a hard time connecting with the American people. What do you think?

CLINTON: I don't think that's a fair assessment. I think that right now they're doing what a candidate so far in advance of any votes being cast have to do. They, unfortunately, have to spend a lot of their time raising money. They do have to get out and meet people and try to round up potential delegates and voters. I think we have some very highly qualified, tough-minded candidates running, and I don't think the American people are paying much attention. They're not handicapping this right now. But when we get closer to votes being cast in the Iowa Caucus, in the New Hampshire Primary, I think you're going to see someone emerge from that process who will be a very viable contender against President Bush.

WOODRUFF: What do you say to those observers, Senator Clinton, who say that your husband out there making speeches, more active than most former presidents have been, you're out there with your book, the comment I heard is well, the Clinton's are -- you know they're getting all the attention, they're hurting the Democrats who are running for president taking attention away from them? What do you say to that?

CLINTON: Well, I don't see that at all. I think that we have good candidates. I'm certainly going to support whoever emerges from this process. And I think it's important that people be reminded of the very significant differences between Democrats and Republicans. And the best way to do that is look at the policies of the Clinton administration and the difference it made in the lives of so many Americans, and compare that to the choices that are being made in this administration. It's a very different vision of the kind of country that we should have in the next generation.

WOODRUFF: Is there a leader of the Democratic Party right now?

CLINTON: I think that there are certainly two leaders, Tom Daschle in the Senate and Nancy Pelosi in the House. And then we will have a leader emerge from this nominating process as our presidential candidate.

"Live From," CNN, 6/30/2003

JUDY WOODRUFF, CNN ANCHOR: Former first lady and now New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's new book has been an instant best- seller with more than 1.5 million copies now in print. The reviews of "Living History" have included tough critiques by both "The Washington Post" and "The New York Times."

When I spoke with Senator Clinton late last week, I started by asking her if she thinks she should have been more candid in the book.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I feel very comfortable about the book. And I've now probably, I guess, shaken hands with and signed books for maybe 12,000 people who have come to see me at these various book signings. And people are starting to come up and tell me about having read the book and saying, "Gee, I related to the story of your mom's life." Or, "I had the same kind of experience with my hair." Or whatever the note might be.

I hope that people will read it and draw their own conclusions. And that seems to be what's happening.

WOODRUFF: Do these criticisms, these reviews, do they ever get to you, or does it just roll off the back?

CLINTON: No. I mean I think people have -- you know, there have been a lot of positive reviews, there have been negative. That comes with the territory. But for me, what's important about this book is that it's my story that I've tried to tell in my way. And of course I care a lot about politics and policies, so people who don't like to read about adoption or foster care, or health care or welfare reform and think that it sounds political, you know they might skip those parts of it.

But those are really important matters to me, because I think politics matters. I think it really does count as to whether you're trying to help people, you know, get a better chance in life or not. And whether you're trying to help the circumstances of people's lives improve. And I have cared about that long before I've had the privilege to be a senator.

WOODRUFF: Just one other thing. I know you've been asked this question before -- I'm sure you've been asked this question before, but a number of people have said to me, all right, she's a smart woman, she's a canny woman. She's been around. How could she have been so surprised and so shocked when her husband came to her that August morning in 1998?

All the indications were there, the handwriting was on the wall. You may be sick of the question, but there's still women out there looking at you and saying, Hillary Clinton, here she is, one of the smartest people around, how could she have not known?

CLINTON: Well, in the book I explain that by January of 1998 I had been accused of so many things that were totally untrue, and I had seen headlines about myself, I heard news reports about me that I, frankly, had stopped believing a lot of what I read because I knew that there was no basis and fact.

So when these stories started coming out and my husband said that they weren't true, I really did believe him because my view was that after what we had gone through and so many of these stories, I wasn't going to take the word or the charge of somebody else. And, you know, it was a terrible disappointment and a very personally wrenching time to be told by him. But until he told me, I was not prepared to believe it because I just thought it was part of the ongoing effort that I had personally been subjected to and that I found so distasteful, that I just really put it out of my mind.

WOODRUFF: A lesson there for other women?

CLINTON: I think the lesson here is that you have to do what is right for you. And that is my overriding message in this book. You know, I've had friends who have faced tough times in life, in marriage, in their jobs. They've made choices that I thought were responsible, but weren't the ones I would have made, and I'm sure vice versa.

But what I've fought for and really tried to stand for is that women now are full human beings with all that that means, to take responsibility for ourselves. So I made a decision that I thought was right for me and my family, and I will support other women doing the same.

WOODRUFF: Do you ever get mad at your husband that you have to answer these questions at all?

CLINTON: Well, you know, as I write in the book, I do consider these to be personal, private matters. I wish they had never been forced into the public, but unfortunately they were for partisan political purposes, as we know.

It should never have happened. It's regrettable that it did, that it put my family, our country through this. But since it was made public, then I had to address it. I couldn't very well write a book about those eight years and not talk about my reaction and experience.

WOODRUFF: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton on her book, "Living History."

"Crossfire," CNN, 7/9/2003

BEGALA: Oh, my God! Ladies and gentlemen, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton! Welcome.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well...

BEGALA: You brought some accoutrements there. Mrs. Clinton, thank you.

CLINTON: Well...

BEGALA: I'll be -- I'll be...

CLINTON: You know, I really -- I really want you to notice, Tucker, that this is a wingtip. It's a right-wing wingtip, and...

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: ... and I was a little worried about, you know, how you were actually going to be able to eat and digest a shoe. I didn't even know what kind you were going to choose, but...

CARLSON: Thank you.

CLINTON: So I had a friend of mine, Colette (ph), who's here somewhere from New York, do this for you because I figured you've had enough embarrassment and humiliation over this episode.

CARLSON: Yes, I have. Thank you.

CLINTON: That the least I could do was to, you know, give you something a little...

CARLSON: Well, you are awfully gracious. I appreciate that, Senator.

CLINTON: Thank you so much.

BEGALA: Now would you like to do the honors here, Senator?

CLINTON: Well, I -- really -- don't you think it's Tucker's...

BEGALA: Tucker, which piece of the shoe are you going to start with?

CARLSON: Well, obviously, the heel.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: Here you go.

(CROSSTALK)

CARLSON: ... join me in...

CLINTON: Now, though I have nothing to do to help with the tie you also promised to...

CARLSON: Yes, ma'am. I...

CLINTON: I'll wait and watch how you handle that.

CARLSON: Thank you. I -- I'm going to get a marzipan tie, and I think they make them.

CLINTON: Here you go.

CARLSON: And congratulations on your book selling a million copies.

CLINTON: Thank you so much.

(LAUGHTER)

CARLSON: I have to say I -- I didn't predict it.

CLINTON: Well, there's a lot that you've been wrong about.

BEGALA: Now were you surprised at the velocity, though? It's just a month.

CLINTON: It is just a month, right.

BEGALA: I had faith you'd sell it. I was surprised that you did hit a million in one month.

CLINTON: I was, too. I was, too. But it -- you know, it's been very exciting, and I've now probably signed probably 15,000 of them for people who've come through to see me in various places, and it's really been wonderful to hear what people have to say, and it's so positive.

(LAUGHTER)

(CROSSTALK)

CARLSON: ... who, in fact, voted for you, is a big Hillary Clinton fan, said there's no way she'll sell a million copies, and I thought if my left-wing friend thinks that, you know, I believe him.

CLINTON: That's why I...

CARLSON: ... That's why I believe one of them.

CLINTON: That's why I'm a centrist.

(LAUGHTER)

BEGALA: Now you inscribed -- this is the one-millionth book. The bad news, Tucker, is Bob Novak bought the one-millionth book. He wanted you to...

(CROSSTALK)

CLINTON: No. Actually, I said that, you know, here..

CARLSON: Well, that is so very nice.

CLINTON: Tucker, you're number one million in my book.

(LAUGHTER)

CARLSON: Thank you.

(CROSSTALK)

CARLSON: Thank you very much.

CLINTON: Thank you. Thanks, Paul.

BEGALA: Thank you, Hillary.

CLINTON: Thank you all very much.

(CHEERING)

BEGALA: Well, Tucker, our (UNINTELLIGIBLE). What do you think?

CARLSON: Well I would say that's remarkable, Paul.

BEGALA: You were surprised, really?

CARLSON: I was actually shocked. In fact my first thought was that woman looks a lot like Hillary Rodham Clinton.

(LAUGHTER)

BEGALA: Hillary and James Carville and I cooked this up actually weeks ago. And I'm thrilled that the staff hear at CROSSFIRE kept it a secret. It shows that liberals can be trusted with nation security secrets.

(LAUGHTER)

CARLSON: I'm actually shocked. I have to say. I'm glad to know I am one million in her book. That is fantastic.

BEGALA: Thanks again for Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON MILITARY NOMINATIONS, 7/24/2003

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I apologize I couldn't get here earlier. We had another hearing on biodefense in another committee.

But I want to thank General Myers and General Pace for your service. And you came on board at a very difficult time in our country's history. And I am personally, and I am sure on behalf of my constituents, very grateful.

And I also want to commend you on behalf of the performance in both Afghanistan and in Iraq. And particularly the planning of the mission in Iraq that did limit and minimize the kind of collateral and civilian damage that might have otherwise occurred. And I think that's a great tribute to you and to the men and women you are responsible for commanding.

I want to focus for just a minute on Afghanistan. Obviously, our immediate concern, because of the headlines, is the continuing dangerous environment in Iraq and the challenges of rebuilding and reconstructing that devastated nation.

However, as we all know, we do have thousands of U.S. troops in Afghanistan, including from the 10th Mountain Division from Fort Drum, New York.

CLINTON: And the assessments I receive are quite mixed. I'm told that the only secure place in the country, depending upon the time of day, is all or part of Kabul.

And that we have made alliances with a number of warlords out of necessity in order to have some effort ongoing to pacify and bring order to certain parts of the country, but that there has been a resurgence of Taliban/Al Qaida activity that is troublesome.

So I would like to ask each of you or both, however you chose to respond, what is your assessment of the security situation in Afghanistan? Do we have enough troops either American and international to provide significant control? How important are these reports that the Taliban is regrouping? And finally, if you know at this time, what role will the 10th Mountain Division troops continue to play in Afghanistan?

MYERS: Would be happy to, Senator Clinton. There is -- often it's alleged we don't pay much attention to Afghanistan, but in fact there's been a lot happening in terms of Afghanistan in trying to continue to make that country more secure.

You're right, we have about 10,000 U.S. forces over there as part of the Interim Security Assistance Force in Kabul, which is now a German-Dutch mission, will turn this September-October into a NATO mission. There are over 5,000 international forces supporting that.

And then on top of that, we have somewhere between 2,000 and 3,000 coalition forces supporting, in this case now, 10th Mountain Division over there. So we have substantial forces. The security situation in the country, if you map out where most of the incidents are happening, it's in the area along the Afghan-Pakistan border starting about where Kabul is, the Khyber Pass and down south all the way to a major incident we had, down to the Spin Boldak area, which is the border south of the ungoverned areas in Pakistan in the more normal traveled areas there between Afghanistan and Pakistan in the south, south east.

That's where the hold-outs are. If the Taliban is going to get traction, that's where it's going to be. We know they go back and forth across the border fairly freely, and that is a problem for us. We have gotten good cooperation from Pakistan in that regard. And that's where the focus of the great folks out of Fort Drum, they're going to focus on that area. That's where the Italians are focused. We have an Alpini (ph) brigade in there that's a 1,000 person strong that are focused in that area, the Gardez, the Khost, area, which is the area I'm trying to describe.

Do we have enough troops? I think we do have enough troops for the situation right now. What we've tried to do is create these provincial reconstruction teams that are not large, but that bring sort of all the instruments of national power from security, to aid, to construction to the various communities. And we hope to in the next couple of months to have one of those in each of the provinces in the major cities. Some are led by the U.S. One is led by the U.K. Other countries are looking at leading them as well.

These are important ways to continue to show the improvement of the security situation in bringing hope and real things like wells that provide clean water, like schools where folks can go to school, medical faculties and so forth.

That's the idea of these reconstruction teams. On top of that, we have trained I think now the number is up over 4,000- 4,500 -- Pete, correct me if I'm wrong -- about 4,500 Afghan national army folks, several companies of whom are out with our forces right now.

So we're trying to put an Afghan face on the security picture that the average Afghan sees. By the way, these forces are being received by the Afghan people, very well, as a matter of fact.

So there's a lot more, clearly a lot more to be done.

I would have told you, had it not been for the report I read today, that since June we've had a decrease in security incidents, and we actually expected the opposite to happen. Here in the last week, they've started to increase again, but it does ebb and flow. We had a successful operation, killing 25 Taliban down in the Spin Boldak area. And we will continue to work that.

As you know, there is also suspicion that some of the high-value targets that we're after are in that same area. And we will continue to have to go after them.

So I -- it's uneven through the country. I would say three-quarters of the country is pretty much secure. There is that part on the Afghan-Pakistan border that is not so secure that we have to deal with.

CLINTON: General, I know my time has expired, but another element of this that I would...

WARNER: Senator, this is your first round, and I think Senator Reed and I would indulge you to have a question or two in addition.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, there is another element to this that I am concerned about. And perhaps we could get a written report or maybe this is more appropriate for a classified briefing.

But I am also hearing reports about increasing presence of Iranian interests in Afghanistan and that not only with respect to political, diplomatic, quasi-military presence but also doing work in the country, reconstructing roads, building schools, really planting a flag, at least in western Afghanistan. And I find that concerning. And so it would be very helpful for me to be given some additional information about what we know with respect to Iranian actions and intentions concerning Afghanistan.

And then the related issue with respect to Pakistan. I agree with you that for many of us, we've gotten much more cooperation than we ever thought possible. But I am still concerned about the cross-border movements and also the level of instability within Pakistan and ongoing efforts to destabilize the Musharraf regime.

So, again, any update you can give us on that just to keep us informed so that we have a better idea of what the real threat and risk ratio is, I would appreciate that.

And finally, with thanks to the chairman. I am also still, along with so many of my colleagues, perplexed, which is the word that General Abizaid used before us, concerning weapons of mass destruction. And I would be remiss if I didn't ask both of you, given your cumulative experience, your expertise, as to what is the most reasonable explanation.

I know that the chairman and I talked on several occasions about our concerns regarding what would happen to our troops when they crossed the Tiger (ph) or the Euphrates and the likelihood of the use of chemical weapons and the necessity of making sure they had the proper equipment and were as ready as possible.

It is just bewildering, I guess. And for those of us who have followed the intelligence reports consistently now going back a number of years, it just doesn't make sense.

So I would just appreciate your take on what happened. How do we answer this question to ourselves? There are obvious explanations. It never was as much as we thought it was in our intelligence, which is off by 90 degrees, it was there. It was destroyed. It is still concealed. Or worst of all options, it's been privatized, in all or part, which is what I fear most.

But I would appreciate your expert assessment, briefly, on that question.

MYERS (?): Senator Clinton, let me go back to Pakistan for just a minute. I think it's worthy of noting that of the senior Al Qaida leadership that we have captured, using "we" very broadly, most of them have been captured by the Pakistanis or with Pakistani help, not insignificant.

To WMD. Clearly, UNSCOM's U.N. inspection regime before the last one, the recent inspection regime, in their reports, the U.N. Security Council resolution, there was no doubt that Iraq not only had a program but had material, and they hadn't accounted for it. And it's my belief that we're going to find good evidence of a program. And it's also my belief that we're probably going to find material as well. It's quite possible.

We certainly went into combat on March 19th of this year thinking we were going to be subject to chemical, and perhaps biological, attack. And that's why our soldiers and our Marines and everybody on the ground there and the air crews were prepared for it. And they fought in there, as you know, fought in their protective gear.

It's not something you do voluntarily because it's a little bit cumbersome. And it's extremely hot. And while the temperatures were only in the 80s and 90s, only in the 80s and 90s, this was quite a burden on our forces. But the commanders made that decision based on our knowledge of the threat at the time.

So why haven't we found it? Well, first of all, it's been about 100 days since the end of the major combat operations. And I have always stated, and my belief is, that it's going to take some time. This is a regime that has practiced denial and deception. They are at the graduate level in denial and deception.

Witness the reports the other day about one of their nuclear scientists that was told to go bury some centrifuge parts under his rosebush.

MYERS: Now, if he hadn't have come forward and said they told me to bury these parts under this rosebush, it's unlikely we would have uncovered them.

I think the same thing is true -- they have compartmented this so well. And we know they took parts of their program, their documentation, perhaps the material, and they spread it out in a land the size of California. So it's going to take time. It's going to take us the same thing that got us the two sons. It's going to take Iraqis coming forward saying here it is or here's what I know.

We have a very large organization, the Iraqi Survey Group, led by General Dayton, with guidance from Dr. Kay and they are progressing down that road.

We're going to have to wait and see in the end. But my personal belief is we will still find the evidence.

I share your concern that the worst of all outcomes -- and the reason we went in there is that we did not want weapons of mass destruction to fall in terrorist hands. And we have got to be very alert to that. I think we have the intelligence apparatus and the forces and people working this so hard that we are going to try to keep that from happening. It's totally a danger.

WARNER: The line of questioning by the senator from New York with regard to Afghanistan is a very important part of this record. I think we should also have contained at this point in the record, initiated by the senator from New York, the latest reports on our continuing emphasis on trying to apprehend bin Laden and Sheik Omar, the two leaders.

Our conversation, that is you and I and with General Pace, I frequently bring this up in a private context. But I think you should emphasize today there has been no diminution in our effort to try and apprehend those two individuals who are in all probability are holed up in a piece of geography in this world unlike anything else in terms of its inaccessibility whether it's human people on feet or just electronics or the likewise.

MYERS: Chairman, that's right. And we continue, worldwide, to go after the leaders of the Al Qaida, any members of the Al Qaida we can find. But the leadership is of great interest to us and that has not -- those efforts have not stopped, clearly.

WARNER: Thank you.

Do you have something to add, General Pace?

PACE: I do not to that, sir, thank you.

WARNER: Senator Reed, thank you for your patience.

REED: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Clinton has mentioned the 10th Mountain Division, gives me an opportunity to say they are also great soldiers, led by a great commander, Buster Hagenbeck.

I'd like to return to the situation in North Korea, which the chairman opened up. To me it's the most grievous threat we face. As General Myers, as you pointed out, this is a regime that is -- has shown in the past their willingness to proliferate. They have declared publicly that they are reprocessing nuclear rods.

Ironically, we conducted a preemptive attack against a nation that had very little military capacity relative to North Korea and that was stoutly denying that they had weapons of mass destruction. And to date we haven't found any.

That as a prelude, the war plans for North Korea are classified, naturally. But the public sources I have seen, and they are dated and I'll admit that, suggest that we would need upwards of 200,000 or more troops to conduct the operation. And because they are dated, I would assume we probably could get that number down a bit given our situation awareness, precision weapons, communication superiority. But still, we're talking at least, my estimate would be 100,000 or more troops.

Given the deployments today, where are we going to get those troops without cutting back on our effort in Iraq or Afghanistan?

MYERS: Senator Reed, without going into the classified parts of the plan, one of our responsibilities to the secretary of defense is to ensure that as we use our forces around the world on the global war on terrorism, in the Balkans, wherever it is we are called upon to use them, that we continually assess our ability to fulfill the defense strategy and the capabilities that are outlined in the QDR and in our national military -- national strategy, national security strategy.

MYERS: Clearly, one of the major parts of that is our ability to defend the peninsula, as we talked about earlier. And so as we developed the rotation plan, we looked very carefully at our ability to respond to a situation on the peninsula, a North Korean attack, which would be a worst-case sort of situation. And we have designed into the Army's rotation plan the kinds of units and the particular timing to make sure that we maintain the capability to fulfill the war plans as they are being written as we speak right now by General LaPorte over in Korea.

REED: Mr. Chairman, because of the nature of this problem, I think it would be very useful if in a classified setting we had a brief on the plan and a laydown of the numbers. Because I think our responsibility is to ensure that -- you know, we can't conduct the battle, but we sure as heck have to make sure you have the forces -- and not just the forces, but the critical items, the airlift, the high-value items that are always...

MYERS: Sure, all the enablers that you need.

REED: Right.

MYERS: You bet. And that's something we look at. We are going to -- we assess this. It started out periodically because, you know, we are in a global war. And we think it's part of the Joint Chiefs of Staff responsibility to look at our force laydown; can we do what we said we're going to do in our national defense strategy and our defense strategy? And then where is we have risk? And what risk are we willing to accept? And how do we mitigate it?

REED: And I think it comes down, as you point out, General, to what risks are you running. And that's a judgment, I think, that you have to make, but I think it's something we should be aware of. And I believe only in the context of the detailed laydown of the numbers.

MYERS: We'd certainly have to do that in a classified setting.

REED: Indeed, indeed, indeed.

PACE: Senator, to help just a little bit on that. As you know, we've got about 220,000 U.S. in the Gulf region right now out of a force of about 1.4 million. As the chairman has pointed out, we war- game ourselves constantly on forces available versus potential employment.

Of interest also, you mentioned some of the high-value things that we have but of which we have limited numbers. Because the war in Iraq, the major battle, is completed, a lot of those reconnaissance- type assets that we use to find major formations have been able to return to the United States and are undergoing reconstitution. So in some ways we have a better position today because of the results of the war in Iraq.

REED: I think all of those factors would be useful to get a more detailed evaluation.

PACE: Yes, sir.

REED: Let me -- final question.

WARNER: Senator, I will consult with Senator Levin, but I think we will ask the department, particularly the JCS, to give us the usual briefing with regard to advising Congress, just short of the war plans, which is an area which Congress and the executive branch has traditionally recognized that that is a situation that's shared in a limited way.

REED: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate that.

Just a final question. Prior to the initiation of hostilities in Iraq, Secretary Rumsfeld indicated that he had bullet-proof evidence that there were Al Qaida elements within Iraq. I think most commentators recognize that there were certain elements in the Kurdish area that might have had allegiances through Iran to Iraq. But the implication, obviously, of the secretary's comments was that within Baghdad, within the control of the Saddam Hussein regime there were Al Qaida elements. Have you found any of those elements?

MYERS: The elements that we know have a direct connection to Al Qaida are the Ansar al-Islam elements that I think you were referring to because they were up there in northeastern Iraq before the Iraqi conflict began. They were in the process of developing poisons for sure, we found evidence of that.

REED: But General, that was an area that was controlled by the Kurds who are nominally our allies.

MYERS: No, that area was not controlled by the Kurds. It was controlled by Ansar al-Islam and other people in that area that favored them. The Kurdish forces had tried to take that area over several times and were repulsed and lost lots of forces.

REED: I stand corrected. Was it controlled by Saddam Hussein's forces?

MYERS: That is a question that I haven't seen answered satisfactorily. We do know, and I am worried about the classification of this, but maybe it's not as important if there is no more Iraqi regime. We do know that Iraqi intelligence service had people involved back and forth. And we do know that.

And we also know today that Ansar al-Islam is active inside Iraq. We know that and we know that they have perhaps several hundred people. We rounded up seven of them in Baghdad the other day. It's one of the things -- when you talk about security situation, you have to kind of treat them a little differently than you do the remnants of the Iraqi regime because they are likely to fight a little more sophisticated way and a little more aggressively.

REED: To your knowledge, were they in Baghdad prior to our military operations?

MYERS: I don't know.

REED: Thank you.

MYERS: What we do know prior to military operations was that the leader, one of the leaders of Ansar al-Islam was in Baghdad for medical treatment and had gone there from time to time.

MYERS: We know that.

REED: Thank the gentleman.

WARNER: Colleagues, it is the intention of the chair to wrap this up. But I'm going to remain to do so. Does the senator from New York wish to ask an additional question before I do the wrap up?

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, if I could add one more concern to the questioning about Afghanistan.

WARNER: Yes, of course.

CLINTON: A July 9th front page article in the Washington Post reported that poppy cultivation levels in Afghanistan appear to be back at 1999 levels, the highest level ever reached before the Taliban banned the poppy cultivation.

And in this article, it pointed to the lack of a rule of law, and even that the wheat donations by the international community could perversely be fueling this recent upsurge. And today's Christian Science Monitor reports that the resurgence of the poppy plants could unravel the relationships between warlords and the U.S. military.

And I know that in your written answers to our pre-hearing policy questions, you assert that despite some progress, we have a ways to go in Afghanistan. And so I think we also need some additional information about how the U.S. military and related assets could be undertaking a counter-drug and stability mission to, you know, not just address the threat posed by the increased poppy cultivation, but all the lawlessness that will flow from it.

You know, once again, we'll be back into a situation where we have warlords, we have smugglers, we have all kinds of challenges in trying to bring back law and order. And we know how difficult that is. We've not won the drug war in the United States.

You know, we've done a lot to try to help Colombia. We have a long way to go there. And is there some way that we can, so to speak, nip this in the bud before it gets full blown and we face additional security challenge on top of everything else we're confronting?

MYERS: Senator Clinton, you're quite right. This is a problem inside of Afghanistan. It's been a problem that's been addressed primarily by Britain. They've been the ones that have had the lead on this. It's a complex problem. There is an economic dimension to it. There is the warlord dimension to it.

Certainly, we know where most of those products go, and they go up into Europe. And that's of great concern.

So it's one that has to be dealt with by the international community. And we are addressing it on several fronts, but the U.S. military at this point has not been one of the primary tools to use on this particular issue. It's been the Brits.

Do you want to add anything?

WARNER: Thank you very much...

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WARNER: ... Senator Clinton.

Gentleman, I'll conclude with a couple of questions here. The conference between the House and the Senate has before it a variety of proposals concerning modifying the end strengths of the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marines.

Has anything developed in the course of events here of recent, which modifies the positions that each of you have taken in previous testimony and the testimony of the secretary of defense on those issues that should be taken into consideration by the conference at this time before, hopefully, the conference report can be put together and acted upon by both houses in the course of the coming weeks?

MYERS: I'll start, and then I'll turn it over to General Pace. I think the secretary said he is not, you know, necessarily against end strength. I can't put words in his mouth, but not necessarily against end strength increases. But I think we all share the concern that...

WARNER: You know, we have always as a long tradition of this committee, when each of you were confirmed, asked for your personal views. And I fully respect your allegiance to the secretary as a civilian control of our military. But I think your personal views would be a great advantage...

MYERS: And I'm going to give you those. And I share that we should not -- we shouldn't be opposed to the issue of end strength increase. We've got to look at this very carefully. We talked about it earlier. One of the things we've got to do is make sure if we have somebody in uniform, they're doing what somebody in uniform should be doing, in that we don't have people in uniform doing what others could do, civilians and so forth.

And you see all sorts of numbers. But there are several tens of thousands that could be -- the jobs they're doing could be done. And we're looking at that as a matter of fact in lots of the support areas.

That's one thing that has to happen. The next thing, when we talk about end strength, we need to rebalance our active duty and our reserve component mix.

MYERS: And part of the force is particularly in high tempo, high personal tempo, high operations tempo because we don't have that mix right. So that rebalancing is a piece of it.

We also need to look at it -- when we talk about end strength increases, and our commitments -- we need to look at our commitments, the other part of that equation. And are we in places where we have a vital national security interest? And given that we're in a war on terrorism, should we reduce our commitments in other places?

As you know, there's been an effort by the department to end our commitment in the Sinai. We've been partially successful there. On and on it goes. It's very difficult to get out of. We've been in the Balkans now -- somebody walked up today and said, "You know, we've been in the Balkans eight years."

Well, I had not -- I just hadn't thought about it in that way. But since '95, we've been in the Balkans in varied numbers. And generally, they've been decreasing. But we've had very significant forces in the Balkans. And the question is, of all of those commitments, which ones could we stop doing, get others to do to help our, the end strength -- inform (ph) the end strength equation?

The other thing I would say, we talked about it at length, and that's the internationalization of the -- of our efforts. And we're doing that. And then in places like Afghanistan, and in Iraq, as time goes on, we're going to bring on more Afghan national army, Afghan police, Afghan border patrol. In Iraq, we've talked about the Iraqis we're trying to bring on board, which I think all of that informs us about where we are.

And then one thing that goes through my mind is that the most expensive thing we can do is bring on a person on active duty in end strength. It's 60 percent of the personnel account. And the medical and all of that, it's 60 percent of our budget. It's a very expensive thing to do. It takes time. There is lag time to get them on board. And then of course, there's the legacy of the budget impact in the out years with this larger force.

So I think we need to look at those others things I just mentioned before we come to the conclusion that an end strength increase is needed. That's my personal belief.

WARNER: General Pace, do you have views here?

PACE: I would add, if I may, Senator, that in addition to the scrubbing of the 300,000 billets, give or take, that we think are being performed by military that might be done by others, in addition to the active reserve component that General Myers has mentioned, we also need to complete the process that we're going through right now of our scrub, of our war plans. And we've just shown ourselves convincingly that the war plan that was on the shelf for Iraq and the war plan that was executed -- the war plan that was executed used about 60 percent of the force that we had thought we needed for the war plan that had been on the shelf.

We're going through the same kinds of analysis right now for Korea and elsewhere in the world. And as we do that as we absorb the lessons that we've learned on our precision use of weapons and the speed with which we employed our forces, we are finding that we can in fact have overwhelming combat power with fewer numbers of individual soldiers and Marines on the ground.

So I believe we have more work to do there before we can come forward and say we need more troops, sir.

WARNER: A vote has been called, and I must depart. But I'm going to ask several questions for the record. And then one last one here and I'll remain. But the phrase, the United States is stretched very thinly in terms of its armed forces, that's causing really concern in the areas of family, on the rotation issues, on the ability to recruit adequately for active Reserve and Guard.

I would like to have you address those issues in a written response at your earliest convenience.

Secondly, this committee has had, I think, a remarkable record in supporting the use of unmanned vehicles. We have gone through another very important chapter of utilization of such vehicles here in both Afghanistan and Iraq.

Again, your views on the momentum with which those programs should be moving forward and the support that is being offered by the Congress and I think could increase if such a request were made.

Also, the concept of using our forces jointly. It's been a magnificent chapter in both the Afghanistan and the Iraqi campaigns. Where we are in the desired goals for achieving jointness, are we there? More needed to be done? And how the Congress can facilitate that.

Lastly, as we sit here going through the whole world and so forth, the publicity being given to this, I think, extraordinarily successful operation of the location and then the securing of the sons of Saddam Hussein.

WARNER: The critics are -- I don't mean to do that in a pejorative sense -- but the people are asking, "Could not this operation have been conducted in such a manner as to give every opportunity to acquire them alive," hoping that we would receive a good deal of information.

Now drawing on my own limited experience, and as I look at the facts that are before us and General Myers, you and I discussed this in some detail last night, it seems to me the on-scene commanders acted with prudence and professionalism. They made a very conscientious effort to take them alive. That brought harm to their own forces, where we experienced four being wounded. They repeated the attempt and then came under fire again. And then it was after that utilization of such ordinance that resulted in the death of all but I think one inside. And that person, I think, had an opportunity, the young son to survive. But he, as I understand it, exercised force by shooting at our forces.

Now I'm going to ask General Pace to lead off in the response because you spent so much of your professional career with ground force elements. And what is your professional judgment based on the facts as you know them today of how this operation was conducted? And what response should be given to those who raise legitimately the questions: Could it have been done in another way?

And touch on the fact, I think some of us were surprised to learn that there was a little bit of a fortification within this house of the living spaces. I mean, clearly, long before this operation was undertaken, someone made the decision to fortify part of this house and we're now learning that other of the houses in Iraq were similarly fortified, giving rise to the assumption that Saddam Hussein anticipated events like this could unfold. And that those trying to hide themselves from the coalition forces could perhaps survive better in some modification to the house that would enable a fortified structure.

Also, having watched the search for Noriega, I remember Senator Nunn then chairman -- I was ranking member -- we went to Panama and watched the Army as they pursued that. And he had safe houses where he knew about them and other facilities where he evaded us for some period of time.

How do we know that as part of the fortification, they didn't do an underground tunnel to exit some distance away from this house and then be able to escape? So this will be debated.

But right now, it's a hot debate out there. I think it's important that this hearing have your views, General Pace, and those of General Myers, on this question.

PACE: Mr. Chairman, not surprisingly, you've touched on each of the most important parts of that operation. Everything I've read...

WARNER: It came from some of the training that you've had, although far modest my career, in comparison to yours.

PACE: Sir, everything I've read and everything I've been told, tells me that the commanders on the ground acted exactly correctly in this situation. They did in fact, as you pointed out, offer the opportunity for those inside the building to surrender. They thought they had the opportunity to capture or kill Saddam's two sons, but until the operation was complete and until confirmation, they did not know 100 percent what they had.

They did offer the opportunity to surrender. As you pointed out, they made more than one attempt to enter the building and to offer the opportunity to surrender.

PACE: Some of our soldiers were wounded in those operations. Clearly, with the amount of fire coming back at them from inside the building, force was appropriate and should have been used and was used. As you pointed out, there is no way of knowing whether or not there might have been tunnels or other routes of escape.

The question that I would to anyone who might ask, why it is that we killed them is -- what questions would you be asking if they somehow managed to escape? I think that given the battle as it unfolded over three-plus hours of combat, the strength that was shown initially to afford them the opportunity to surrender, and then the power that was used appropriately to protect our own sons and daughters who are going into combat was exactly what those commanders should have done.

WARNER: When you briefed me last night, General Myers, you showed me how that house was collocated with other private dwellings around it, so we had the concern of other occupants in their respective houses.

MYERS: Absolutely right.

WARNER: The second part of that question -- we've been handed the wire stories and other information that these pictures have now are in the public domain worldwide, and last night when I was on a national television show, I was asked the question about whether or not these pictures should be released. I didn't presume that I would be able to make that decision last night, but I did say it would be my hope and expectation when the decision to release them or not release them was made, it would be done with the careful analysis of how best such a decision would protect our forces -- the coalition forces -- against further deaths and wounding that we're experiencing every day and I hope that was predicated in that decision.

General, can you quickly answer it. They're holding the vote for me so...

MYERS: Well, sir, it was and I think as we discussed last night in your office, the issue of how and when to release those pictures was one that was carefully considered by Ambassador Bremer, by General Sanchez, you know Abizaid, and the folks on the ground in Iraq. And they used their best judgments and the recommendations they got from the people that counseled them on how to do that. And clearly, I think we've done it in a dignified way where we don't denigrate the bodies and we don't allow any other atrocities to happen to those particular bodies and I think it was done appropriately.

WARNER: Well, it sends a strong message to those still in hiding -- be it Saddam Hussein and others, that hey, morale is good among our forces...

MYERS: It is very good.

WARNER: We are able to conduct the toughest of operations and if you wish to have the fate that the others experience -- the two sons -- stand by.

MYERS: Absolutely right, sir.

WARNER: We've concluded this hearing. And before I hit the gavel, I would note that, in just but a few years, this room will be 100 years old and many, many hearings have been held in it. But this has been among the more important -- if I might say -- because we're looking at a future of our nation, and indeed, the free world which is marked by uncertainties of a magnitude really never experienced before in contemporary history.

And we're fortunate to have men and women like yourselves wearing the uniform of our country, working with your counterparts in uniform in other countries taking the risk to themselves and their families to ensure that freedom -- as we love it here in the United States -- can be protected. Not only here at home, but to the extent we can in conjunction with our allies be provided beyond our shores.

Thank you, gentlemen.

MYERS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

U.S. SENATOR JUDD GREGG (R-NH) HOLDS HEARING ON BIODE-FENSE READINESS, 7/24/2003

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you for holding this hearing. I can't imagine any more important subject, and I want to join with my colleagues in thanking and congratulating our four witnesses for their service to our country. I am deeply impressed and very grateful.

Let me start with asking that my full opening statement, if it could, be submitted to the record, Mr. Chairman.

Dr. McClellan, let me first thank you. Last night was a red- letter day for American children and clinicians, physicians, nurses, and others. We finally passed, by unanimous consent, the Pediatric Research Equity Act of 2003, which will add another tool in the toolkit that Senator Murray was discussing about how we best prepare our children and how we get adequate information about the safety and efficacy of drugs that are prescribed for children.

And I want to thank the chairman and the ranking member and certainly my colleagues, Senators DeWine and Dodd, for their perseverance. I particularly want to thank you, personally, and your staff for your technical input and your personal involvement.

I'm hoping that we can count on your help in the House. Obviously, now that we've passed it in the Senate, we need to get it through the House, get it to the president to be signed. So I would ask that you do everything possible to help the House, as you did with us, in moving this important legislation forward.

And may I also assume you are supporting undisputed authority for the FDA to enforce pediatric studies in supporting the Senate in the position that we've taken?

MCCELLAN: That's right. We are strong supporters of the bill that you and your colleagues here worked to pass. We deeply appreciate your efforts to get that done.

We need the pediatric rule back in place for all of the reasons that you mentioned, and we will -- Secretary Thompson and I have issued a statement today urging rapid action to get the bill to the president's desk, and I hope that will happen quickly. We will work just as closely with the House as we worked with you to get this done.

CLINTON: Thank you so much. And I'd be remiss if I didn't thank Dr. Bouchi (ph) for starting down this road with me and others so many years ago. I am very grateful that we are nearly at the destination point.

I have a few more questions that I would like, Dr. McClellan, to submit for the record to receive responses on.

Let me also turn to an issue that Dr. Gerberding talked at great length about in her written testimony, and I think it's one of the critical issues. The chairman referred to it in his remarks, and he, of course, is in a very strong position to offer the leadership needed in his joint position here and on the Appropriations Committee, because the recent Partnership for Public Service report entitled Homeland Insecurity: Building the Expertise to Defend America from Bioterrorism, as you point out, had some startling figures about the impending loss of medical and biological experts who are on the road to retirement in the next five to 10 years.

Do you think, Doctor, that the Epidemic Intelligence Service and other federal training programs will be able to provide enough personnel to fill this potential workforce shortage? And, if not, or if in doubt, what are some of the activities we should be pursuing right now to get in a position to avoid this collision course I see us heading toward?

GERBERDING: I'll try to give a short answer, and I think it's a long answer that would be most informative. I don't think that the current system is adequate to sustain the public health workforce, particularly the workforce that we're going to need in five years, because the skill set is changing.

We need informaticians. We need molecular biologists. We need public health experts in genomics. And so there's a whole new generation of skills that we need for terrorism or for other issues.

There are some short-term steps that we can take, and just like I think you've heard from all of my partners here in HHS, we are developing a strategic framework for workforce development throughout the entire public health system, which includes going way back to junior highs and high schools, where we're engaging kids in the concept that public health is a great profession. We had Olympiad winners this year in epidemiology in the science contest in the field of epidemiology.

So we're starting way back at the beginning and trying to interest people in this career pathway, working with colleges and universities to support summer internships and training for students to make this field exciting, working with minority health organizations to get those students involved and to deal with some of our disparity and diversity issues, working with the schools of medicine, schools of public health, and other professional academic organizations to develop bona fide curricula and training.

And a very immediate step that we will be taking at CDC is to implement training grants in public health so that post doctoral students who are interested in careers in public health have an opportunity for a research experience in the same way that they would if they were interested in infectious diseases or other fields of endeavor. So we will be creating some training grants in this field. These are all going to take a long time to come to fruition, but if we don't start strategically and with the long view in mind, in five years, we will be in a crisis state.

At the other end of the pipeline, of course, we want the kinds of flexibilities that Senator Gregg was making reference to so that we can give retention bonuses and we can compete salaries in the critical job classifications that right now government is not very competitive in. So I think if we work together on this, the problems are going to be similar across our agencies, and we'll probably be able to come up with a framework that makes some sense. I'm sure we'll have Secretary Thompson's support in that, but it's nice to know that you're interested.

CLINTON: And I think the concern extends down to state and local public health departments as well as the federal workforce. The Council for State and Territorial Epidemiologists tells us they'll need to train an additional 1,600 epidemiologists over the next 10 years just to prevent a worsening shortage of professionals working at state and local levels.

You know, I'm so concerned, because, historically, as I read the data, professionals who are trained by the Epidemic Intelligence Service that you are referring to and the other programs in conjunction with academic institutions and the like usually choose to work in the federal and academic public health positions, and we desperately need them there. So this is not an either-or kind of question.

The Center for Public Health Preparedness located at the schools of public health have historically trained the academic and federal public health experts, so we also have to be thinking about a pipeline for the state and local public health professionals. And I think that's a double challenge we face, Mr. Chairman, because, not only in the area of bio-defense but in the increasing awareness of environmental impact on health, we are not having enough personnel at the state and local level to follow up on legitimate questions that are raised -- that maybe if we can begin to acquire enough information we can make sense of cancer clusters or increasing spikes in other diseases.

So I think that we've got to think on both levels, both what, as the doctor clearly states in her oral and written testimony, we can do at the federal level, but then I think we're going to have to provide some boosts at the state and local level. And I would appreciate thoughts that any of our experts have on this, because you work with the state and local level, and in another arena, our continuing efforts globally and what we need to do to maximize our reach globally. I want to commend all of you for the contributions that the American medical establishment made in the SARS epidemic.

But any thoughts you've got that we should take and consider -- with respect to the WHO, we've got, for example, this bizarre problem that Taiwan is not in the WHO. So we've got political obstacles to figuring out what's going on with an epidemic in Taiwan. You know, these things are just hard to understand in the global village that we all inhabit.

So any thoughts you have may not be directly in our jurisdiction, but if you need additional personnel, laboratories overseas, other kinds of protocols that we have anything to do with, we need to hear that from you, because this is an increasing concern of mine. And, you know, there are some of my colleagues who don't believe in things like global climate change, but it does seem to me that some of these diseases are creeping northward that we never had at the latitudes we're now finding them.

And, certainly, even apart from that, all kinds of critters get on airplanes and ships and end up on our shores. So I think we've got to think more globally as well as locally, so there are many, many levels to this.

Finally, Dr. Gerberding, the Public Health Security and Bioterrorism Preparedness and Response Act of 2002 authorizes the distribution of public health emergency preparedness funds based on threat. However, in FY03, New York City was 45th in public health emergency preparedness funding at $2.59 per capita.

I think history has proven that our cities are the principal targets for any kind of attack. That's where -- you know, sarin was used in Tokyo, anthrax here in Washington. Can you tell us how you're planning to ensure that the funds are in the future distributed as we intended them to be on the basis of threat?

GERBERDING: Thank you. Yesterday, I had a chance to talk with the commissioner of health in New York City, and he brought this same issue to my attention. I don't think anyone would argue that New York City is a target, and we recognize that.

The dilemma is that we didn't think of Boca Raton as being a target before the first case of ventilation anthrax was identified there. So it is a real challenge to make a hierarchal arrangement of our cities, and really, ultimately, we have to concentrate on having no weak links in the system.

So I promised the commissioner that I would talk about this with Secretary Thompson and bring to his attention that there are inabilities to provide resources for all of the priorities in some of our major metropolitan areas. As you know, we do have special funding for four cities, because we recognize that they are higher in population and also higher in threat. So we'll look at the resource allocation and identify how we can get the balance right if it's out of balance right now.

CLINTON: I would appreciate being kept informed about that, and I thank you for your attention to this.

Finally, I think that perhaps the chairman and I could discuss further and get the expertise from all of you about whether there is anything we could do right now. I have prepared an amendment to Labor HHS about this public health workforce issue, because I hear it all over. It's not just a New York City problem. It's throughout New York State.

But then many people around the country are -- you know, they're panicked now because they don't think they have enough resources, and they look over the horizon, and they just see a terrible shortage developing. So perhaps we could discuss some matters about that.

And then, finally, Dr. Gerberding, I have one very local question, and I'll be happy to provide additional information concerning this. But I want to thank you for your assistance and the aid of your staff in setting up the health tracking system for everyone who labored at ground zero, our firefighters, our police officers, our construction workers.

This was such an important effort, and, obviously, it means the world to the individuals who are directly affected. But I think it's also significant to the data we are collecting about what the exposures might possibly be and the impacts that they will have when people are thrust in these unbelievable dangerous situations.

We may need your help in another pressing matter at this time. In Endicott, New York, in 1979, there was a release of approximately 4,100 gallons of industrial solvent at the former IBM facility in the village of Endicott. The spill contaminated local ground water, and associated vapors have recently been found in people's homes, although this is now 20 years plus after the spill itself.

The ground water contamination is being addressed through a number of pumps and treatment systems, and we're sampling local buildings, and we're trying to fix ventilation systems. It's a very complex environmental and public health challenge, but it's the kind of thing we're seeing more and more often across our country.

And I think CDC could provide meaningful assistance in helping the local authorities and even the state try to come to grips with these indoor air situations, you know, the problems that are associated with the contamination, and I would look forward to working with you. The county executive, Mr. Jeffrey Cram (ph), has expressed a particular concern about trying to set up some kind of an assessment system, perhaps through the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, so that we can, again, kind of track and learn from these kinds of massive contaminant events that apparently have long-term effects. It's not something that goes away in a year or two. So I will provide you additional information on that.

GERBERDING: Thank you. We do have the expertise to address those kinds of issues, so we'll definitely follow up.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

GREGG: Thank you, Senator.

I think you've sensed a real interest in this committee, at least, in doing something about your personnel issues. I understand there are bureaucratic issues that may limit your capacity to be aggressive in this area, but this committee would like to be aggressive in the area. So, hopefully, we'll get some counsel from you as to what we should be doing.

Again, we thank you very much for the extraordinary work you do on behalf of the American citizenry in all sorts of areas, obviously, not only protecting us from the threat of terrorism, but protecting the health of the nation, and we are very, very lucky to have talent of your level and capabilities involved in public service. So thank you again, and I appreciate you taking the time.

Adjourned.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON MILITARY NOMINATIONS, 7/29/2003

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am delighted to support these two nominees.

And I must say that it is quite encouraging for many of us of a certain age that General Schoomaker would come out of retirement to assume this position. And I'm very grateful and impressed by that, and I look forward to working with them.

And in addition to General Schoomaker's considerable military experience, I was also impressed by his political savvy when he came for his courtesy call to my office, bringing with him a young Army ROTC student from the University of Syracuse.

That was very well done, General.

SCHOOMAKER: I wish I could take credit for having thought of it.

CLINTON: Well, now that you're in charge, take credit for everything.

And I would echo Senator Roberts' very kind comments, because I know that in positions like this the family also serves, and particularly the spouses and even adult children. And so I thank your families for being willing to back you and support you in undertaking these important missions.

WARNER: Members of the committee, a number of you have spoken to me already about the time I digressed from the matter at hand, the announcement by the press and two colleagues in the Senate about the Pentagon office had proposed spying electronically on Americans to monitor potential terrorists as a new experiment. It was an online futures trading market. Our staff is looking into that and we will have a report for all members before day's end.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, I want personally to thank you for that.

I was going to bring that up during the question period. I was appalled, you know, that we would be in a sense setting up a futures market in death and destruction. And it is not in keeping with our values and certainly not in keeping with the highest ideals of the men who sit before us.

And I thank you for looking into this matter.

U.S. SENATOR BARBARA BOXER (D-CA) HOLDS NEWS CONFERENCE ON AIR MARSHALS, 7/30/2003

CLINTON: Well, I just am as bewildered as my colleagues in the attitude of this administration about our most important domestic priority, which is to defend and protect ourselves from terrorists.

I was listening to my colleague Senator Schumer talk about the metaphor of the five kids in the bed and the covers. I thought of that old song, you know, there were five in the bed. The little one said, Roll over. Roll over. And they all rolled over, and one fell out.

Well, that is kind of where we are. There is not enough money to do the job that needs to be done. And so, they say, OK, everybody. Roll over. We're going to take money from this category. We'll put it in that category, even though we know we need money in both categories.

There was another element in the story this morning that caught my eye, that I was equally disturbed by. And that was the revelation, which came as news to me, that on many of our intercontinental, international flights, we have a number of our major airports, including JFK, including LAX, including Miami, where people who start out in one part of the world can do a layover in one of our major airports without a visa, without necessarily being taken to a secure room. They can, therefore, know that if they are going, say, from Latin America through Miami, but their ticket says they're going to end up in Chicago, that they can make that stopover. Similarly with JFK, which is an international hub.

So today I have contacted the Department of Homeland Security as well as, in our case, the Port Authority in New York, demanding that something immediately be done. These people have got to be, in some way, identified.

Now I'm sure that that will affect thousands and thousands of legitimate travelers. But if there is one or two terrorists who know that they can get into a major airport and disappear while they are allegedly waiting for their connecting flight, that is too big a risk to take.

And so on every single issue that seems to come to light, it is troubling, as we on the Democratic side have been saying over and over again, that we're just not getting the kind of cooperation and attention and resources to the full range of homeland security needs that experts tell us we require, that our own evidence that we have had come before us in our various committees demonstrates we require, that any common sense citizen walking around sees for him or herself that we require.

But the administration insists on trying to convince us that although we are not funding homeland security at the levels that everyone knows we need, that somehow they can make do with what they are claiming is all that is required.

So I join my colleagues. And I thank Senator Boxer for jumping on this so quickly. I think it caught everyone's attention, because clearly to have this appear at the very same time that we were being given what was considered credible intelligence about new hijacking plots was just more than anybody should have to tolerate.

And on top of the episode yesterday with the futures market in- depth, what is going on with this administration?

CLINTON: I mean, honest to goodness, who are they talking to? Who are they listening to? What are their real priorities? And it just raises a lot of serious questions that not only are we in the Congress concerned about, but I think the American public increasingly is also very worried and concerned about as well.

BOXER: Any questions for us?

QUESTION: If they are robbing Peter to pay Paul, what can be done immediately, if anything, to get the funding they need to do this? There still will be, seems to me, even if they fix this by taking the money from one place back to another, there's going to be a shortcoming there. Is it a matter of giving them more authority to re-program it a certain way? I mean, what can be done to fix it?

SCHUMER: The answer is simple: We need more dollars. You can't do the job with the amount of dollars that's been given. And one of the proverbial children is not going to get covered.

The bottom line is that this is not just re-programming. This is not just saying, Oh, we need better administration. This administration has constantly fought every attempt to put the right amount of money for homeland security. And until we do, we're not going to be doing what we should to make us secure.

Barbara and I worked on we're trying to get money for Stinger missiles. That's another way our planes are vulnerable...

(CROSSTALK)

SCHUMER: ... you know, enough money for -- sorry -- for defenses against Stinger missiles.

(CROSSTALK)

SCHUMER: Excuse me.

(LAUGHTER)

We're not starting our own little organization.

(CROSSTALK)

SCHUMER: But we're trying to get money for defense so that planes can defend themselves against Stinger missiles. Talked to every expert. It's a real worry. They fight us tooth and nail, and then they do a study. And they stretch it out for five years, so that the first Stinger -- you know, the first plane won't be outfitted till 2006.

And you could have heard every amendment we did last week on the homeland security bill. They said it wasn't in the committee's budget. It's out for every single issue.

So this is a much more serious issue than just twisting a few dials. The administration has to step up to the plate and adequately fund homeland security, or they're going to have more embarrassments like the one they suffered today.

BOXER: I just want to add to the money piece of this. We have a war in Iraq and we have a war against terrorism here at home. Right? President says the war against terrorism is an ongoing war, we have a war in Iraq. There is never even a question, as Chuck has pointed out, about the funding for the war abroad -- never questioned: $45 billion a year now; that's more than we spend on all of our highways, that's more than we spend on any one item that you can think of that the American people care about, whether it's NIH finding cures for illnesses, whatever. OK? No problem.

We are trying to push, then, in our committee to have some burden-sharing here, to have some of our allies pick up some of the burden. Poland is coming in with a few troops; we're very grateful.

CLINTON: But we're paying for it.

BOXER: We're paying for it. That's the point .

So the bottom line is, we need burden-sharing. We need to get some relief over there. We need to bring the money home and defend our nation. And that's what kind of leadership is required right now.

That's the way all these things are tied. And you're so right, Senator Schumer, to point it out. This isn't about re-programming, sir. Because how do you re-program in an agency that so tightly funded right now that has as its job to protect the homeland? You know, period, that's the truth.

So you can't solve it by re-programming. What they are doing is taking money away from they tried to lower the number of Air Marshals. Stop the long-haul trips they were making, which is everyone of those planes was headed for my state, from their state, and one, I guess, was Boston. All the long-haul, heavy load, heavy fuel load planes. So they wanted to do that.

BOXER: Then we caught them, OK. So they back pedaled, but they're still not training the Marshals in Phase 2 training.

So that's the kind of reprogramming: taking away from Phase 2 training, stopping the training, the advanced training. This makes no sense at all.

So it's time the American people woke up to this. You can't protect the country on the cheap, period, end of quote.

You can't protect this country on the cheap. The American people deserve more. We know what we have to do. We tried.

Look at this, just this year, and this is just TSA.

And Chuck is the head of our Democratic homeland security team. He could go into chapter and verse on other amendments. This is just TSA, and the Republicans rejected this on party line vote.

So there is a disconnect here, and it's a dangerous disconnect, and it's one that we're calling attention to, and we will not stop calling attention to.

(CROSSTALK)

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) record high deficit. What's going to give?

BOXER: Well, if you listen to what I said -- I -- what did I say?

I said pay as you go. I said pay as you go, just as we did when President Clinton was president.

We were able to see by doing pay as you go, and we did wise budgeting, we had a surplus.

The bottom line is look over there in Iraq, look who's footing the bill, not to mention the absolute bloodshed that's falling on the shoulders of our people.

You want a way to do it, let's do what George Bush's father did. Eighty percent of that war was picked up by our allies. Get with it. You are shorting the priorities here at home, and that's how I would pay for it, in a heartbeat, and that's what I would hope the message would be today at least from this senator, that you can't just say anything we want to do abroad, all on our shoulders, no questions asked, who cares what the amount is.

And by the way, mark my words, $45 billion a year is going to look low by the time you see the ensuing months and what it's costing, and yet shorting these important areas of defense here at home.

(UNKNOWN): And, James, nobody is going to say, don't do homeland security because you'll increase the budget deficit.

There are a lot of other things that increase the budget deficit, most of all all the tax cuts.

But the bottom line is this is one thing that does -- you've always -- it's always been a rule that to protect the security of the people, whether it's fighting a war abroad or protecting us at home, that deficit spending is allowed.

So that's not -- I don't think any of us have criticized in that regard. We certainly think the deficit is out of control, but that's not because of spending on homeland security, that's for sure.

CLINTON: Well, and also, James, this is the first president in our entire history who has taken us to war at the same time he keeps cutting our financial resources. I mean, it's never happened before.

QUESTION: So repeal the tax cut?

CLINTON: No.

I mean, I think -- you know, we're looking for the money that we need for homeland security. There are many, many, many ways to get it, if the administration first recognized the importance of making it a priority.

You know, remember this is the administration that did not want a Department of Homeland Security, changed its mind only under tremendous pressure, has never really made the commitment to the kind of resources that we need.

I mean, I've been fighting this battle on direct funding, as you know, for now two-and-a-half years, to try to get the money where it's most needed. And whether it's TSA or ports or borders or direct funding for first responders, they've just never made it a priority. And that's beginning to demonstrate itself to the American people at large.

QUESTION: Senator Schumer, did Asa Hutchinson express any willingness to reconsider budget parameters for this year's spending or next?

SCHUMER: No, I mean, I have had lengthy discussions with Asa Hutchinson, Tom Ridge and others about getting more money for homeland security.

SCHUMER: And basically, I hate to tell you this, but I think, and this is my judgment, that the decisions are not made by the Homeland Security Department. They're made by OMB, and OMB doesn't really give a hoot about homeland security.

BOXER: I agree with that. From the people I've talked that's the impression you get, that they're very upset at this.

SCHUMER: I mean, I feel bad for Asa Hutchinson and Tom Ridge, people who I like very much, because they're given, they're not given the resources, and then they say go do the job, and they're good soldiers, they don't complain publicly.

But I hope they're arguing privately to OMB. And what'll happen today? Thank God Marshals aren't being removed. But maybe they'll reexamine their really, you know, penny-wise and pound-foolish approach to homeland security.

QUESTION: Senator Schumer, when he said it was a mistake, you said that Asa Hutchinson said it was a mistake. Did you take that to mean, or did you ask him, it was a mistake that they never intended to cut the Marshals, or that it was a mistake for them to try to cut the Marshals?

SCHUMER: To me, it's unclear what actually happened.

BOXER: Well, let me tell you what I was told by the deputy secretary, let me tell you what I was told. He said it never was going to happen.

QUESTION: Who said it?

BOXER: The deputy secretary. No, I talked to Steve McHale, deputy secretary of TSA, and he said, That was never going to happen. That's what he said, never going to happen.

And I said, well, then I'm reading between the lines. It must have been out there in the mix of ideas. And he was kind of silent on it.

So he denied that it would happen. He admitted they were going to reprogram money away from the training and that they were going to keep the Air Marshals on.

And I told him I'd send him a list of reasonable and good hotels in the San Francisco area, to which he laughed and said, Send it over.

SCHUMER: But the bottom line is none of us have any doubt that had there not been this alert that they'd be cutting the Marshals right now. And I wouldn't be surprised if they tried to cut them three months from now.

BOXER: And frankly, if the Marshals hadn't had the courage to speak out, and I just want to say again I hope they get the message how important it is that they speak out, because if they hadn't this might not have come to light.

They're the ones who brought this issue forward. So...

QUESTION: Are there any other areas that they've talked about reprogramming? Or did Asa Hutchinson indicate when they might begin?

SCHUMER: No, they're so threadbare in so many different areas that they don't have, there's no extra pot of money there. And they're already, this is another lesson of what's happened. They're cutting into the bone, right now.

When they don't have enough money to fund Air Marshals, which was one of the things we talked about the most right after 9/11, as a way of preventing another 9/11 from happening, then you know that there's no fat in this agency and they're cutting into bone.

BOXER: Anybody else? Thank you.

"CNN Breaking News," CNN, 8/14/2003

JOHN KING, CNN ANCHOR: Senator, thank you for joining us.

Let me ask you the question that Mayor Bloomberg posed earlier. Where were you when the lights went out?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, John, I was in my offices in midtown. And I was having a meeting with all of my summer interns, who are finishing up their time with me. I had about 50 of these terrific young people. We were in a room in the lower floors of the office building where my office is.

And we were talking about issues. And they were reviewing their summer for me when we had the lights go off and then had word that we should evacuate the building. So very calmly, we went out to the sidewalk in front of our office and continued our discussion for about 30 or 40 minutes and tried desperately to get information in those first few minutes.

But you know, New Yorkers are so terrific. Everybody was calm. Everybody coming out of all of the office buildings, all up and down Third Avenue, where my office is. You know, they were standing there talking on their cell phones, trying to figure out what was going on. And it became clear that we'd had this massive power outage, which, when we finally get the power back on, we're going to have to figure out why the provisions that were supposedly in place to prevent this didn't work, but right now everybody's just trying to do their best to help each other and get themselves home.

KING: And Senator, we heard the mayor saying they're still trying to find out what happened. Nobody in New York thinks there was terrorism involved. Everyone in Washington is telling us they do not think -- do you have any sense from your conversations with, whether it's city state, or federal officials, as to what happened?

CLINTON: Well, John, I think, first and foremost, it is absolutely our understanding now that this is not terrorism, that there was some mechanical failure, overload. We're not sure where.

Our best understanding right now is that whatever did happen to start these cascading outages began in Canada. The Niagara Mohawk system is a huge system that serves southern Canada and the northeastern United States, all the way over to Ohio into New England and certainly, you know, down into New York City.

This is the preliminary information, but, you know, a lot of us are going to want to know a lot more and get some specifics as to whether, you know, this is something that could have or should have been avoided.

We haven't had a very hot summer. We've had a pretty cool, wet summer here in New York. And I'm not sure why the first hot day would create this kind of reaction.

But nevertheless, right now we're just focused on people getting home safely, taking care of each other, and traffic lights are not working so driving very carefully. And then, there will be plenty of time to try to figure out why this happened and what we need to do to prevent it.

KING: Was your first thought, Senator, because of the world we now, unfortunately, live in, "Oh, my God, more terrorism."

CLINTON: You know, I tried not to jump to that thought, John. I just wanted to get information. You know, I was worried. I had all these 50 young people with me. I wanted to get them out of the building as we were asked to evacuate and get outside and then try to take stock of what was going on.

Clearly, it crossed my mind. It had to cross anybody's, especially those of us in New York. But we were able to get through to some officials, both federal and state, and we were able to get some feedback from the city.

Originally, we thought there had been some kind of fire or accident at the Con Ed station down on 14th Street. That, apparently, is not the case. So we were given that information. And like everybody else, we were just trying to, you know, figure out what did happen. And then from my position, of course, I feel a responsibility to try to make sure we know what happened and make sure it doesn't happen again.

KING: And Senator, if you'll forgive me, if I could ask you to help us and play traffic reporter, where are you? You're trying to make your way home, I understand. Where are you physically, and what's the scene around you?

CLINTON: Well, I went up the West End Avenue as opposed to trying to get on the West Side Highway, which was totally gridlocked. And I'm about to get out of the city and be able to make my way back home.

But people are really behaving well, John. I just want to reinforce that, once again, New Yorkers have risen to the occasion. They are performing, you know, with a lot of calmness and strength and industriousness.

I heard Wolf Blitzer talking, as I was waiting to talk to you, about some of the efforts that people are making to get folks out of elevators. We still have some people in elevators and in subways. But all of it is proceeding very well. And, you know, so far we don't have any word of any problems or fatalities, and that's the way we want to keep it.

KING: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, we thank you for checking in with us.

If you learn any more tonight about how this might have happened or any other potential fallout ramifications, please check in with us. We hope you make it home safely and that the lights are on in Chappaqua.

CLINTON: I appreciate it.

KING: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON THE U.S. AIR FORCE LEASE OF BOEING TANKER AIRCRAFT, 9/4/2003

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, I too, want to thank you for holding this hearing. I think it's indicative of your leadership and your openness.

I would just add a few points. I think there is general agreement that the Air Force needs more tankers; I would posit that. I mean, I think that should be, sort of, the basis on which we go forward.

CLINTON: The issue is how best to obtain those tankers as soon as possible, put them into service and have them utilized. I am struck by the various questions concerning this particular approach to obtaining the tankers. I don't have a positive or negative feeling about the process yet. I appreciate the effort to find out more information. But I do think there are other related issues that the context of this should be recognized.

You know, we are going over this leasing arrangement with a fine-toothed comb and we're putting out billions of dollars in contracts for the reconstruction of Iraq, and not knowing a single thing about them. You know, Senator Collins and I and Senator Wyden have been trying to find out information about Halliburton and Bechtel and others who just basically have been handed billion dollar open checkbooks, and there has been very little, if any, oversight by anyone in the Congress.

So I hope that this hearing and the rather significant amount of information that's been forthcoming will serve as a model for other contracts that are being entered into, in this case without any information or oversight.

Secondly, part of the dilemma we find ourselves in is our failure to be honest about the costs that we confront and the ability of our government to sustain these costs into the future without adequate revenues. This is not a problem that is going away no matter how often people try to pretend that it doesn't exist. It is, to use an appropriate metaphor perhaps, the giant elephant in the room. You know, this is a huge issue. We are not paying as we go, and we are not acting responsibly about how we fund critical needs like national defense.

So this leasing agreement, looked at on the side as though it were some aberration, is part of a much larger pattern of fiscal irresponsibility and failure to acknowledge the real costs of our undertaking the kind of missions that we are currently committed to.

So, Mr. Chairman, I think that it is imperative that we come to an answer on this, because clearly in my review of what I've been given the Air Force needs these tankers. Our continuing missions require this kind of capacity. But I think we should take a very hard look at the broader context in which this hearing is being held, because, you know, we are focusing on one relatively small albeit very important issue and we are failing to look at the entire context that this is occurring in.

So I thank the chairman for having this hearing, and I look forward to the information.

WARNER: Senator, I appreciate that.

I note also your reference to contracts in Iraq. You'll recall the debate that we had on the floor with the Boxer amendment. She took an initiative and we joined on that and did some piece of legislation. But I'll refer to what we did on the floor and the subsequent actions by the department. I think you raised a question that's certainly within the province of this committee to look at.

CLINTON: Thank you.

"Good Morning America," ABC, 9/11/2003

A live picture from ground zero, and you're seeing some of the British police officers who have come to New York to help commemorate this second anniversary of 9/11. 125 British police officers from different cities around the country, bringing, as I say, British flags into the site. And we want to go back to ground zero. We're joined from there by Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. And Senator, it's good to have you with us on this day. And, and Diane and I, as we sit here, are sort of conflicted. We don't know whether this is a day of looking back or mostly a day of looking forward.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON,

DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK

You know, Charlie, I think it's a day of doing both. I was able to hear the audio of Diane's continuing coverage and attention to the families and the children. And Diane, I mean, I couldn't see the pictures, which I'm sure would have brought me to even greater teariness, but the sound of the voices and the resolve. No one's forgetting the people that we lost. The loved ones who are going to gather here are coming because they will never, ever have a life that is the same. But their lives go on, like all of our lives. So, we do look back, and we honor and commemorate. And we think about what we lost, and we go forward because of the resilience and the courage of so many people who are such examples to all of us.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) Senator, let me talk to you a little bit about what happens at ground zero. We talked to the former Mayor Giuliani. His position has always been that the memorial, whatever it maybe, should dominate on that site and that rebuilding should be secondary. And some families have been protesting saying they thought they had a promise that no building would occur on the footprints of the old Trade Center towers and indeed that, that the memorial would go down 70 feet to the bedrock because that is a burial ground of many of their loved ones. Did they have that promise, and has it gone by the wayside?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, Charlie, I know that the families have many different feelings and deep concerns about this. I, I agree that the memorial, whatever it is, should be the primary structure, whatever the design is. This is a sacred ground. The process that has been set up under the governor's office, the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation, which has set up a series of committees and juries to judge designs is responsible for making that decision. And I trust, and I hope that whatever their decisions are, that it will be first and foremost a sign of respect and remembrance for the people we lost, and also a way of reminding ourselves and future generations about what was sacrificed on this site and the constant vigilance that's required for our freedom and our liberty.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) One of the things discussed is a freedom tower that would go there, which would be very, very tall. Do you worry about a tall building on that site?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

No. If it's an appropriate part of a, a design that does what is needed down here at ground zero. I don't worry about that. You know, New York is a City of skyscrapers. We reach toward the sky. That's part of the human spirit. I don't think that we should be intimidated or deterred from doing whatever we believe is appropriate.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) And I'm just curious, as a New Yorker and Senator and whatever, how you, how you feel on this day?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

This is a really hard day, Charlie. You know, this is a day when I look into the eyes of a lot of the family members whom I've gotten to know, some of the grievously wounded victims who are still dealing with burns and injuries, where I meet firefighters who have been forced to retire from active service because their World Trade Center cough, whatever that is, won't go away. So there is a lot of bitter- sweet moments in this day.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) Mm hmm.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

At the same time, though, I, like you and Diane, am just overwhelmed by the courage and the grace of the people that I meet. And it also strengthens my resolve even greater than it has been to just make sure I do whatever I possibly can to try to prevent anything like this ever happening anywhere in our country again.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) All right, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. Good to have you with us. You take care. Thanks for being here.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Thank you. Thank you.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) And we'll be right back. Stay with us.

"The Early Show," CBS, 9/11/2003

Senator Hillary Clinton is at ground zero this morning to attend the September 11th anniversary ceremony and she joins us now.

Good morning, Senator Clinton.

Senator HILLARY CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning, Hannah.

STORM: Now as a former first lady and the senator from the state which has suffered so terribly from those attacks, what are your personal reflections on this day?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, this is a very hard day. Like so many New Yorkers and Americans, I knew people who perished on September 11th. I have come to know many of the family members who lost loved ones and some of the people who were so grievously injured by burns and falling debris from the sky, and it's a day for looking back and honoring those we lost, but it's also a day for, you know, thinking about the present, trying to help rebuild lives, as well as the physical infrastructure of our city, and to be resolved to do everything we can to protect ourselves going forward.

STORM: You fought so much for the heroes of 9/11. You have sought money for firefighters. You've taken the EPA to task for toning down their report on air quality at ground zero. Has enough been done for the heroes, the people who fought so bravely on that day?

Sen. CLINTON: I don't think so. I feel very strongly that, you know, the people who rushed toward danger, who I think saved thousands of lives, deserve all the help that they need. They deserve continuing medical care because we know that based on a program that I helped to fund to give clinical exams to our firefighters and our police officers, our construction workers and others that about half of them are suffering from what is called the World Trade Center cough and pulmonary, respiratory function problems. And we need to be very sure that the residents and the people who work in the immediate area today have good quality air in the indoor of their homes and their businesses. So there's still a lot of work to be done.

STORM: Senator Clinton, you mentioned security and I want to talk about the news that's dominating this--the Senate right now and that's Iraq. A lot of people feel the focus on the war in Iraq has not only derailed our own security, it has hurt us economically, it's hurt our credibility on the world stage. Are we suffering of a crisis in leadership in this country right now?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, you know, Hannah, I'd be happy to come back and--and talk with you about that sometime in the future. I obviously have strong feelings. My goal is as the senator from New York to do everything I can to protect and defend our people, to make sure that we are a strong leader so that we can have more allies and not enemies around the world. It's a very dangerous world we're in right now, but today really belongs to the victims, the survivors, the family members, the brave men and women who put their lives at stake for what we know would have been an even worst disaster on the day two years ago that we commemorate now.

STORM: Let me ask you about a comment that Mayor Giuliani told us earlier this morning, and--and he was noting that we had such great unity among the political leadership in our country two years ago, and that has been replaced by a divisiveness. He was wondering what that was a function of. Was it a function of the upcoming presidential election or something else?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I'm glad that we had unity and we should have had unity. We were attacked two years ago, and when that happens, team America pulls together and I was very proud of our country and we stood behind our leadership, but we're a democracy. You know, even in the midst of World War II, there were some really good debates about what was happening in our country and the direction of the war effort. Certainly in every year since then, there's been a good debate. This is no exception. I think it's healthy for us to be asking hard questions.

You know, we're not cheap. We don't follow whatever any leader tells us to do. We're citizens of the greatest democracy the world's ever created, and the way we express that is through our political process. So where we can be and should be united, we have to be because we are facing dangers and threats, but where we have honest disagreements, we should have a good faith debate and I think there are many questions.

For example, I'm not yet satisfied we've done enough on homeland security. I don't think that we've given our firefighters, our police officers, our EMTs, our public hospitals, our public health centers the resources they need to defend and protect us in the event of another attack. I don't think it's being divisive to say, 'We need to do better and here are some different ways we could go about doing that.'

STORM: All right. Senator Hillary Clinton, thanks so much for your time this morning.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you very much, Hannah.

"CNN Live Event/Special," CNN, 9/11/2003

BILL HEMMER, CNN ANCHOR: Back here live at ground zero, an extraordinary scene again taking place on the western edge of ground zero. Already hundreds of family members, quite possibly in the thousands, are already starting to line up along the street to pay their respects today.

With me now, the junior senator from the State of New York, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

How are you today?

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I'm all right, Bill.

You know, this is a hard day for so many people who lost loved ones, and I think for all New Yorkers who either knew somebody or have gotten to know a family member or another person directly affected, as I have.

HEMMER: What do you think, what comes to mind when you look at the images on the street 10 floors below where we're standing?

CLINTON: Oh, courage, resilience, an enormous amount of grace. You know, when I look out at this site, I think of the first time I saw it on September the 12th, when I helicoptered in from LaGuardia in order to meet the governor and the mayor to survey the horrors. And it was hard at that moment to ever think the fires would go out or that we might not be attacked immediately again.

So, in some respects today, which is a day of commemoration and looking back, is also a day of taking stock of how far we've come, but what else we have to do ahead of us.

HEMMER: When it comes to doing things ahead of us here in New York City, as a representative for the state and the people who live here, there's been a lot of criticism right now in going forward with this memorial versus the construction.

Where do you stand right now on where that should be focused?

CLINTON: I've always thought that the memorial should be the centerpiece and the most important part of whatever is rebuilt. I think it's imperative that not only to honor those we lost, but to symbolize the courage and resilience of the people of this country. You know, I'm hoping and trusting that the process which has been put in place by the governor that has created different committees to make these decisions will be focused on doing that.

HEMMER: There is construction slated for an enormous tower to begin this summer.

Are you OK with that?

CLINTON: You know, I think you have to look at the total design. I'm not against any one piece of it as long as the overall effect is that the memorial and the meaning of this site is paramount.

HEMMER: Are you satisfied with the amount of money that's come into this city? There were a lot of promises a few years ago, two years, to be a little bit more exact than that. And a large portion of that has come in, but not completely.

CLINTON: But it's in the pipeline. I think that we've learned a lot about how to deal with such an unprecedented disaster. I'm very grateful for the financial help that we've received from the Congress and the administration. My concerns are mostly around whether or not we have really done all we need to do to take care of people. And I've got some unfinished business there.

I'm also concerned about the homeland security aspects of this. I don't think that anywhere in the country, but particularly here in New York, we've provided enough federal resources for our firefighters, our police officers, our EMTs. You know, we have so many unmet needs when it comes to being prepared and ready in case something terrible happens again.

HEMMER: Is it possible, though, to ever be 100 percent?

CLINTON: No, but I want to go to bed at night knowing that we've done everything humanly possible. I don't want to go to bed saying, you know, we've been talking for two years now about how our borders need to be safer. You know, we're closing fire stations in New York City, a place where the firefighters lost so many hundreds of their, you know, fellow firefighters. It's not right.

I mean I don't understand how we can go from two years ago when we were praising our firefighters, when we're cutting our force, when we're cutting back the federal support for our NYPD and other law enforcement around the country. That doesn't make any sense to me.

So, no, there's nothing in life that's a hundred percent. And you can look at other places in the world, like Israel, that have certainly been on the front lines in the fight against terrorism for decades. There's no way to plug every hole and prevent every suicidal lunatic from coming into your borders. But let's do everything we possibly can. And I'm not yet convinced we have.

HEMMER: Good luck today.

CLINTON: Thanks.

HEMMER: And I know you're spending a lot of time with the families today and best of luck with that.

CLINTON: Thanks. It's hard. But, you know, they're brave and courageous people and...

HEMMER: And inspiring, don't you think?

CLINTON: Very much inspiring.

HEMMER: I find it unfortunately year to year now down here.

CLINTON: That's right.

HEMMER: Thank you, Senator.

CLINTON: Thank you, Bill.

"Inside Politics," CNN, 9/11/2003

WOODRUFF: I spoke with New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton a short time after this morning's service at ground zero. I started by asking her if she agreed with Rudy Giuliani who said this morning he's concerned that Americans might soon forget the events of September 11.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I do. You know, for nearly two years now I have been speaking out about the need for more homeland security. Not only more federal dollars that get directly to our first responders, our hospitals, our EMTs, our public health facilities, but also information that empowers our citizens to be able to act appropriately.

You know, here in New York I think we have demonstrated twice in two years, first on the horrible day of 9/11 and again on the day of the blackout, that, you know, we're able to deal with the reality that we have to confront. And I think it's a question of both financial resources, better deployed and attitudes not only in New York but across the country of being responsible, keeping our eyes open, figuring out what we need to do for ourselves and our families in the event of an emergency.

WOODRUFF: Who need to step up to the plate, senator, and -- and fill the gaps that you are describing?

CLINTON: Well, Judy, I think it's primarily the responsibility of the federal government. And I do think some positive progress has occurred. I applaud that. Because we -- we certainly have done better on our airline security, although we still have work to do there. We have certainly gotten some resources where they're needed with respect to bioterrorism.

But you know, we have a long way to go. And I don't think that the federal government yet has fully comprehended that this is a national problem that needs a national response.

I also believe that they have failed to recognize that we have got to invest a lot more federal dollars into security. You know, down at the ceremony today, I talked to a lot of firefighters and police officers. And to a person, each said, you know, we're not getting what we need. It's almost impossible to believe that two years after 9/11, when I know from the intelligence that is both public and that I see, that New York and Washington remain at the top of the target list, that we would have closed firehouses, that we would have laid off police officers, that hospitals and public health facilities wouldn't yet have what they need, whether it's decontaminant units or other kinds of preparedness, material, equipment and training. And yet that is the fact.

WOODRUFF: Senator, as you know, meanwhile, President Bush this week identifying Iraq as now the frontline of the war on terror, he's asking for $87 additional billions of dollars, to fight that war. Can you do that and at the same time take care of the needs that you are describing?

CLINTON: Well, Judy, I don't think we have a choice. Apparently the administration thinks we do. That number, $87 billion, was a shocker. It was far higher than any of us had been led to expect. But you know, I am going to do everything I can to support our men and women in uniform. I'm very proud that we are fielding not only the 10th Mountain Division from Fort Drumm in northern New York, but many guard and reserve units. And, you know, New York, just like the rest of America, is really doing its part in Afghanistan and in Iraq.

But we cannot forget the homefront. And the reason that the president is making what I consider a false choice is because he has such bad economic and budget policies that we have driven our country into deficit and debt and we're not prepared to do what it takes to get us ready, to make sure every police officer and firefighter in this country has the equipment and the training that he or she need to make sure our borders and our ports are secure.

You know, I know we can't get to 100 percent. That's humanly impossible. But I want to go to bed at night thinking we have done everything we can. And when I listen to the experts who are the firefighters, the police officers, the other people who are going to be responding to those calls to action, I don't think we are ready. And we need as high a priority on defending us at home as the president places on what we're doing in Iraq.

WOODRUFF: And Senator, you've let the president know this?

CLINTON: I just did.

I have said this for two years, Judy. You know, I introduced the first legislation to ask for homeland security money to get to cities and counties. And so far it's fallen in on deaf ears. And I just hope that as we commemorate this second anniversary, we start paying attention to the real needs for defending ourselves here and our own borders.

WOODRUFF: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton a little earlier today.

U.S. SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE (R-OK) HOLDS HEARING ON EPA ADMINISTRATOR NOMINATION, 9/23/2003

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I want to welcome the governor and Jackie Leavitt. I am delighted that they are here. I think, as the governor has already determined from his consultative process and certainly the comments that have already been made today, many of us are a little concerned about the administration that you are attempting to join and the policies that it has taken toward the environment.

And of course, you would be responsible for carrying out those policies. And it's not just the policy choices. It is also the way the administration has gone about them.

The litany of requests for information, some of which Senator Jeffords referred to, that are basically ignored and rejected, are lengthy and troubling. So there are a lot of topics to cover about specific issues. But I want to focus, in my brief remarks, on the recent EPA inspector general report about EPA's response to the World Trade Center attack.

It's an issue that illustrates how much Americans rely on the EPA for information about the air they breathe and how this administration has undermined EPA's credibility. In the last 12 days, we marked the two-year anniversary of the attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

It brought back a lot of memories for many of us. It certainly did for me.

And I remember very well being there the day after those attacks and seeing the firefighters and the police officers and the others emerging from that hellish site, covered with dust and debris. I also know how concerned I was, starting at that moment, about the health of the people who were working and living in the area.

And we turn to our government for advice and guidance. I was asked. I asked the EPA. I asked other government officials, "Is the air safe?" And the EPA told us it was.

In successive press releases, Governor Whitman, then the administrator, sought to reassure the people of New York and American that their air was safe to breathe. Based on the EPA's statements, parents sent their children to school, elderly residents returned to their apartments. And unfortunately now, we learn from the EPA inspector general, that the statements were -- and I quote -- "not supported by the data available at the time."

Now I recognize -- and I've said this to Governor Leavitt and I've said it publicly -- that the EPA and everyone else involved was operating under extraordinarily difficult and unprecedented circumstances. But I just cannot accept that there seems to have been a deliberate effort, at the direction of the White House, to provide unwarranted reassurances to New Yorkers about whether their air was safe to breathe.

According to the inspector general -- and I quote -- "EPA's early statement that the air was safe to breathe was incomplete, in that it lacked necessary qualifications and thus was not supported by the data available at the time. CEQ, the Council on Environmental Quality in the White House influenced the final message in the EPA's air quality statements."

Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent for two more minutes.

INHOFE: It would be deducted from your next five-minute round, if that is acceptable?

CLINTON: That's acceptable. The inspector general went on to say, "Based on the documentation we reviewed and our discussions with numerous environmental experts, both within and outside of EPA, we do not agree that the agency's statement on September 18, 2001 that the air was safe to breathe reflected the agencies best professional advice."

"In contrast, based on the circumstances, it appeared that EPA's best professional advice was overruled when relaying information to the public in the weeks immediately following the disaster. The White House Council on Environmental Quality influenced, through the collaboration process, the information that EPA communicated to the public through its early press releases, when it convinced EPA to add reassuring statements and delete cautionary ones."

Mr. Chairman, these revelations are outrageous. But they are part of a pattern.

If this were the only example, it could perhaps be looked at as unfortunate, but understandable. But it cannot be isolated.

Time and time again, when we ask for information and we do not get it or when we get information which experts clearly say -- and even lay people understand -- is not accurate, that undermines the credibility that we should be able to have in our government, particularly about such important matters.

So Mr. Chairman, I would ask that my full statement be submitted to the record. I would also ask that a statement by EPA workers who perform health, and environmental protection duties and expressing their anger and dismay over the White House's improper actions, also be included in the record.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Governor, I have a number of questions on a range of issues that I will most likely not get to during this hearing unless the chairman has a change of mind and we are able to lengthen it so that we can get all of our questions in. So I will be submitting a number of questions to you in writing. There are lots of issues that are of concern to New Yorkers. And I would like to get your answers as we move through this process.

But I want to ask you about the continuing concerns that I have expressed about the inspector general's report. And I want to speak about indoor air quality.

And before I ask a specific question, I want to thank a representative of the downtown residents from Lower Manhattan, Katherine McVeigh-Hughes (ph), who has just arrived, because I think Mrs. Hughes demonstrates clearly why I am so concerned about this. She is the mother of two young boys, along with her husband. She lives one block east of the World Trade Center on Broadway, between John and Maiden Lane. And she has lived through the confusion, the disinformation, the unsubstantiated reassurance.

And I know that, in addition to your many other attributes, you and your wife have a lovely family. And I think that putting yourself into the position of someone like Mrs. Hughes perhaps can clarify the concerns that we have and why this is not just a question about the past. It is a question about what you will do as the administrator.

Because when we began the process of cleanup, it took quite some time. But the EPA finally announced a testing a cleanup program in May of 2002. And they tested and cleaned thousands of residences. And I applauded that effort at the time. But I continued to raise questions about its adequacy.

Since reading the inspector general's report carefully, I have even greater concerns because the inspector general makes a compelling case that further testing and cleanup are required; specifically, the IG recommended three additional testing and cleanup actions.

I wrote to the president, asking that these be implemented. It seems to me that, given the problems in the cleanup and the testing, given the IG's findings that when we went back and retested some of the cleaned up areas, we found residue of contaminants that were troubling, I want to ask you a simple yes or no question at the outset.

If you are confirmed, would you seek to implement the recommendations about indoor air testing and cleanup referred to in the inspector general's report and in my letter to the president?

LEAVITT: Senator, I understand that there are conversations going on currently between your office and the White House with respect to this, and the EPA. I have not been party to those. And therefore, I am not able to give you a simple yes or no.

I would like to reflect, if I could however, thoughts I have had since our conversation about this matter. I listened carefully to your concerns. And while I have no new insight to add to what has occurred -- because I have no firsthand information about it -- I have tried to ascertain what I could learn from this.

And it's my clear sense that there is an importance for people to have information and that, when people have information, they are able to act. And I would like you to know that, in a circumstance where I found myself, I would do my best to assure that information was available and that we could serve the best interests of the people in crisis.

CLINTON: I thank you, governor. And I know that this is not yet your responsibility. But as we move forward in this process, I will continue to ask about an EPA commitment, as part of whatever resolution -- and I hope there is a resolution to this matter -- you would be responsible of course for implementing it.

Because if one looks carefully at the IG's assessment of the cleanup and the retesting, the scope of that program has not been adequate. You know, we just didn't get enough places cleaned. And unfortunately, as the IG report found, 82 percent of the residential units were re-cleaned.

And they had to be re-cleaned because the sampling filters were too clogged with dust to be analyzed. And even after that second re- cleaning, the units were still too dusty to pass the clearance test over 80 percent of the time.

So that's evidence that, even though there was a cleaning process, the cleaning process was often not successful. And again, I am really trying to get to this "inlibre" point, governor, because it does seem to me that, first, when you say you're going to have a cleaning process, then the cleaning process should be adequate, with the results that people can point to and say were successful. And I think that is the EPA's responsibility. So it will be my continuing point that we should do whatever it takes to reassure people that they have been given both accurate information and that the cleaning of their residences and workplaces have removed the contaminants that could possibly endanger the health of themselves and their children.

This IG report, I think, is very instructive.

INHOFE: Senator Clinton, your time has expired. You've gone three minutes over. And I'm awfully sorry, we have to get to the other senators.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Chairman, will we do another round?

INHOFE: Of course.

CLINTON: Good. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

INHOFE: Senator -- go ahead and go to Senator Chafee now since he didn't have an opportunity for an opening statement, if that's all right.

Senator Chafee? Five minutes.

CHAFEE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Welcome, governor. It was a pleasure to meet with you in the office and hear about your past, growing up in the southwest corner of Utah. And your town grew, I think you said, fivefold in the last number of years. And so you are familiar with rapid growth and some of the issues associated with that.

And I hope that -- I'm sure that you will bring that experience to your new position, should you be confirmed. And now you are going to be working for President Bush, as everybody has talked about. And during the campaign, he talked about Brownfields legislation and was successful at implementing that legislation and funding it -- very importantly.

On the other hand, I talked about regulating carbon dioxide. And I would like to see more of the same emphasis put into that campaign pledge as put into Brownfields, which has been enormously successful.

I would like to ask a separate question, though. You are going to be overseeing 10 regional administrators. And what kind of flexibility and autonomy will you give to these 10 different regional administrators? Each of these regions are going to be so different. So what kind of flexibility do you foresee giving these administrators?

LEAVITT: Senator, having served as governor for nearly 11 years, I have dealt with the regional administrators of the Environmental Protection Agency on many, many occasions and recognize that much of the great work that happens and many of the decisions that are reached happen at the regions and that I believe in a sense of decentralization, getting decisions closest to the people.

I have not yet had a chance, nor would it have been appropriate for me, to meet pre-confirmation with the regional administrators or to begin to delve into the organizational structure or where changes might be made or where the strengths of the organization would be found. But if I am confirmed by the Senate, I would most certainly begin that discussion and do what I can, at that point, to make any improvements necessary.

CHAFEE: Thank you. And on a more lighter note, since your relationship with the president is so important -- people have talked about it -- and you're both former governors, what has been your relationship in the previous years, in meeting at conferences or the like?

LEAVITT: Well, since T is very close to U in the alphabet, we have spent a considerable amount of time sitting with one another. He is a person who, as I indicated earlier, has my full trust. And he has my full loyalty.

He knows, I believe, based on the nature of our relationship, that he will have my best efforts and that he will also have my full and complete opinions, that I won't pull punches with him, that I will tell him directly -- sometimes in private -- how I feel. And I like to believe that that may be one of the reasons that he has called on me for what is clearly a challenging assignment.

CHAFEE: Thank you, governor. Good luck.

INHOFE: Senator Murkowski?

MURKOWSKI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Governor, I would like to switch over to some Alaska -- excuse me?

INHOFE: No, not until each one has had a second round. That's always been the custom of this committee and all other committees, that I'm aware of.

CLINTON: She hasn't had a round.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Governor, on the continuing series of questions that I have about the cleanup of lower Manhattan, I will submit those in writing to you as well, with the backup data, because it is hard in the time we have to cover that much ground. But I want to focus on the issue of the EPA's integrity, that this set of circumstances raises.

You know, when you look at the inspector general's findings. And to me, they are conclusive. I know the EPA was concerned that it put the EPA in a bad light.

I frankly think it put the White House in a bad light, unfortunately. I think the EPA tried to do what they thought was appropriate and were overruled, to some extent.

But when you look at the September 18th statement that the air was safe to breathe and realize it was not supported by the data available at the time and that the White House directed changes in a number of September 2001 press releases, I think that is a concern because it does fit into this pattern that we have that we're not getting accurate information that not only we can rely on, but more importantly, the American people can rely on, especially when we need to trust our government the most, as we do in these times of challenge.

So I had asked the White House for an explanation. And as I think I said to you in our meeting, I can fully understand why the White House might have overreacted or worried about panic at the time. But enough time has now passed that I think it would be appropriate for the White House to try to rebuild that confidence that we should be able to have in the highest levels of our government when it comes to health and safety.

But specifically with respect to your nomination, governor, I am sure you are going to have conflicts with the White House and with other administration officials about policy matters. And on every decision, you may not always prevail, although I certainly hope you prevail on more than less.

So can I ask you: do you agree that, regardless of the policy decisions, the EPA has a mandate to provide accurate data?

LEAVITT: Senator, it seems clear to me that the Environmental Protection Agency has a role of being able to assure the air is clean and to be able to provide the best available data.

CLINTON: And can you assure me that if you are confirmed, you will fulfill this mandate to provide the public with accurate data, regardless of what pressures you may face from the White House or the administration?

LEAVITT: As I mentioned in our private meeting, senator, I have no firsthand knowledge of any of the things that happened with respect to 9/11 or in Manhattan. I have watched closely to see what I can learn from this circumstance. And as I indicated earlier today, one of the things I draw from this is, in my own mind, if I'm faced with a circumstance, to make sure that people have the data and that we do the best we can to inform people of risks that are there, as I feel some confidence that those at the White House had every intention of being able to meet that mandate.

I recognize that there's a controversy going over this right now. But I will do my best not to find myself in any kind of similar circumstance.

CLINTON: Governor, I want to ask you also about the Clean Water Act. We have a lot of water in New York. And the proposed rulemaking that is now underway concerning the Clean Water Act, do you support the proposed rulemaking to limit the types of streams and wetlands, ponds and other waters that are covered by the federal Clean Water Act at this time?

LEAVITT: Senator, are you referencing specifically wetlands?

CLINTON: And not only wetlands. It's the broader set of issues concerning the scope of the Clean Water Act, which would remove federal protection not just from millions of acres of wetlands, but also streams and lakes.

LEAVITT: I'm aware of these issues, but only in a most general fashion. One of the areas that our state has worked hard on is in doing the studies necessary to establish the total maximum daily load, for example. And there are certain indentations in the land where there is no water, that periodically there will be water.

And there's work to try to figure out where those -- how to treat those indentations that have no water. I know that's an issue, for example.

But fundamentally, our objective is to have clean water and to find ways in which to gain compliance. And in the final analysis, when all of the discussion has been held, if the water was cleaner, I will feel as though we have succeeded. And my objective is not to do anything to weaken the law to do that. My objective is to find compliance and to find ways of collaborating to that end.

CLINTON: Well, you know, governor, I have heard several of my colleagues refer to the fact that the latest trend report from the EPA demonstrates the increasing good news about the air and the water. I would only remind us that that is something that's happened over 20 to 30 years.

What we are seeing now -- and part of the reason why we're pressing this so hard on so many fronts -- is a reversal of those trends. No one argues that we have had some very good news over the last several years. And I think it's due to the hard work of members of Congress, administrations of both parties that have remained committed to the underlying fundamental mission of enforcing both the Clean Air and the Clean Water Act.

What we see now are disturbing trends in the other direction. So I think that has to be put into a larger context.

And finally, I think that you have a tremendous opportunity, should you be confirmed. I'm not lifting my hold yet, but should you be confirmed.

(LAUGHTER)

LEAVITT: There was some optimism.

CLINTON: Yeah, I know. I could see you. But I hope to. I hope that we get the answers and the actions that I think the people I represent deserve to have so that I could consider doing that.

But in any event, let me just quickly conclude, Mr. Chairman. You have a tremendous opportunity, governor -- because of this continuing debate about carbon dioxide, because of the continuing concern about the changes in the New Source Review -- to try to get people at the table.

I have spoken with a number of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle. I think there are opportunities for us to come to some resolution of these issues. But we have to have some real leadership, and not just proposals that frankly don't stand up to any kind of scientific or expert analysis.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON SEXUAL MISCONDUCT REPORT, 9/24/2003

CLINTON: I thank the chairman, and I thank my colleague, Senator Collins, and I thank the panel for an extraordinary public service.

This is a very impressive report. The thoughtfulness of your analysis and recommendations, if followed, should put us on the right path.

And I would hope that, in addition to following the recommendations of the chairwoman with respect to the dean of faculty, we would consider looking at all of these recommendations and putting them into the DOD authorization, because I think that we need to set a benchmark against which we can hold accountable and measure the progress that is being made.

WARNER: On that point, Senator, I'm glad you raised that. In consultation with the ranking member, we're going to see what we can incorporate in the pending conference report such that this matter is addressed immediately. General Bunting, who was former commandant at the...

CLINTON: VMI.

WARNER: ... Virginia, VMI, points out the need to have a dean and a freedom of election of that dean, selection of the dean, and not be limited by the membership on the faculty, it may be that an outside -- so that's an important observation that you draw on from your experience at VMI. Thank you.

CLINTON: I want to ask each of the panelists to respond to a question, because I am still somewhat confused about the difference in emphasis between the first recommendation concerning awareness and accountability about the DOD IG's conduct of a thorough review of the accountability of academy and Air Force headquarters leadership and the chairwoman's testimony this morning with respect to a thorough review of the accountability of the previous leaders at the academy and Air Force headquarters.

And my question is this: Did anyone in the present or prior leadership of the Air Force or the Department of Defense explicitly or implicitly suggest to or ask you to limit the panel's recommendation about the DOD IG's investigation to former Air Force and academy leaders?

MILLER: No. And what I understood Ms. Fowler to be saying this morning is not a departure from what we said but a clarification, that, in the course of our research, there were questions raised about previous leaders. In the course of our research, none of the problematic questions raised dealt with the current leadership. So that we're not arguing that the current leadership should be excluded, but just that, of the evidence we have, we only have questions about the performance of prior leaders.

So no one asked us to exclude the current leadership. I don't believe that's what Ms. Fowler said. And I personally agree that we have no evidence to exclude them; we only have evidence raising questions about the previous leadership.

CLINTON: General?

BUNTING: I would agree with and endorse that answer. Our interest, once we got under way, basically was at the academy. We focused very intensely on what was happening there and did not spend a great deal of time addressing that issue.

(UNKNOWN): I would concur with Dr. Miller and General Bunting, that we were looking at the process over a decade, and we were dealing with a new leadership that had just started action. So our main focus was on the previous leadership.

WARNER: Could I just make a statement of fact for the record?

Secretary Roche was confirmed by the Senate on May 24, 2001. According to my calculation, he was in office for 20 months before the letters that Senator Allard and I forwarded to the various people to begin to look at this.

General Jumper was confirmed by the Senate August 3, 2001, giving him somewhere around a little less than 18 months.

So, I just point out that they had been in office for, I think, significant periods of time. And you draw on Colonel Ripley's, I think, rather dramatic metaphor, "This was a ship in broad daylight sailing into a reef," and according to General Bunting, "Systemic problems were manifest to everybody who wished to see them."

FOWLER: In answer to your question, Senator Clinton, number one, this has been an independent panel. No one has given us any directions as who to include or exclude in our recommendations, in our review. We have operated totally independent of anyone in any place of leadership at the Pentagon or here on the Hill. That's been the good news, and we've operated in a very fair and transparent manner.

It has been our opinion, as stated earlier -- we can't make an official recommendation, but I stated in the press conference in answer to a question on Monday and, again, I stated in my beliefs this morning, was that, in the information that we have uncovered, that we uncovered in our investigation, we could not find a reason to call for an investigation of the current leadership. But we could certainly find reasons to call for investigations of prior leadership when we saw, time and again, lack of action on the part.

From what we investigated and learned, this leadership, once it was brought to their attention, which was early this year, then they did take immediate action. The agenda for change was issued before the working group report was finalized. I mean, they got the interim report, and they moved forward and put out that agenda for change, which needed to be done. You had young women cadets arriving at the academy in June. They could not let those current procedures, the ones that were in place before then, stay in place.

So, we commended their action. Even though we didn't agree with everything in it, it was better to move forward and get some changes started being made than to sit around waiting on, you know, all these reports to be finalized.

NARDOTTI: Senator, I would just say that there was a lot of emphasis on the past leadership because of something I said earlier, the assumption that nothing could be done about the past leadership. And it was our very strong opinion that something needed to be said about what we concluded about past leaders. Not much really needs to be said about the current leadership because they're still in place and action can be taken.

So, there was nothing that the report has said as far as saying that no action should be taken. We didn't find any, and certainly the leadership of the Department of Defense and certainly the Congress has options that can be applied against the current leadership that are simply not available with respect to the prior leadership, and they should not be omitted merely because of the passage of time.

BUNTING: Senator, my colleagues, I agree with all of them, in that the focus, of course, when we began was certainly on the problem itself and how it developed, and we were trying to get at that issue, "How in the world could this come about?" So, our focus was somewhat on the past.

Be that as it may, as we began to continue our hearings and individual comments, it was obvious that this was the overused term, "a systemic problem." And, yes, at no point did we consider anyone exempt -- current, former, future -- anyone exempt from any of our recommendations, such as they were at the time or would become. And let the chips fall where they may. If there are current problems, and as the report suggests, we think the DOD IG should have a closer look at this, then that should be done, meaning current leadership should be held accountable.

SATEL: Yes, I say the same thing. No one certainly told us how to conduct or limit...

WARNER: Can you speak up just a little bit?

SATEL: OK, sir. No one told us...

WARNER: Thank you. Now we're talking.

SATEL: All right -- that we should limit our investigation in any way.

WARNER: Would you start from the beginning again? Thank you very much.

SATEL: OK. Sure. I said in agreement with my colleagues, that we were in no way instructed to limit our investigation.

SATEL: We did find Secretary Roche responsive, but the IG of the Defense Department, and this committee as well, will have an opportunity to pursue with him whether or not, in fact, you feel he did live up to his responsibility.

CLINTON: Well, I thank the panel.

And I thank the chairman for helping to clarify that prior doesn't mean a long time ago, that there has been a continuing set of issues that I think we need to leave open with respect to both prior and present leadership.

And as the colonel rightly said, "Let the chips fall where they may," based on whatever this committee continues to investigate; and with a very strong admonition to the DOD inspector general that by no means is there any agreement on this committee that any current leadership is exempt from a thorough investigation; that the plain words of the recommendation should be taken exactly as they are presented.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON OPERATIONS AND RECONSTRUCTION IN IRAQ, 9/25/2003

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I join with my colleagues in thanking each of you for your service.

Ambassador, when you appeared before the Democratic Caucus on Tuesday, you were specifically asked whether there would be any further requests for funding, beyond the $20 billion that has been requested now.

CLINTON: Your answer was, "No, this is it." Is that still your answer?

BREWER: Yes.

What I said was we will not ask for a supplemental like this. If there is any further need, I would anticipate -- and I made this point to the Appropriations Committee yesterday -- any further requests will be done through the normal appropriations process. In other words, it will come forward as part of the regular appropriations process, the 2005 budget presumably, early next year.

CLINTON: So, in other words, what many of us heard in the caucus, which is that the $20 billion was the end of the requests with respect to financial resources, means somewhat differently today that it was to be construed as not a request for additional supplementals but there may be additional money for reconstruction and related costs that would come through the regular budget system.

BREMER: Yes, Senator.

And I'm not trying to be cute here. There are a lot of unknowns. We know there's a big gap. We know that the World Bank says there's going to be a need of $60 billion over the next four to five years. We're asking for $20 billion here.

We're hoping we'll get a substantial amount from the donors' conference, but that's an unknown.

The Iraqi government is going to have to do its own 2005 budget, which hasn't yet been started. We just finished the 2004 budget.

So there are a number of moving parts here that will have to be pinned down in the next four to five months before the administration puts together its regular 2005 budget request. But I would anticipate if we need any more money, it will come through the regular appropriations process.

CLINTON: Well, Ambassador, I join with both Senator Collins and Senator Nelson in urging the administration to look for a way that there can be some assurance to the American people that we will be in line at least to receive payments from a future Iraqi government.

And given all of the talk about the Marshall Plan, I think it is instructive that President Truman required a dollar-for-dollar match from beneficiary countries. So we would hope that you would be more open to such a possibility than we've heard thus far.

I just want to ask a few specific questions. You know, also at the Democratic Caucus, you said that 535 copies of this coalition provisional authority plan were sent to members of Congress in July. I can only speak for myself; I didn't see it until this week.

But in looking at it, with respect to the security section and the specific points that are included -- to defeat internal arm threats, undermine support for paramilitaries, deter external aggression, locate secure, eliminate WMD, eliminate munitions caches -- we need more specific information. Those are all very laudable goals. We all want to do all of those things, and we know that you are working very hard to achieve them.

But let me just try to get on the record so that I have some benchmark against which to judge this. First, how many members of the Iraqi army are there at this moment?

BREMER: The Iraqi army has one battalion, which is about 750.

CLINTON: Seven hundred and fifty.

How many troops do you plan to train for the Iraqi army in the next year?

BREMER: You won't find it in that plan because we've updated it. We plan to have 27 battalions ready by August next year.

CLINTON: And for the purpose of the record, how many people are we talking about?

BREMER: Forty thousand.

CLINTON: Forty thousand within the next year?

BREMER: That's correct, Senator.

CLINTON: OK.

Now, in May or June, I know that there were press reports that while members of Congress were visiting Iraq, a previous estimate was that you would have 7,000 trained. How have you increased that number so dramatically?

BREMER: Because, Senator, one of the things we are trying to do now is get the Iraqis more responsible more quickly for their own security. That's why you find the large number of $2 billion in the supplemental to train the army. We want to do what we were planning to do in two years, in one year.

The same is true for the police. If you looked at our planning back in June, July, we were planning to train a police force of about 75,000 to 80,000, but I was told it was going to take almost six years and I said "That's simply too long. We have to do it faster."

BREMER: So the plan now is to do it in the next 18 to 24 months. And you have another $2 billion in the supplemental to make that happen.

CLINTON: And the goal for the number of police is what?

BREMER: About 75,000 to 80,000 in the next 18 to 24 months.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON SEXUAL MISCONDUCT ALLEGATIONS AT THE AIR FORCE ACADEMY, 9/30/2003

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I apologize that other commitments required me to leave this very important hearing. I have tried to follow from a distance the questions that have been asked. And obviously I know that our panel appreciates the extraordinary and profound concern and sadness that I think all of us feel about this situation. I don't want to go over already plowed ground. But I wanted to ask a few specific questions which I don't believe have been addressed. And it is more in the terms of going forward.

We heard last week from the panel that reported to this committee that in their report, they are critical of the effective elimination of confidential reporting as called for in the agenda for change. The panel found that the agenda for change's elimination of confidential reporting -- and I quote, "creates a significant risk that victims will not come forward at all and thus lose the benefits afforded by professional counseling," to say nothing of the issues about reporting assaults and improper conduct.

In light of the panel report, Mr. Secretary and General, will you reconsider the value of confidential reporting?

ROCHE: Yes, ma'am. One of the wonderful things about that panel is we were able to have a dialogue. And they were as torn as we between privacy and confidentiality, between the fact that we were developing aspiring officers who have an obligation to tell us when there is a felon in their midst. The work that they came up with, the notion of the psychotherapist who can provide counseling and not be part of the chain of command so that we can worry about a particular cadet who has gone through trauma and deal with the trauma of that cadet and then try to bring her to the chain of command where we can then avoid the problems of the past where nothing happened. Or even if we can do such things -- one of their witnesses testified that there's not an inherent conflict if you think of it on a temporal basis. If right away you do what you have to do in terms of rape kits, et cetera, but you tell the young woman, "Look, we're not going to go forward until you're OK and you're ready. But should you choose to go forward, we don't want to be precluded in prosecution because we don't have evidence."

Ms. Fowler and I have spent hours trying to think that through. One of the things that General Jumper and I are doing is we're going to look at the suggestions there, not just for the Air Force Academy -- because if it's good enough for one of those young women, it's good enough for one of our young women at Hunsog (ph). And do it for both.

ALLARD: Would Senator Clinton yield on that?

CLINTON: Yes. Because that's really an important issue. And visiting with the chairman on the Fowler commission, she had indicated that this something that the panel, that commission really struggled with. And finally, they went to the Naval Academy. And my understanding is that this is a process that's currently followed in the Naval Academy or something very close to it where they actually have a two -- there's a turn in the road here. You can either go with a public disclosure or with a (inaudible) or the psychotherapist and the patient, doctor relationship there and keep it private if they decide to do that. And so, your response to her question is that yes, you think that's a possible credible solution?

ROCHE: We want to work at that, Senator. And we think there is a way to do it. But we don't want to do it just for the Air Force Academy. We want to do it for the whole Air Force.

ALLARD: Senator, that's a very important question that Senator Clinton brought up. And thank you for letting me interrupt you on that.

CLINTON: No, I'm...

WARNER: Your time will not be docked for the colloquy.

CLINTON: thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I appreciate my colleague, Senator Allard's intervention there because no one has worked harder on this issue. And I think in addition to Annapolis, I believe West Point has a similar approach. So I think, though, that it is important that the agenda for change be changed in light of the panel's findings and further consultation with experts.

I think it's also important to look at the agenda for change with respect to the panel's conclusion that it did not address the need for permanent, consistent oversight by Air Force headquarters leadership as well as external oversight by the academy's board of visitors. In fact, I think Chairman Fowler made a very telling point when she said that often times the board of visitors didn't attend meetings, they weren't involved, it did not have either the prestige or the participation that one would expect.

So have you done any self-examination about what better oversight and leadership can be provided by both headquarters and the board of visitors?

ROCHE: Yes, ma'am. Already we have in place a mechanism to provide the oversight of the academy that has a senior level group which consists of the vice chief of staff of the Air Force, uniform side, the assistant secretary of the Air Force for manpower to represent me, the general counsel and the superintendent. There is a working group below that. We put a one year sunset clause on it in order to get everybody to get everything done from these panels in one year. But it's our intention -- and the Fowler report recommends, commends us for this and recommends that we institutionalize and make it a permanent. And we will do so so that we don't have a situation that Senator Collins raised earlier of things coming up that never come up to senior level attention.

CLINTON: And finally, as you know, Secretary Roche, I have been discussing with you the importance of mentors and role models in setting acceptable standards of conduct for cadets. And in their report, the panel includes several recommendations for better training of cadets. It recommends that the staff and faculty place a renewed emphasis on education, on character education, on the encouragement of responsible consumption of alcohol by cadets. And that overall the panel found that the agenda for change did not go far enough to institute enduring, permanent changes in culture and gender climate at the academy. Now I assume you also agree that the agenda for change has not gone far enough in that direction.

ROCHE: It was a bet that Jumper and Roche could do in 90 days. We were very willing to have it expanded, to be challenged. And, in fact, the cadets have given us some good ideas. And we will follow up with each of those items because we think there is more to do.

We have some good news finally. The air officers commanding this time that the academy picked, they picked the best, and the system provided them instead of giving them 50 reasons why it can't happen. We are sending people off to school.

One cadet suggested we were not teaching the uniform code of military justice early enough to cadets. We now have changed that. And early on when they get there in this fall semester, we'll be doing a lot of education about the uniform code of military justice.

Through all of this, Senator, an interesting point to the chairman about joy is that the cadets are now feeling a heck of a lot better about themselves and the place, and they're actually starting to have some fun because they know what the boundaries are, they know how serious we are. And they're making the point that the morale has improved dramatically this year as compared to this point last year.

JUMPER: Senator, if I might pile on, let me just say once again that there's no belief on the part of this set of leaders that this is a short-term problem with a short-term solution. So that the character and the integrity issues, the honor code issues have to be dealt with over a period of time. This is going to be a subject of intense education, of engagement by our own four star level officers with the cadets personally. We've already begun that, and it's going to take a while.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, I know my time is expired. I think it might also...

WARNER: Senator, if you want to take another minute or two, please do.

CLINTON: Well, I think it might also be useful -- and I've spoken to the secretary about this and will certainly try to provide some names of people who could be helpful. But I think it would be useful to invite some outsiders perhaps to address the cadets on some of these issues. And I would particularly recommend some women leaders. You know, I think of my colleagues, Senator Collins, Senator Dole, Senator Hutchison, others, Senator Landrieu, people who have served on this committee, people who have insight into the code and the standards of the military. I really, having now immersed myself in the information and particularly the impressive work of the panel that we heard, there's a real disconnect on the part of many of these young men between the profession and the service that they are pledging their lives to and the expectations that the leadership of that service has, but even more, the expectations of the leadership of their country and the broader citizenry has.

I think it might be useful to have some real airing sessions. Perhaps if she hasn't, Chairwoman Fowler and others -- I really do think that these young men, to be very blunt about this, need to see some women in leadership positions and need to have the give and take and need to hear from women of stature and position that times have changed and that to be a leader today means more perhaps than it did in the past in terms of sensitivity. And it is troubling to me to think that among the many efforts that young men and women in the Air Force have undertaken in the last two years to free women in Afghanistan and free women in Iraq and then to hear about attitudes of young men at the Air Force Academy that are very reminiscent, frankly, of those attitudes that were part of the Taliban's approach, part of the reaction toward women going to school, being part of leadership. So I think that perhaps some kind of a speaker session, some kind of an effort to really present the cadets with the leadership examples and to challenge them and to challenge the ideas that they may have either brought with them or acquired would be a start to this process.

ROCHE: Senator, we agree. And, in fact, we are organizing (ph) some things. There's a little bit of good news. About three weeks ago for the first time in the history of the Air Force, we awarded four distinguished flying crosses for heroism in battle to women aviators. First time. Now when they go to the academy, no male, no male can look down on them.

Secondly we began training pilots, women pilots in 1978. The first class of graduate women was 1980. That class and the two, '78, '79, '80 are just now coming up through general officer ranks. They're not going to be specialists. They're going to be honest to goodness pilots, navigators, et cetera, who will be the right kind of role model. I think we are only one generation away from a commandant who is a woman, general, pilot, warrant officer and not long thereafter a point where we will have a woman superintendent.

ROCHE: But there are increasing role models. And we have found that the academy brings in the wrong kinds of people. In a management course, for instance, Senator, instead of bringing in successful Air Force officers who were graduates, they bring in successful businessmen who left after five years and went out and made a lot of money. Well, we found that out and we said, well, that's silly. There are a whole bunch of terrific officers who are serving on active duty. Why don't you bring them in? Or bring some retired officers in. Not bring business people who left right away. So we are working on that.

CLINTON: Bring some women in.

U.S. SENATOR JUDD GREGG (R-NH) HOLDS JOINT HEARING ON NIH REAUTHORIZATION, 10/2/2003

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I welcome all of our House colleagues to the Senate and our witnesses.

I appreciate very much the opportunity to have this joint hearing. I think this is a very good example of the kind of cooperation that we actually need more of. And so, I appreciate this effort here.

And to the witnesses, I thank all of them for their years of work in their various capacities, and I'm delighted to see my constituent and friend, Dr. Varmus, here today.

I wanted to ask about comparative effectiveness. I know that in the past the NIH has funded some studies, such as evaluating the comparative effectiveness with respect to some of the high blood pressure and other issues. I know that last December the National Heart, Lung and Blood Institute published a study correcting the assumption that newer drugs, such as the calcium channel blockers and the ACE inhibitors, which cost 30 to 40 times more than diuretics, which had been the long-term treatment for high blood pressure, that, in fact, the newer treatments were less effective than the old-fashioned diuretics.

Then, in January of 2003, another NIH-sponsored study compared two glaucoma drugs and found that despite the fact that one of them, latanoprost, was more popular, another, bimatoprost, was more effective.

Now, this is the kind of information that patients and clinicians desperately need, and it's also important because oftentimes the new therapy is not more effective but much more expensive. So this has cost implications as well. Yet these types of comparative, head-to-head studies are too few and far between.

Why has NIH not been able to provide more research in this area, which I think really falls within the definition of the work that should be done by the NIH? It's not cutting-edge research, but it is extremely important to actual medical care. And what would you recommend that we could do to improve comparative research?

Dr. Zerhouni? Dr. Varmus?

ZERHOUNI: This is a very good question because, as you know, drugs are approved relative to a placebo. And when they come into practice, they are not really compared to placebos. They're compared to other drugs.

Doing clinical trials of this nature is extremely expensive. The entire budget of NIH wouldn't suffice to address all the questions. It is very, very expensive unless you have an infrastructure that's designed for that. That's actually one of the goals of the roadmap, to have an informatics infrastructure that links patients and understands what prescriptions have been prescribed so that we can detect trends very quickly.

Let me give you two examples. One is the women's health initiative. I think if the country had had a system like this, we would have discovered much sooner and we wouldn't have had to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on the women's health initiative that the dogma that long-term hormone therapy was good was incorrect.

When we make selections, and you've mentioned NIH studies of comparative effectiveness, we have to look at the public health impact. In the case of high blood pressure, it is such a public health issue, we have to invest. When you look at glaucoma, it is such a major rising cause of loss of vision, we have to invest.

So again, we want to do research of that nature if we have the means and it doesn't imbalance the need for us to advance on the fundamental level, but we have to realize that we have limits, and our limit is set when we see that millions of people are affected and our public health estimates indicate a need for that study.

The closing statement I would like to make for you is, we decided to do the women's health initiative against much opposition at the time. Because as public health experts, if only a thousand people take a drug and there's a 1 percent complication, it affects 10 people. But when 10 million people take the drug, then it's a million people. So for us, obviously, as a drug or as a pattern of factors affects more and more people, effectiveness studies become more important.

CLINTON: Dr. Varmus?

VARMUS: I'll make just a few additional comments. Obviously, I agree with what Dr. Zerhouni said.

In many clinical trials, of course there are comparisons between the standard of care and a new therapy.

VARMUS: But there may be multiple standard therapies and getting the comparisons of the sort you alluded to may not always be possible because of the high cost of doing clinical trials. The NIH is sometimes in a better position than the pharmaceutical industry from a certain point of view to do the kinds of advanced trials that you're alluding to because the drug industry has very little incentive to do studies of drugs that have already been approved. And therefore, this is a particularly attractive role for the NIH. Nevertheless, so-called phase four studies, advocacy studies of approved drugs, are expensive. They require large cohorts of patients.

We have a difficulty in this country in that not enough of our care is administered in the context of a clinical trial. In the case of adult cancer, for example, progress has not been as fast as you and I would have liked because only about three percent of the adult cancer population is in a clinical trial in contrast to what's happened in pediatric cancer.

So it's important that we mobilize the resources of NIH and patient populations and community physicians as the roadmap plan does to try to include -- to build an infrastructure that will allow the trials to occur with less expense because there are existing mechanisms for doing the trials. And in that way the roadmap plan could lead to more studies of the kind that you're suggesting.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE (R-OK) HOLDS MARKUP ON LEAVITT NOMINATION, 10/15/2003

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, could we have a recorded vote?

INHOFE: Yes, let's have a recorded vote, and I would ask at this time for the clerk to call the roll on the confirmation of Mike Leavitt to be administrator of the EPA.

CLERK: Mr. Allard?

INHOFE: Aye by proxy.

CLERK: Mr. Baucus?

(UNKNOWN): Aye by proxy.

CLERK: Mr. Bond?

BOND: Aye.

CLERK: Mrs. Boxer?

Mr. Carper?

CARPER: Aye.

CLERK: Mrs. Clinton?

CLINTON: No.

CLERK: Mr. Cornyn?

CORNYN: Aye.

CLERK: Mr. Crapo?

CRAPO: Aye.

CLERK: Mr. Graham?

GRAHAM: Aye.

CLERK: Mr. Jeffords?

JEFFORDS: Aye.

CLERK: Mr. Lieberman?

(UNKNOWN): No by proxy.

CLERK: Ms. Murkowski?

MURKOWSKI: Aye.

CLERK: Mr. Reid?

REID: Aye.

CLERK: Mr. Thomas?

THOMAS: Aye.

CLERK: Mr. Voinovich?

VOINOVICH: Aye.

CLERK: Mr. Warner?

INHOFE: Aye by proxy.

CLERK: Mr. Wyden?

(UNKNOWN): Aye by proxy.

CLERK: Mr. Inhofe?

INHOFE: Aye.

CLERK: (OFF-MIKE)

INHOFE: The chairman would declare that we are moving this nomination to the floor and that the passage of the nomination is taking place in the committee.

Senator Graham?

GRAHAM: Mr. Chairman, I'd like to make a statement...

INHOFE: Well, we are going to take them in the order that we have. Senator Clinton would be the next one in order, if that's all right.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, I would yield to my colleague, Senator Graham. We're so happy to have him back. I would like the benefit of having him speak.

INHOFE: Would you like to change positions then?

CLINTON: No, we're both not running for president. So I thought I would just let him go ahead.

(LAUGHTER)

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman?

INHOFE: Yes?

(UNKNOWN): Before Senator Graham begins, I do have to leave. May I submit my statement for the record?

INHOFE: You certainly may.

Would you like to defer to Senator Crapo?

(UNKNOWN): I don't mean to make a statement, I just mean to submit it before I leave.

INHOFE: All right, it will be a part of the record at this point in the record.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you very much.

INHOFE: Mr. Graham? And welcome back again.

GRAHAM: Well, thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Because of other employments that I have recently had, I have not had an opportunity to personally meet or discuss in the committee the views of Governor Leavitt, and I look forward to doing so before the time that the Senate votes on his confirmation.

But my standards for a judgment on the confirmation of a presidential nominee are, first, to give a presumption of confirmation to the president's recommendation, especially when the individual will serve essentially at the pleasure of the president. This is a person that the president is comfortable and supportive with; I give a presumption to his judgment.

Second, I also recognize the reality that environmental policy in this administration is not being set at EPA or the Department of Interior, but rather at the White House. And therefore the standards for the nominee is how effective he or she can be in dealing with the White House in terms of developing appropriate public interest policy.

I have worked with Governor Leavitt on the issue of the extending state sales tax to distant sales such as Internet sales. This is a position that his position is not one which has been consistent with the administration's, but I have seen him work effectively with the administration to try to shape a policy that would be both appropriate for the states and one that would be acceptable to the other interests involved.

I admire the contribution that he has made in this area and hope that that is illustrative of the kind of consensus building that he will bring to the EPA.

Therefore, for that reason, I voted in favor of this committee's recommendation of his confirmation. I withhold a judgment as to how I will vote on the floor based on my anticipated early meeting with Governor Leavitt in which I'll have a further opportunity to discuss specific environmental policies and how he would intend to try to move the administration towards a more public interest in policy than I think they have pursued in the past.

INHOFE: Thank you, Senator Graham.

Senator Cornyn?

CORNYN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

First, I want to just express my gratitude to the committee for voting out the nomination of Governor Leavitt for administrator of the EPA. I think, unfortunately, that the delay in the vote was really not a disagreement about his qualifications, as I think we all recognize, but instead was used as a platform for other purposes.

But I believe the delay in the confirmation was not good for the environment and I'm glad the committee has seen fit now to vote out his nomination, and it will go to the floor.

I also want to commend the chairman for moving S. 1066, a bill that I introduced with Senator Hutchison that makes necessary technical correction to designate the Matagorda Dunes home subdivision as an undeveloped coastal barrier.

The John H. Chafee Coastal Barrier Resources System was put in place in 1982 to discourage development on certain coastal barrier islands and shorelines by restricting eligibility for federal assistance such as wind and flood insurance. Home sites and subdivisions that had already been developed, however, were exempted from the system's protected zones.

The Matagorda Dunes subdivision was platted and the necessary electrical service and water supply infrastructure installed between 1976 and 1979. This development prior to 1982 exempts this section from the T07 unit of the Chafee Coastal Barrier Resources System but an admitted mapping mistake by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service accidentally included the subdivision in their maps of Unit T07 back in 1982. This error only came to light in 2002 when the subdivision's homeowners were notified that they could no longer purchase flood or wind insurance.

U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service has now conceded that the maps were wrong, but a legislative correction was necessary at this stage because the maps were made permanent 180 days after enactment of the system. Senate Bill 1066 will correct this error and remove the Matagorda Dune subdivision from Unit T07 of the Chafee Coastal Barrier Resources System.

I want to thank, again, Chairman Inhofe, Senator Jeffords and Senator Crapo for their work and willingness to move this important legislation, and I'll yield back the remainder of my time.

INHOFE: Thank you, Senator Cornyn.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And, Mr. Chairman, I want to associate myself with Senator Graham's remarks about how it appears that environmental policy in this administration is set at the White House, not at the Environmental Protection Agency, which is one of the underlying concerns that I and others have about any nomination to this important position.

I have a very high personal regard for Governor Leavitt. I have known the governor and his wife Jackie for a number of years. I've communicated that high regard to him privately and I want to say it very clearly here publicly.

But I think any fair reading of this administration's environmental policies demonstrates that at the very least, they are controversial, and from my perspective, they are damaging to our long-term environmental and health perspective.

So I thought that the governor had a high standard to meet in terms of providing information to this committee about his policy views and the direction that he would take the EPA.

So I listened very carefully to his testimony before this committee, I reviewed the answers that Governor Leavitt provided to me after the hearing, and like my colleagues on this side, I thought that the governor did not adequately respond to some of those questions.

I'm well aware that, again, the White House drives this process, so I assume that it is the White House that is not responding adequately to these questions.

We resubmitted a number of questions we thought needed more expansive answers, and the governor did provide additional responses. Some of my colleagues felt satisfied with that additional information. I did not.

Therefore, I did vote no today, because I continue to believe that we need more information about the direction that Governor Leavitt would lead this important agency.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, I continue to seek answers and actions with respect to the EPA and White House's response to the air quality issues following the 9/11 attacks. As we know, the EPA inspector general, in an independent report, raised a number of serious problems with the EPA's response and pinpointed, once again, the disturbing trend of the White House interfering with science and expertise for their own purposes.

The IG found that the White House had modified several EPA releases about air quality in lower Manhattan in a way to make them more reassuring than was warranted by the data available at the time. And I want to thank Senator Jeffords for continuing to focus on this important issue.

We did receive some additional information from the EPA that included some of the communications that occurred between the EPA and the White House Council on Environmental Quality, including reports of shouting matches between CEQ personnel and EPA personnel in which, apparently, the White House personnel ordered the EPA personnel in quite heated exchanges to change press releases that had been agreed upon to reflect the best thinking at the time of the experts at the EPA.

In addition, the IG found several gaps in the testing information collected by the EPA regarding indoor air quality. That continues to be a great concern of many of my constituents.

And, you know, Mr. Chairman, what I try to do in this position of trust that I am honored to hold as the senator from New York is to put myself in the position of a senator from any other state, faced with the same set of circumstances. I agree with the administration when I can, and I disagree when I must.

But when it comes to basic issues of health and safety, I don't believe any other senator representing any other state in similar circumstances would do anything other than what I am doing, which is to seek answers and actions to respond to these legitimate concerns that have been raised.

I'm hopeful that during the course of discussions that we are involved in now with the White House and the Council on Environmental Quality that we will be able to resolve these matters. I'm not interested in any kind of political statement. I'm not interested in a hold for the sake of a hold. I'm not interested in this nomination in taking on everything that I disagree with in the environmental record of the administration. But I am committed to receiving the response that I think any senator would expect from the White House under these circumstances.

I believe it's imperative that we resolve this issue to restore people's confidence in their government and to assure New Yorkers that the risks they face from indoor air contamination have been properly addressed, but until I receive a satisfactory commitment from the White House, I will continue my hold on Governor Leavitt.

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE TED STRICKLAND (D-OH) HOLDS NEWS CONFERENCE ON VETERANS' HEALTH CARE, 10/22/2003

CLINTON: Well, I want to thank my colleagues for their years of leadership on these issues. Everyone who has spoken is someone who has been committed to providing adequate support for our troops and for our veterans going back through many presidencies and, indeed, through all kinds of challenges and crises.

But we're here today because we seem to have a disconnect between our historical support for our troops and our veterans and the policies of this administration and it's very troubling.

I think you could sense some of the emotion in the remarks of each of my colleagues that we are facing an administration that, even in the face of overwhelming bipartisan support to remedy some of these difficulties, says no, and sends out threats that they will veto or disapprove the kind of efforts that we are trying to succeed in implementing.

Now it's absolutely clear from my travels around New York, just as all of my colleagues in their own states, that the issue about health care for our reserves and the members of our National Guard is at the top of the list.

That's why I was pleased to be an original sponsor, along with my colleagues on both sides of the aisle, to make it possible to provide options for Guard and Reserve members and their families.

That's the TRICARE amendment that we are referring to. And it would allow these brave men and women to have a chance to buy health insurance, either through TRICARE or to keep another policy if they had it.

And we call upon the president to strongly support this. It is not too much to ask. It is, in fact, the right thing to do.

CLINTON: At the same time that we are acting to improve the health care coverage for our National Guard and Reserves, it's important that we adequately provide health care to our active duty troops.

And as Senator Leahy referenced, there have been several disturbing news reports over the treatment of soldiers returning home from Iraq. Active duty, National Guard, Reserves, it didn't matter when they were in the line of fire outside of Baghdad; when they came back they were injured they deserved the same kind of medical care that we have provided historically to anyone who was the victim of conflict.

Unfortunately, these press reports indicate that hundreds -- hundreds of sick and wounded soldiers are waiting in hot cement barracks sometimes for months until they can see their doctors.

Our soldiers deserve better and I anxiously await the report from Senator Leahy's staff and today I'm sending a letter, as a member of the Armed Services Committee, to Senators Warner and Levin, as well as Chambliss and Nelson, to call for hearings on the adequacy of the health care being provided to our troops in Fort Stewart and elsewhere.

This is a very disturbing series of reports for a number of reasons. But one of which is that, during the Clinton administration I chaired an effort to get attention to the physical and mental health problems of our returning Gulf War veterans. And we finally created a commission and we made some real steps forward in providing ongoing treatment to many of those soldiers who went to the Gulf healthy and came back with undiagnosed and difficult problems that did not for a long time get adequate medical care.

I cannot believe that we are hearing the same kinds of stories now. Where we have young men and women who went to Iraq healthy and now are suffering from not only the results of conflict but from other kinds of diseases and symptoms that are not being given adequate attention.

In a number of hearings leading up to this engagement I asked specific questions of the Pentagon, "Are we prepared to take care of our returning active duty soldiers?"

And it fits in perfectly with Senator Mikulski's amendment. These young men and women are about to become veterans.

CLINTON: Some of them will not be able to continue active-duty service because of their injuries and whatever other physical and mental conditions they have developed. They will go into the VA system.

So on the one hand, we're not providing adequate care for our active duty, our National Guard and Reserves, and on the other hand, we are cutting the budgets for the VA system.

It's perfect storm. It does reflect well on the quality of care that should be forthcoming or on the values of this country.

So we join in trying to send a message to this administration that it is time for them to back down and be concerned about the people that they are sending into harm's way.

And it is especially troubling when you pick up the paper and you read a leaked memo -- or maybe not leaked, maybe provided to the press by the secretary of defense -- wondering whether we're doing the best job we can do in fighting the war on terrorism.

I mean, this administration is fighting a war within itself. It should not take out its internal struggles against those who are actually fighting the real war in Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere.

STRICKLAND: Well, I'm happy to be here with my Senate friends and colleagues.

The record of this administration in terms of treatment of veterans is scandalous and it is hypocritical.

At a time when the president was preparing to send our young soldiers and some of the middle-aged soldiers into war, he sent us a budget. And in that budget he asked that we have a $250 annual enrollment fee imposed on priority seven and eight veterans.

He asked that there be an increase in the prescription drug costs, from $7 a prescription -- which had just been recently increased from $2 a prescription -- from $7 to $15 a prescription.

The secretary decided that we would create a priority eight group of veterans. And because they were considered higher income, they would no longer even be able to enroll in the VA health care system. These persons could be combat-decorated veterans and excluded from the VA health care system.

And in my distressed district in Ohio, you could make as little as $25,000 a year and be considered higher income under this provision and be deprived of VA health care.

What's happening to us?

During the House of Representatives budget considerations earlier in the year, we promised veterans that we would increase the budget by $3.2 billion. However, we fell $1.8 billion short of meeting that commitment and that goal.

STRICKLAND: Today we have veterans who are doing without and going without. It is a shame.

Talk is cheap and we hear a lot of it in this capital. But health care costs money. And we ought to be ashamed of ourselves, in my judgment, as a government, that we would treat our veterans in such a shabby manner. Our veterans deserve more.

And I am pleased that just yesterday in the House of Representatives we passed a motion to instruct the conferees on the emergency supplemental bill. We have asked to concur with Senator Mikulski's amendment -- the Senate amendment -- to add an additional $1.3 billion to this budget. It passed the House by a vote of 277 to 139; a large step forward in trying to meet this critical need.

Now, we'll have to wait and see what happens. It was a strong vote in the House of Representatives and I think that ought to obligate those who are representing us in the conference to support the will of the House, to confer with this amendment passed in the Senate.

And that brings me to the word I used earlier: hypocrisy. Because it is important that we do what we say we believe and do what we say we're going to do. And I believe the veterans in this country and their families, their loved ones and all fair-minded Americans believe that we've got an obligation and we're not meeting it and shame on us, if we don't.

Thank you.

DASCHLE: I thank my colleagues. I thank Congressman Strickland for joining us.

And we'll take a few questions, if you have any.

QUESTION: Senator Graham had mentioned that he (OFF-MIKE) issue, there was a compromise proposed last week. Is that an acceptable solution to the problem, in terms of phasing in that coverage?

DASCHLE: Well, I would think that it's yet another down payment to the long-term goal of providing full concurrent receipt to all veterans.

I personally could accept it. I haven't had the opportunity to vet it with our caucus. But I think those who are 50 percent disabled and more certainly deserve priority.

As I say, that doesn't solve the problem, but it, again, addresses part of the problem, and if we keep building on it, ultimately we'll succeed. We'll take this, put it in the bank and continue to advocate until we have completed our work on concurrent receipt.

LEAHY: You know, an easy way -- still, the easy way is what we did in the appropriations bill when it went through. I mean, that's something that you have Republicans, Democrats, we all worked together on.

For the life of me, I can't understand why the administration threatens to veto the bill for the military and reconstruction in Iraq over helping those who are called up to fight the war. And I'm hoping that the Appropriations Committee will show independence and stick with that.

QUESTION: Senator Daschle, I was wondering how much bearing you think that the donors conference -- the results of the donors conference this week will have on the loan provision in conference in the supplemental. A lot of Republicans say they believe that it's all but dead, including Republicans who supported the loan provision. I was wondering if you agree with that.

DASCHLE: Well, I still believe that the strongest message we could send to donors is that we're prepared to forgive, but we also expect some degree of responsibility from Iraq themselves. That's all we're saying with this.

And we're setting the example. We're providing a good deal of the money in grant. If they forgive, we'd be prepared, I'm sure, to forgive. And that is the message that I think we ought to take to the donors conference.

I think a larger question about the donors conference is how much of a commitment from the international community can we expect. And if we aren't going to be able to achieve the goals that have been enunciated by this administration, why are we not doing a better job of convincing our international partners to be participants of greater consequence in Iraq today?

That ought to be the essence of our effort. And, frankly, I'll be disappointed and I think the American people will be disappointed if, as a result of that donors conference, the realization becomes all the more clear that the lion's share of the responsibility for Iraq will continue to be on the shoulders of American taxpayers.

CLINTON: That's especially hard to justify when there's no give on these other issues for veterans and other pressing needs.

You know, I think each one of us has a difficult time going home and telling our constituents -- I spent Monday testifying about the closure of a VA hospital in Canandaigua, New York, and yesterday, by satellite, about another closure in Montrose, near where I live, and it's very difficult to say, "Well, we just voted $87 billion, including $20 billion to build hospitals and schools and infrastructure in Iraq, and we can't find the money to keep VA hospitals open for our aging veteran population and the new veterans that we're making every day in Iraq."

It just doesn't add up. And I just, for the life of me, don't understand the administration's position on this, especially given their refusal to take care of home front needs, like the ones we're talking about today.

MIKULSKI: I think the administration needs to be more aggressive and more flexible in terms of international burden sharing. I think we have to be aggressive in really asking the world to support this effort to rebuild Iraq. And they can do it in three ways: They can send more people to help our troops, they can send cash to help with the construction, or they can forgive the debt that Saddam Hussein rolled up with them.

MIKULSKI: So there are three things they can do.

But they're also going to want something from the United States of America. If they're going to have international burden sharing, then they want to be able to have a role in terms of moving Iraq to a democratic society.

So we need vigor and we need flexibility. But quite frankly, they're very tepid in terms of pushing the international community. I want them to push the international community with the same effort that they pushed us to war.

GRAHAM: One additional perverse consequence of the United States supplying its reconstruction totally by grants, is that we are going to make every other creditor of Iraq that much more secure.

Many countries had essentially written-off their loans to Iraq as being non-collectible. If we go in and repair the bridges and the roads, the schools at our total expense, without any likelihood of reimbursement, we're making everybody else's debt that much stronger.

Some of the countries, specifically one of the countries, conducted itself in a manner before September the 11th, 2001, and I think after September the 11th, 2001, in a way that merits the United States condemnation, not its giving greater solidity to the loans that it has made to Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

I think that's an outrage. And I hope that the conferees understand the feeling of the American people and will not follow the administration's demand that they remove this loan provision, even in the face of a threat of a veto.

Isn't it ironic that the administration says it's critical now that we support the troops, but if supporting the troops also means that we do not give benefits to countries that were our enemies in the war on terror, that's a higher priority?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

DASCHLE: We'll take a look at what the final conference report presents itself to be. I think it'd be unlikely that we would oppose it. I think it's important for us to do all that we can to try to maintain what we have fought for all the way through this process: some degree of responsibility on the part of Iraq and a commitment from this administration to remember the home front.

DASCHLE: If we can do that, we will be much more supportive. But if we fail to do that, we'll take that fight to other bills as they present themselves in the Senate.

QUESTION: This Rumsfeld memo refers to a long, hard slog ahead in Iraq and Afghanistan. Besides probably needing some more veterans, what kind of implications do you draw from that memo?

DASCHLE: Well, I think Secretary Rumsfeld's comments are an illustration of the concern that they have about the failure of their policies in Iraq so far. There can be no other description of those words than that. They acknowledge that they have not succeeded to date.

I think what we all need, though, is a good yardstick, a measure by which we can judge progress and ultimately our success.

If we don't establish that yardstick -- and I think it ought to be one that people in Congress and the administration can agree to, so that we know just how we are progressing, we know when we have achieved success. We don't have that today.

Thanks, everybody.

"The Early Show," CBS, 11/16/2003

This coming Saturday marks the 40th anniversary of the assassination of John F. Kennedy. And even after all this time, millions of Americans remember exactly where they were when they heard the news. That's tonight's Sunday Cover--four Americans on how that day in Dallas changed their lives and the nation.

DAN RATHER (Anchor, "CBS Evening News"): I was in Dallas November 22nd and was supervising the plans for what we all thought would be a reasonably routine day.

Unidentified Man: (From file footage) Friday morning, 11:37.

ROBERTS: On that day 40 years ago, President Kennedy and his wife, Jacqueline, were on a political trip to Texas, first to Ft. Worth, then to Dallas. On that day, other Americans were going about their normal lives.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): I was in geometry class.

ROBERTS: One, a high-school girl who would go on to become a first lady, then a senator, was living outside Chicago.

Sen. CLINTON: Living in a very Republican community with my very Republican father. So I found myself on the other side of the political divide back then.

Mr. ROOSEVELT GRIER: I was out early, practicing.

ROBERTS: Another was already a household name, a defensive lineman for the Los Angeles Rams who admired the president who'd reached out to a civil rights leader.

Mr. GRIER: I said, 'Wow, if he called Martin Luther King, that means that he's aware of the situation that blacks are going through.'

Former Mayor RUDOLPH GIULIANI (Republican, New York): I was in Manhattan College.

ROBERTS: A third was a young college student already thinking about his future.

Mr. GIULIANI: Probably what he did was he put into my mind the desire to be involved in government.

ROBERTS: And then, in one moment that brought a nation to a standstill, Kennedy was shot.

Unidentified Man: (From file footage) Something, I repeat, has happened in the motorcade route.

ROBERTS: Who had done it? Why? Would Kennedy live? Dan Rather was one of the first to get through to Parkland Hospital.

RATHER: We had--a doctor tells me he's dead, a priest tells me he's dead, and someone high up at the hospital has told not me but our local station news director, 'He's dead. I think what we've got here is a dead man.'

WALTER CRONKITE (Anchor, "CBS Evening News"): (From vintage footage) We just a report from our correspondent, Dan Rather, in Dallas that he has confirmed that President Kennedy is dead.

ROBERTS: CBS was the first to report the news before the official confirmation. Rather was out on a limb for 10 agonizing minutes.

CRONKITE: (From vintage footage) From Dallas, Texas, the flash, apparently official: President Kennedy died at 1 PM Central Standard Time, 2:00 Eastern Standard Time, some...

Sen. CLINTON: We were all just stunned. Usually when teen-agers go into an auditorium or a field house, it's filled with noise and jostling and pushing and jokes. It was just totally quiet.

Mr. GIULIANI: Couldn't leave the car. I just sat there, I think, for--for about two hours. I just left the radio on with the car but not moving 'cause we didn't know where to go.

ROBERTS: Rosie Grier got the news from his coach.

Mr. GRIER: I mean, how could someone come in your house and kill a member of your family? We had been broken into as a country.

RATHER: As a journalist, I felt that immediately. Remember, it was just like a huge undertow, a whoof, down-pull of your head and heart, but then instantly behind that, you say, 'I can't think about that.'

ROBERTS: Businesses locked up. Schools closed. The daily routine of life interrupted. The assassin, Lee Harvey Oswald, was arrested. Then on the third day, Oswald was himself assassinated. And in what is still a controversial decision, the National Football League decided the game should go on.

Mr. GRIER: I don't know re--if we'd won or if we'd lost. There was no heartfelt in the game.

ROBERTS: For four days, the country was in shock, glued to the television, struggling to comprehend what had happened.

Mr. GIULIANI: The first time I can remember crying publicly, except maybe as a very little boy, was when John Kennedy died, particularly watching his son. I mean, his--that image is still--up until September 11th, that image was very much a part of my life growing up. And then on September 11th after that, to see little boys and girls standing there, looking at their daddy's coffin...

RATHER: The nation knew instantly that whatever had happened, we were being tested and that the nation's strength to get through the terrible time, it would depend on our unity.

ROBERTS: It would not be for decades, until September 11th, 2001 that the nation and a new generation would be tested in much the same way.

Sen. CLINTON: In both instances, we face a choice as a nation. We can either go inward, become fatalistic, fearful, feel as though America's best days are behind us, or we can summon our resolve and our resilience to go forward.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON ARMY ISSUES, 11/19/2003

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you for holding this hearing.

As you know, after the recent reports from Fort Stewart as well as reports about body armor, and then the survey that appeared in Stars and Stripes about the condition of morale, I and others asked that you do this and I appreciate it very much.

WARNER: Senator, you were among the first that came to me and suggested that we move swiftly on this.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WARNER: I thank you for your participation.

CLINTON: Well, I could not agree more with our witnesses who have described this as a test of will that we cannot lose. And I also wholly endorse the description of our men and women in uniform as indispensable and performing selfless service.

I want to focus for a minute about the disconnect that I think sometimes seems to appear between what I know is our commitment to our soldiers and some of the statements and proposed policies that come out of DOD, particularly out of the office of the secretary.

You know, this issue about schools is one that I take very seriously because we have an all-volunteer force and one that I think deserves all of our support, and their families are also volunteers and they, too, deserve the support of a grateful nation.

In addition to the threatened school closings which were announced out of the blue as a possible action, we recently heard about some potential commissary closings abroad and at home.

I recently received a copy of a memorandum from General B.B. Bell, as you referred to him General Schoomaker, the commanding general of the U.S. Army, Europe and the 7th Army raising very strong objections to the proposed commissary closures in Germany.

And in addition to the specifics that he addressed with respect to transportation difficulties, weather difficulties and the like, he said: "The war is very, very real to our European-based families. I believe we owe it to our soldiers to provide compassionate care and service to their families while the soldiers are deployed in harm's way. Seeking relatively minor fiscal efficiencies through reduced services and loss of benefits in this overseas environment during a war erodes the commitment we have made to the total force."

And I could not endorse that more strongly and I'd ask unanimous consent that this memo from General Bell be included in the record.

WARNER: Without objection.

CLINTON: In this memo, he specifically talks about Germany, but apparently the proposal goes much further.

I know, for example, in my own state, they're talking about closing a commissary in Scotia, New York, closing the school at West Point. For the life of me, I do not understand this.

And I don't believe it's coming from the professional military. I believe it is coming from, you know, the planners and policymakers in the department and particularly again, in the office of the secretary.

So I would hope, both Secretary Brownlee and General Schoomaker, that you would make the strongest possible objections on behalf of these ill-advised proposals.

I recently did a call with one of the teachers from the West Point school and learned that General Lennox, now the superintendent, made very clear that this is a recruiting and retention device for, again, our all-volunteer service.

So these potential closings are of concern to me as the senator from New York, but far beyond that, as a member of this committee, looking at how we're going not only to continue the end force we need -- whatever it is decided that we need -- but also to take care of the families of those who I think will be rather continuously deployed around the world in the missions that we're going to be asking them to do.

So this is a wrong message to send. It is hard to justify when we just appropriated $87 billion for the reconstruction of Iraq and the biggest defense appropriations we've ever had in the history of our country that we would be undermining the quality of life of our soldiers and their families.

So I've joined with Senators Kennedy, Leahy and Murray in writing directly to Secretary Rumsfeld, asking him to desist from taking any of these actions that would cut essential military benefits. And I would also ask unanimous consent that that letter be included in the record as well.

WARNER: Without objection.

CLINTON: And I would ask both of you, will you support these efforts to keep benefits like these available for our soldiers and their families?

Mr. Secretary?

BROWNLEE: Senator, we certainly feel the strongest sense of responsibility toward our families and we've not yet had a chance to engage on these issues. But I certainly agree with you on the importance of taking care of families. I was deployed twice in a combat theater and I can remember myself of most soldiers saying, "We'll do anything they ask as long as they take care of our families."

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Secretary.

And, General?

SCHOOMAKER: Ms. Senator, I think it's a great point. And I'd like to just read -- say again what -- I think we had this conversation in your office. You know, my father was in the Army for 32 years.

SCHOOMAKER: I grew up in the Army. I'm going on my fourth decade in the Army myself. I have a brother who is in the Army, been in the Army 25 years and happens to command a hospital down at Fort Gordon. And I have a daughter that's in her second year right now in Army ROTC, she went through jump school last August. And so I think of the Army with a big footprint. I mean, this is not something that's just academic to me.

And it goes back to the question that I think I answered earlier: What kind of volunteer Army do we have and what do we have to do to have it? And I think that the issues that you're raising here are central to having the kind of Army that we want to have. So I will tell you that not only do I support things like commissaries and medical benefits and all of these, but I support everything we need to do to incentivize the very top quality force that we can have.

I think it's absolutely important for this nation to do that and because we're going to go to war with what we have the day that the war starts and you cannot make up for that after we've got the emergency. So I'm sorry to go a little long on it, but this is more than academic as far as I'm concerned.

CLINTON: Well, and I appreciate that very much, General. That's very heartening and I know it comes from your heart and that means a lot.

And I would just add, Mr. Chairman, that I think as we move forward with many of the plans and recommendations that will be presented to us starting in the spring about further transformational ideas and the like, that we need to keep the personal in the middle of this; that the individual soldier, the individual family is not some ancillary aspect of this transformational approach.

And I sometimes worry that with some of the things that are said and some of the other moves that, frankly, were made at the highest levels to hold down growth in pay and benefits, to stand against efforts to fix the problems with charging wounded soldiers for their meals and things that just made no sense in the great scheme of things fiscally and morally, that we keep this in mind. And your words will certainly be a good beacon to lead us in that way.

I thank the general.

WARNER: Well, Senator, the letter that you made reference to and your important questions this morning underscore the role of the Congress as a co-equal branch in working with the executive branch, which is the Department of Defense.

WARNER: We have our own views. We draw on our own experience -- as in the case of Senator McCain, the military; as in the case of yourself, you're concerned about the schooling which is just as important as to whether or not, in many respects, the equipment works.

Now I'd like to take just a minute to ask a question which I think should be included in your response to the senator. Having worked in that building over five years myself, in the Navy Secretariat, someone made that decision. Did you just awaken someday and a memo came across your desk? Was the Department of the Army consulted? Were you involved in the decision process by which these reductions in the commissaries and the schooling were made?

In my day, we were very much involved in it. And when this committee eventually gets around to looking at the Goldwater-Nichols Act and revising, then I think more authority has got to be restored to the secretariats and the chiefs of staff, that's just a side bar.

A little warning, let it filter across the horizon, because I'm going to be here a lot longer, thank God, a lot of these folks over there.

We got to look at this. We got to look at this. Now, in response to the question, how was the decision made? And was the Department of the Army involved?

BROWNLEE: Senator, I will check, I don't think the decision has been made yet. I think there are people who have gone out and assessed and made recommendations at some level, but nobody has told me that a decision's been made on this.

WARNER: All right, then, General, do you have any further information?

SCHOOMAKER: I received General Bell's memo two days ago and that's what alerted me to the thing. And I agree with the secretary, I think that basically what we're in is in the throes of evaluation. I'm certainly not involved in it directly.

(CROSSTALK)

WARNER: I think maybe your letter is most timely, Senator. Do you have any -- I know you prepare very carefully for your questions. Do you have any knowledge that you could share as to how the decision was made, or is it a final decision or...

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think that it is one of those decisions that is floated out there and everybody's waiting to see whether it stays airborne or falls with a great...

WARNER: You might have...

CLINTON: ... with a great thump, and we're hoping it falls with a great thump.

WARNER: You might have punctured a little bit.

CLINTON: I hope so.

"Sunday Morning," CBS, 11/30/2003

(Footage of Clinton visiting troops)

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Especially for our civilian...

Announcer: It's SUNDAY MORNING on CBS, and here again is Charles Osgood.

CHARLES OSGOOD, host:

(Voiceover) Senator Hillary Clinton is in the middle of a personal tour of Iraq this weekend.

She's visiting with American troops and holding talks with local officials. Much as they seek and crave the spotlight, most politicians also value quiet time with good friends, and that certainly is the case with Senator Clinton, as our colleague Erin Moriarty of "48 Hours Investigates" will show us in this profile of two very good friends indeed.

(Footage of school photographs; Ebeling and Clinton)

Sen. CLINTON: (Voiceover) We've been friends since sixth grade.

I don't know what you do in a life without friends.

(Footage of school photographs; Ebeling and Moriarty)

ERIN MORIARTY reporting:

What kind of music did you all like?

Mrs. BETSY JOHNSON EBELING: (Voiceover) Beatles, of course, you know.

She liked Paul. I always liked George.

(Footage of school photographs; Ebeling and Moriarty)

MORIARTY: Why did these two become such friends? What was it in sixth grade that connected you?

Mrs. EBELING: (Voiceover) I just remember that we were drawn together.

And that from the time I started class, we were always together.

(Footage of school photographs; Ebeling and Clinton)

Mrs. EBELING: Bye, sweetheart.

(Footage of photographs; Ebeling and Moriarty)

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) You've probably never heard of Betsy Johnson Ebeling, but Betsy knows Hillary Rodham Clinton in a way few do and sees a private side of her that is rarely revealed.

When you read her described as cold or arrogant...

Mrs. EBELING: You know, none of which I can go with.

(Footage of photographs; Ebeling and Moriarty)

Mrs. EBELING: (Voiceover) I really can't. I mean, this is a woman who has a laugh that is embarrassing, you know, in a restaurant. (Laughs) And it just takes over the entire restaurant.

And a woman who, you know, is always--has me order the dessert and then she eats the dessert off my plate. I mean, this is--this is somebody who could be your next-door neighbor.

(Footage of Ebeling and Moriarty walking through neighborhood)

Mrs. EBELING: (Voiceover) This is the dining room.

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) In fact, Hillary Rodham was her neighbor when Betsy--she was Betsy Johnson then--and her family moved to Park Ridge, a suburb of Chicago.

Where's Hillary's bedroom?

Mrs. EBELING: That one right up there.

MORIARTY: Over on the left?

Mrs. EBELING: Yes.

MORIARTY: And where--where was your house?

Mrs. EBELING: My house is about six blocks that way.

(Footage of Moriarty and Eberling)

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) At times, Betsy was more than a friend; she was a necessity.

What I would understand is that would you not wear your glasses...

Sen. CLINTON: Oh gosh.

MORIARTY: ...and you relied on Betsy as your Seeing Eye person.

Sen. CLINTON: Yeah, my Seeing Eye friend. I couldn't see where I was going. And she would kind of lead me along. She'd say, 'OK, there's--Don's over there. Smile to the left,' you know.

Mrs. EBELING: ...(Unintelligible).

Sen. CLINTON: Yeah, that's right. 'Bill is standing over there, smile to the right.'

(Footage of Clinton's book; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

Sen. CLINTON: (Voiceover; reading from book) 'My friend starting in sixth grade, Betsy Johnson, led me around town like a Seeing Eye dog.'

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) Hillary described their extraordinary 45-year friendship in the early pages of her best-selling memoir "Living History," but...

I have something else. I don't know if you'll remember.

Sen. CLINTON: Oh dear.

Mrs. EBELING: I know. I ...(unintelligible).

Sen. CLINTON: She went through the attic.

MORIARTY: This was--this--yes. This is obviously not your first autobiography, as everyone thinks it is.

Sen. CLINTON: Oh.

MORIARTY: But in fact, this is.

(Footage of "This Is My Life"; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

Sen. CLINTON: (Voiceover) "This Is My Life." Absolutely.

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) Written when she and Betsy were 12.

Sen. CLINTON: I have not seen this in forever. Design, can't you tell?

Mrs. EBELING: Oh, I'm sorry. It was your artistic side?

Sen. CLINTON: My artistic side.

Mrs. EBELING: Is it wallpaper?

Sen. CLINTON: Uh-huh.

Mrs. EBELING: This is the wallpaper in your mother's bathroom.

Sen. CLINTON: It is wallpaper. Thank you very much.

Mrs. EBELING: Yes. Look at the writing.

Sen. CLINTON: This is pathetic.

MORIARTY: Those are her drawings.

Sen. CLINTON: Yes, those are my drawings.

(Footage of drawings; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

Sen. CLINTON: (Voiceover) I have--I have no artistic abilities.

I can't sing. I can't draw.

Mrs. EBELING: But look who has the biggest smile.

Sen. CLINTON: Yeah.

(Footage of "This Is My Life"; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

Sen. CLINTON: (Voiceover) "My Future," there it is.

Mrs. EBELING: (Voiceover) Look at your future. What's it say?

Sen. CLINTON: (Voiceover) Yes, indeed. 'When I grow up, I want to have had the best education I could have possibly obtained.'

Mrs. EBELING: (Voiceover) Did that.

Sen. CLINTON: (Voiceover) 'If I obtain this, I will probably be able to get a very good job.'

Mrs. EBELING: (Voiceover) You have.

Sen. CLINTON: 'I want to either be a teacher or a nuclear physics scientist.'

(Footage of "Living History"; photograph of Clinton and Ebeling; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

Sen. CLINTON: (Voiceover; reading from book) 'By the fall of 1960, my world was expanding and so were my political sensibilities.'

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) Even back then, Hillary Rodham and Betsy Johnson shared a passion for politics, although it may not be quite what you expect.

Sen. CLINTON: We were Goldwater Girls. We got our sashes and we got our cowboy hats.

Mrs. EBELING: I mean, I can remember the whole summer before the convention. There would be these stickers all over Chicago that said, 'AUH2O,' and I was fascinated. I thought, what is that, you know? And found it was Goldwater. There must have been a science class that I missed that day.

(Footage of building; Ebeling, Robert Carlson and Moriarty)

Mr. ROBERT CARLSON: There it is. Maybe that'll go in Hillary's museum someday.

MORIARTY: Oh my gosh. Citizens For Goldwater-Miller.

Mr. CARLSON: That's correct. And here she is with her address. She's gonna work that day. And here's Betsy right here.

Mr. CARLSON: Signed up right here.

MORIARTY: Hillary Rodham.

Mr. CARLSON: Right.

(Footage of Hall of Honor; Carlson)

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) It probably won't surprise anyone why her high school history teacher, Robert Carlson, remembers Hillary so clearly.

Mr. CARLSON: She wrote a term paper for me that was about 75 pages in length, with 150 note cards and 50 bibliographical cards. Now wouldn't you remember a student like that?

(Footage of school photographs; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) After high school, it was on to college. Betsy enrolled at Albion College in Michigan, Hillary at Wellesley in Massachusetts.

Sen. CLINTON: And whenever we were home for holidays or the summer, we spent a lot of time with each other. You know, it was always the first call I made as soon as I got back to Park Ridge.

MORIARTY: To Betsy.

Sen. CLINTON: To Betsy. Absolutely.

(Footage of riots outside 1968 Democratic National Convention; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) It was during one of those summers that they witnessed an event they both say changed their lives and their politics: The 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago where clashes over race and the war in Vietnam erupted.

Sen. CLINTON: It was just a defining moment, because we were both sympathetic with some of the attitudes, but we were both much more conservative in how we think people should behave and what appropriate ways there should be for dissenting and demonstrating.

Mrs. EBELING: It was that threshold for us, I think, that things are never gonna quite be the same.

(Footage of photographs; unidentified man)

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) But what did stay the same was their friendship, even after Betsy married a boy from home, their high school classmate, Tom Ebeling, and Hillary chose a boy from Hope, Bill Clinton.

Mr. TOM EBELING: When she brought this guy around and I went, 'Who this is guy? He's pretty--pretty special.'

MORIARTY: So he wasn't like one of the guys from Park Ridge?

Mr. EBELING: Oh no. No. No.

(Footage of photographs; Ebeling and Moriarty)

Mrs. EBELING: (Voiceover) When she called and said, 'I'm going to go to Arkansas and see if this is going to work,' truthfully I had to look at the map and see.

I mean, it was one of those A states. I wasn't quite sure where it was. And she was gonna go all the way down there?

(Footage of photographs; letter; photographs; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) Hillary remained in Arkansas to practice law. Betsy taught high school Spanish and, for a time, stayed home to raise her three children. When Bill became president and Hillary first lady, the Ebelings were frequent visitors to the White House. But at no time was Betsy's friendship more vital than when Hillary found out her husband had lied to her about the Lewinsky affair.

Sen. CLINTON: It was hard to get through those days, and I knew exactly what the folks on the other side expected: That at some point I would, you know, show anger or, you know, some emotional breakdown, I guess, in public, which they would then use to try to stampede people into forcing Bill to resign.

MORIARTY: So you had to fight against that.

Sen. CLINTON: Oh! Every single moment. Every single moment. It was an--an amazing confluence of events, you know.

Mrs. EBELING: It was.

Sen. CLINTON: I ju--I--I just--to this day I find it deeply regrettable. I mean, obviously I was disappointed and--and sad about my husband. And that should have been between us and that was our business.

(Footage of photographs; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) Betsy and another close friend, Diane Blair, rushed to Hillary's side and her defense.

Were you angry at the president?

Mrs. EBELING: Oh, yeah. Can you imagine that day he's sitting in the Oval Office and he looks at 'Guests in the White House' and it's Diane Blair and Betsy Ebeling? I'm sure he didn't want to come upstairs that night. Oh, but...

MORIARTY: Well, even the senator, in your book, you say that a congressman came up and said, 'If you were my sister, I would have punched Bill Clinton in the nose.' What did you want to do? Didn't you want to punch the president in the nose?

Sen. CLINTON: Hit him over the head with a frying pan probably.

Mrs. EBELING: Well, yeah. Absolutely that.

Sen. CLINTON: She and Diane stalked him around, as I remember.

Mrs. EBELING: Yeah, we did. We did.

MORIARTY: Did you ever say something to him? Did you...

Mrs. EBELING: Sure.

MORIARTY: What did you...

Sen. CLINTON: Oh...

MORIARTY: Can you share what you said?

Mrs. EBELING: I'm not gonna share that. I'm sure that won't be in his book.

MORIARTY: Did you ever--'cause you guys talk about everything--did you ever suggest to your friend to leave her husband?

Sen. CLINTON: No.

Mrs. EBELING: No.

Sen. CLINTON: No. And--and in part, I think--first of all, because Betsy and Diane knew us so well and knew him as well as me.

Mrs. EBELING: Yeah.

Sen. CLINTON: It just seemed--you know, it's--that something had to be salvageable. It could not end in this public display.

Mrs. EBELING: No, and--and--and the number-one reason was Chelsea.

(Footage of the Clintons; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

Mrs. EBELING: (Voiceover) They were not going to hurt her ever. And they found their way back to each other through her.

MORIARTY: When you hear people describe your friend's marriage as more a merger of two ambitious people, what's your reaction to that?

Mrs. EBELING: Merger. Oh. He married you for your cooking skills.

Sen. CLINTON: That's right. My artistic and cooking skills.

Mrs. EBELING: You know the--and singing skills. Singing skills. You know, I'll say it once and for all. This is it: To be in the presence of these two people is to be in the presence of two people who really love each other. These are two people who--who think alike, who constantly stimulate each other's thinking.

(Footage of photograph of Clintons; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

Mrs. EBELING: (Voiceover) And I can't imagine a different, better partner for her.

He got pretty lucky, too. He did.

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) On the day these two friends sat down for a chat with us, Senator Clinton had just returned from Iowa, so neither appeared particularly surprised by the next question.

Are you going to be a Democratic candidate for president next year?

Sen. CLINTON: I am gonna support our Democratic nominee.

MORIARTY: But, Senator, are you saying that under no circumstances...

Sen. CLINTON: I have said it over and over and over again. I--you know, I...

MORIARTY: Under no circumstance will you be the candidate next year?

Sen. CLINTON: There are no circumstances that I think are even imaginable.

Mrs. EBELING: So it's settled. She's staying with Bill and she's not running, you know.

MORIARTY: The definitive interview here.

Mrs. EBELING: It's done.

(Footage of photographs; Clinton, Ebeling and Moriarty)

MORIARTY: (Voiceover) And with that, it suddenly becomes quite clear why Hillary Rodham Clinton has stayed connected so well and for so long to Betsy Johnson Ebeling.

Sen. CLINTON: (Voiceover) Sometimes when I look at her, I still see, you know, the little girl I met in sixth grade. I see someone who's been, you know, my true friend, who I can count on to be there for me, who is honest and straight in every sense of, you know, caring and concern for me and my family.

And, you know, that's a precious gift. So mostly I just see kind of a blessing in my life when I look at her.

Mrs. EBELING: She's a sweet pea.

"American Morning," CNN, 12/1/2003

SOLEDAD O'BRIEN, CNN ANCHOR: Two U.S. senators are just back from a trip to Iraq and Afghanistan. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Rhode Island Senator Jack Reed will join -- join us this morning, rather, from Capitol Hill, to share their impressions, also, to talk a little bit about the latest violence in Iraq.

Good morning to you, Senators.

Nice to see you both and thanks for joining us on AMERICAN MORNING.

We appreciate it.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Good morning, Soledad.

SEN. JACK REED (D-RI), ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE: Good morning.

O'BRIEN: Senator Clinton, let's begin with you.

You're obviously well aware, we just heard from Nic Robertson about these attacks, also, the attacks on international workers and intelligence agents and then this large scale attack that we just heard Nic Robertson talking about.

Give me a sense of the security situation as you see it now that you've finished your visit.

CLINTON: Well, Soledad, it is still a very insecure situation and I can't say enough positive things about our United States military. They're doing a superb job under very difficult circumstances. But, again, I did not believe they had enough forces and the right mix of forces to be able to do this dangerous mission that we've given them.

They don't have enough M.P.s or intel or what they call sy-ops or civil affairs. And it is a real problem become, as you can see from the report, our troops are under direct attack. We have also lost some of our coalition allied forces in intel and other services. So this is still an insecure, dangerous situation and we need to both get more force in and we need to get the United Nations back in to internationalize it.

O'BRIEN: Senator Reed, the secretary of defense says that he doesn't think the U.S. allies will be put off by these latest attacks. Spain's prime minister said that withdrawal would be the worst possible thing that could happen. South Korea's president said these attacks were intolerable.

What kind of effect do you think these attacks are going to have on our allies in this?

REED: Well, I hope, of course, that our allies continue to support us in Iraq. But the accumulation of these attacks and as they're directed against the soft targets, not essentially military forces, but civilian aid workers and diplomats, I think will have a cumulative effect and cause reluctance and increased opposition not so much in the government, perhaps, but the people of the countries that are assisting us today.

And that's quite obviously the strategy of the insurgent forces. They can't take American military forces on directly, so they're going after the softer targets, hoping to weaken them and weaken their resolve and ultimately our resolve.

O'BRIEN: Senator Clinton, you just said a moment ago that there are not enough forces or enough of a certain mix of forces on the ground there.

As we see these increased attacks on the international forces and workers, don't you expect it's going to be much like -- less likely that foreign countries are going to forward their troops to this cause, when they see them being attacked?

CLINTON: Well, that's why it needs to be internationalized under the United Nations, Soledad. It seems to me that the time has come for the Bush administration to recognize that it's in America's national interests to get the U.N. back in a position of control and authority, because that will not only help bring in more additional troops from international forces, but it will also send a clear signal that the transfer of authority to some kind of self-governance is not an American project, it's an international project.

So I would underscore what many of us have been saying for a long time. We don't have enough troops, either U.S. or international, and we have to internationalize the effort to move towards self-governance.

O'BRIEN: Why do you think...

CLINTON: If we moved in that direction, we'd make more progress, in my opinion.

O'BRIEN: Forgive me for jumping in there.

Why do you think commanders on the ground disagree with you? They have said more soldiers mean more targets. They have said we're not calling for more. The secretary of defense said if a commander calls me and asks for more troops, I'll send more troops. They're not calling for them.

Why do you disagree with that?

CLINTON: Well, I think there are two things going on. In our private discussions with a number of our military leaders, they said that they may have enough troops in absolute numbers, but they don't have the right mix of troops. And when they start rotating people out, as they have promised, in March or April, shortly before they intend to turn over authority on the civilian side, they're going to be in a very difficult position because, as Senator Reed and other of my colleagues have been saying now for months, we don't have enough inventory of personnel in the U.S. military to replace a lot of the troops that are going to be coming back, to perform the functions that are essential.

Secondly, I think frankly the administration has made it so clear they're not going to send troops that it's useless to ask for more troops. That's why moving toward a United Nations mandate of some sort, which apparently is going to be discussed this week in New York, would give everybody the cover and the permission to ask for and receive some additional troops from other countries and to slightly begin to change the force mixture that we have.

And, Soledad, I also don't want to forget about Afghanistan, because that may be off the public radar and the media watch right now, but we're still engaged in a struggle with the terrorist in Afghanistan who, after all, were responsible for the attacks on our country. And we need to get more NATO troops into Afghanistan to supplement the American military force, as well.

O'BRIEN: Senator Reed, we don't have a ton of time, but I want to give you the final word this morning.

You -- there are, of course, reports that high ranking Iraqis would like to have direct elections. You've said that's a big dilemma, obviously. Who knows who's going to be elected, could that work against what the United States is trying to do in Iraq right now.

How do you solve that dilemma?

REED: Well, it's a challenging dilemma. Unless we have a legitimate process to select the new leader of Iraq, we will never have any comfort or any positive development. Right now, the major Shia figure, Ayatollah Sistani, has refrained from endorsing enthusiastically the new proposal. We have to work to get if not his support directly, certainly to avoid any opposition.

If we don't, then we're going to have a process that's going to be flawed from the beginning. And the other thing we have to do is make sure that this process is not just the result of intimidation and bribery and the old Iraqi politics. It has to be part of the new Iraqi politics. And there's another role for the United Nations, to come in and review this electoral process and certify it and provide it with legitimacy. Without legitimacy, it'll be an effort, an exercise, really, in futility.

O'BRIEN: Senator Jack Reed and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, nice to see you both.

Thanks for joining us this morning.

REED: Thank you.

O'BRIEN: Appreciate it.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATORS HILLARY CLINTON AND JACK REED HOLD NEWS CONFERENCE ON RECENT TRIP TO IRAQ AND AFGHANISTAN, 12/1/2003

CLINTON: Well, I want to thank Senator Reed for putting this trip together and for leading it so effectively.

And his past experience in the military, particularly in the 82nd Airborne, gave him a very special understanding of some of the challenges that our troops face.

We asked specifically about the hunt for Osama bin Laden. As you know, it has not been successful. We still believe it is one of the primary goals of our presence in Afghanistan.

CLINTON: There are increased efforts to obtain intelligence about his whereabouts and to seek him out. But that has to remain one of our highest priorities.

We also are well-aware of the very precarious position politically that exists in Afghanistan, although it is on a more sure track than Iraq. The constitutional loya jirga starts meeting this month. They are looking toward elections in June.

President Karzai has a very articulate description of what needs to be done in order to move the country to that point. And we believe that we should do everything possible to support this constitutional and electoral process.

That's one of the reasons why we have already this morning spoken to Condoleezza Rice to convey our principal recommendations. We're going to be sending her a letter later today with more thorough recommendations.

But one of our highest recommendations was that we do everything possible to be prepared, with NATO's support, to fend off what will clearly be efforts to destabilize both the constitutional loya jirga and the election, so that the Afghani people can have a fair shot at creating their own government.

We also are well aware that drugs remain a principal challenge. We mentioned that to Dr. Rice. There has to be a higher priority on drug eradication and elimination. Presently, Afghanistan is the highest producer of opium in the world. We know what can come if narco traffickers fill a void and work in conjunction with the terrorists and the warlords.

The efforts to date have not been effective. There needs to be increased pressure put on the poppy growers and some alternative program to provide them a livelihood.

We also discussed with President Karzai what these provincial reconstruction teams are doing. We know that they are going to be having four or five of them up and going.

CLINTON: We would like to see us have a much larger number because they clearly demonstrate that there is a commitment by America and the NATO allies to improve the lives of the Afghan people.

To that end, I spoke with President Karzai about the humanitarian needs that they have in the country. And the number one need is to improve maternal health. Afghanistan has the highest death rate of women during pregnancy, labor and delivery. This is an area where, if we could put in a relatively small amount of money, we could make a very big difference.

Presently, they have a hospital in Kabul that is woefully understaffed and underfunded, that handles 200 deliveries a day. That's an extraordinary amount of births that take place under very difficult conditions. We think we could not only do some good there, but it would be a program for President Karzai's government to champion and it would send a clear signal that while we are talking about improving the lives of Afghans, we're actually doing something on the ground that can make a real difference.

Finally, with respect to Afghanistan, the ongoing challenges for education, for reconstruction, for health are expensive. We are building an Afghan army which has some success, but faces a lot of problems. We need to be building an army of teachers to reach out and educate both boys and girls. This is important on both sides of the border. We discussed that with President Musharraf. The madrassas educate -- so-called educate -- 600,000 to 700,000 young boys, in part because there are no schools that can teach a different curriculum.

I think that one of our highest priorities in the war on terrorism is to provide a different kind of education for the children in Pakistan and Afghanistan.

It is apparent to us that we've made real progress in Afghanistan, but for the last several months our country, our press, our political leadership has been primarily focused on Iraq. And we can't forget that the death and destruction caused to America came from Afghanistan. That's where the attacks were devised. That's where they were coordinated. That's where the implementation orders originated. And it is still a very dangerous situation.

We cannot afford to fail in Afghanistan. We have to do whatever we can to be successful.

In my meetings with Afghan women, they emphasized the importance of empowering women, to give women a stake in the future of Afghanistan. I hope that that will be one of our highest priorities in our political agenda as we go forward with Afghanistan.

CLINTON: But the clear message to us is that we need a more realistic budget for what is needed in Afghanistan to deal with both the military and political needs.

The latest supplemental had about $1.2 billion in it. The best estimates from the people in our embassy, the people on the ground in Afghanistan, is that Afghanistan would need $30 billion over five years to realize the political transition, the reconstruction needs, to establish the security, to train an army that's not going to desert at a rate of 20 percent, to have a police force that can be reliable, to integrate the various ethnic groups into a national unity government.

We have a lot at stake in this. And we're going to have to recognize that it's not going to come either cheaply or quickly. But we saw progress. We just want to make sure that progress deepens and continues.

REED: Upon concluding our meeting with President Musharraf in Pakistan, we flew to Kuwait to prepare for two days of visits to Iraq. Our first day's visit, we went to Baghdad. We arrived there. We went by motorcade from the airport downtown to the headquarters of the CPA. And there we had a long briefing and a very productive meeting with Ambassador Bremer and the Lieutenant General Sanchez.

After that, we took another motorcade convoy to the headquarters of the 82nd Airborne Division, 2nd Brigade, commanded by Kurt Fuller. And we met and had an opportunity to tour the barracks and discuss with some of the paratroopers of the 3rd Battalion 325th Airborne Infantry.

And then we took another motorcade. And we went down to the convention center and we had a chance to meet with representatives of nongovernmental organizations who are working in the countryside of Iraq. It was a very interesting perspective. Seldom, I think, do these congressional delegations sit down and meet with these NGOs who are out there in all these small communities, doing their best.

In addition, there was another opportunity, led by Senator Clinton, to meet with Iraqi women and to talk about the status of women there. We got into our vehicles and moved again to the dining hall, where we had a chance to have supper with soldiers from New York and Rhode Island. I was very pleased to see members of the 118th Military Police Battalion from Rhode Island.

REED: I was visiting them back in July. And let me say, in terms of contrasting situations, it appeared to me last July that it was a chaotic situation in Baghdad. It was weeks away from the liberation. And it was very hot, about 120 degrees.

Well, the temperature's cooled off. It's less chaotic, but it's more dangerous, because the violence now is organized and directed against our forces and our allies within Iraq.

Now, the other point I should make about the Rhode Island troops is they were very pleased to have received 43 up-armored Humvees. One of the continuing shortfalls in our equipment for our soldiers in both Afghanistan, but particularly in Iraq, is the insufficient number of up-armored Humvees. It's a psychological as well as a physical dimension.

We were driving around with armor protecting us, but I would look out on the roadways and see these unarmored Humvees going down the same roads we were, knowing that if there was an explosion, they would be in a very precarious situation.

So we've got to do more. And we've got legislation in my supplemental to buy more. And we have to speed that process up.

At the end of our meetings that evening, we returned to Kuwait to rest overnight. And then the following morning, we again had the opportunity in Kuwait to meet with soldiers from New York and from Rhode Island.

Here, members of the 115th Military Police Company of Rhode Island, we had a chance to thank them. They lost three individuals already killed in action in Iraq, as well as other wounded. And they are now in Kuwait. And again, we wanted to thank them and salute them for their efforts.

We also had a chance to meet with General Abizaid. He flew in from his headquarters en route to Afghanistan. We had a long and very appropriate discussion with him on the situation overall.

And then we took another C-130 up to Kirkuk, where we met with Ray Ordierno, who is general commander of the 4th Infantry Division, and Colonel Bill Mayville, who is the commander of the 173rd Airborne Brigade. We had a very productive meeting with them about the situation as they see it on the ground.

After our meetings, we went downtown into Kirkuk and had a very good meeting with the governor of the province and the acting governor, city council members, women and men, representatives of the new political forces in Iraq.

REED: We left there. And we had a chance to go back and have lunch with the soldiers of the 173rd and also the Air Force personnel that are in Kirkuk.

We returned to Kuwait, and we had a meeting with the Shekira (ph) of Kuwait, the sister of the emir, who is very, very active in environmental issues and also in issues of women's rights, both in Kuwait and across the area.

And then we got on the aircraft and headed home.

Let me make a few points. First, within Iraq, the threat continues to be former regime loyalists, a small group of international terrorists who have come in after the fall of the Saddam Hussein regime, and criminal elements.

It appears over the last several days that the former regime loyalists were targeting soft targets, attacks against diplomats, attacks against aid workers. But just this morning, we all realized that they are at least sporadically prepared to take on our troops.

We understand, and we know, that that is a losing effort on their part. Our forces are well prepared to defend themselves.

But the continuing viability or at least the sporadic viability of these forces suggest that the dangers are still there.

There's been an ongoing discussion about force levels, about the needs of our forces.

Let me make a few points from our perspective. First, it's obvious we had adequate forces to win a decisive victory, but it seems increasingly apparent that we had inadequate forces to dominate the country, both geographically and psychologically. And, as a result, we've let the insurgents back in the game.

And there shouldn't be a debate also about the critical shortages of specialties -- military police, psychological operations, civil affairs officers and engineers. And one of the critical factors there is that many of these units are reserve component units, not active forces.

We will face a very challenging situation when our rotations start taking place next spring. We may be able to replace our regular forces -- our infantry armored forces -- but these high demand units are not easily replaceable.

REED: And we're going to lose a great deal in terms of continuity and capability when we bring out these units and we're not able to replace them as we should.

Another issue I think is nondebatable is regardless of how one feels about the number of troops in Iraq, we won't be able to support this rotation over many years unless we increase the size of our Army, particularly. And if we're in it for the long run, we have to have a force structure for the long run, not the short run.

Let me make a few other points with respect to our situation in Iraq.

We are hearing from regional commanders and regional representatives that there is an overcentralization of authority in Baghdad under the CPA. The flexibility they need in terms of funding, in terms of initiative is being complicated by the interaction between the CPA, the Iraqi ministers and regional commanders. That should be streamlined dramatically.

Our success to date has stemmed from the initiative and the discretion of local commanders, particularly in the use of CERF funds, these are the Commander's Emergency Reconstruction Funds. These funds were initially allocated out of Iraqi assets to individual commanders. They've used them very aggressively.

Starting October 1st, they ran out of the money, and the commanders told us they started running out of momentum. They couldn't address the concerns that were -- in an instantaneous way.

In contrast to our commanders, particularly the Shia in the south, because of the way they operate and organize, are able through their own resources to respond immediately to social concerns. And this battle for authority, this battle for legitimacy, this battle for the minds and the support of the local Iraqis is being waged right now in terms of funding immediate response.

We would urge that the recently appropriated CERF funds, $180 million, be expeditiously allocated to the lowest possible level so that our commanders can once again pick up the momentum in doing that.

One of the successes we've seen in terms of our Iraqi-ization has been the creation of the Iraqi civil defense forces. Each commander told us that they're making great progress.

REED: They're integrating and training these units. They're patrolling with us. But we're in danger of having a hollow force because these units do not have the equipment, the communications equipment, the uniforms that they will need to act more and more independently. And that's another item that we have to address.

Now the other issue I want to mention, too, is the fact that comments we received suggests strongly that the abrupt dismantling of the Iraqi army was a mistake; that it has cast upon the streets thousands of ordinary people who are without employment and potentially threats to the future of Iraq.

In addition to that, the complicated process of de-Baathification has essentially created situations where, in one province, a thousand teachers can't teach at a desperate time when they need the teachers.

There are thousands, also, of former military officers and intelligence officers who are on the bench, if you will, and it's unsure now what are they doing -- helping us or hurting us. So I think we have to clarify that situation, also.

But, by and large, we have seen progress there in Iraq. But we're entering a very critical, critical time as the American forces are rotating and as this new election process is commencing, the intersection of potential instability, which could be very threatening to the progress we've made to date.

And let me recognize Senator Clinton.

CLINTON: Well, I think that the intersection of the military security concerns with the political is now the most urgent priority.

As you know, the administration recently announced a plan for the transition of power in Iraq. They have laid out a timetable where a transitional assembly will be selected by May 31st and a provisional government created with a leader of some title by June 30th.

Now, we see several dangers in this plan and this timetable.

We asked everyone we came across, "Well, who do you think the leader will be?" You know, nobody could give you an answer. No one has emerged who could provide a unifying presence for a transition the way President Karzai has done successfully in Afghanistan.

We know that the concerns of the minorities in Iraq are essential to be addressed because of the overwhelming presence of the Shia in about 60 percent of the population. How majority and minority rights will be laid out and protected is also unclear.

We don't know if there will be a federal or a centralized system created. When we met with the leaders in Kirkuk, they are strong advocates of a federal system, as were the Iraqis we met with in Baghdad.

But in Kirkuk, which, as you know, is north of Baghdad, they didn't even know what the real plans were. No one has directly communicated with them. The members of the governing council are not relating to the local residents and even the local governing councils.

Their principal contact is with the American military, which has done a fabulous job in the reconstruction and the relationship building.

CLINTON: So what kind of system they're going to be aiming for -- it's taken two years to get to the point where we are in Afghanistan. We're trying to compress that time into a relatively short period to try to accomplish the same ends in Iraq.

We face the danger of raising false expectations that next summer Iraq will be sovereign, that it will have a government stood up, that the government will fairly represent the interests of the people in Iraq. And that seems hard to imagine, based on our visits of the last few days.

And, as Senator Reed mentioned, it's very difficult to understand how we will be going through the most dangerous period, which is the period from now until next June, when we're going to try to be holding some kind of constituent assemblies throughout the country, creating the mechanisms for a government, when we know that the insurgency will be aiming directly to disrupt that, that we would also be rotating out the troops that have built the relationships at the local level.

You know, the generals, the colonels, the majors, the captains and lieutenants and sergeants who have developed trusted relationships with a lot of the local Iraqi leaders will be on their way out in March and April. New people will be coming in.

No matter how well trained and sensitive, it's going to take a while for them to develop similar relationships just at a time when we're going to be asking people to trust in the creation of an Iraqi government.

The role of the U.N. is one that we focused on. Ambassador Bremer told us that he was pleading that the U.N. come back in. When we discussed that with Dr. Rice this morning, it's clear that they want the U.N. back in some form, particularly to oversee elections -- however those elections are defined -- but that they're not willing, the administration is not willing to cede much authority to the United Nations.

I think that's a losing proposition. You're not going to get the U.N. back in, given the security constraints if they don't feel that they have a real line of authority. And you're not going to get additional troops in to supplement our troops and to provide some of the functions that we can't provide, because of limitations on our own force structure, if the U.N. doesn't feel that it is at least calling some of the shots.

So the administration has its work cut out. And I know that there are meetings going on this week in New York at the U.N. to try to figure out how the U.N. can come back into Iraq, working with the neighbors of Iraq, working with other elements of the international community.

It is clear that there is some concern that the process in Iraq for elections is being driven, not by the conditions on the ground in Iraq, but by the timetable for our own elections, that the administration is intent upon some kind of exit strategy, some kind of transition before our elections.

CLINTON: I'm afraid that's an artificial deadline and it may not be, at all, the right kind of timeframe for what we need to try to accomplish.

There are many comparisons that we heard about when we were in Iraq. We've heard about them for months.

The administration often talks about the Marshall Plan, talks about our involvement in Germany after World War II. But if you look at the time it took to stand up a government in Germany, to create the conditions for democracy, we're talking about 10 years.

And we're also looking at a situation where there were a greater number of American troops committed along with our allies in different sectors than on a comparative basis we have committed in Iraq.

So we have a lot of work cut out for us. And we have an additional complicating factor which is that the Hajj, the pilgrimage to Mecca, will occur in January. It's likely that there will be a pent-up demand within Iraq for people to make the migration to Mecca. There will be pilgrims looking to cross Iraq on their way to Mecca.

This is a situation rife with danger for our troops and for Iraqis, because we may not have the manpower to handle and manage a massive migration and we may not be able to figure out who is legitimately transiting across Iraq and who is there for other purposes. So we would strongly urge the administration to factor this into their planning.

Finally, with respect to both countries, the next six to seven months are critical. We have an actual constitutional and electoral process going forward in Afghanistan. And we are trying to set up something comparable in Iraq.

We will be pointing out in even greater detail in our letter to Dr. Rice some of the warning signals that we saw, with respect to whether or not we can make that work.

We not only have a problem with not having enough personnel -- American -- in the right force structure, but also NATO and international, but we are wearing out our military equipment at a very rapid rate.

CLINTON: We saw that firsthand when one of the C-130s we were on from Bagram to Kandahar couldn't take off because of an oil problem. You know, it's a 1961 plane.

We are having lots of problems with our equipment. We're going to have to recapitalize it. That is an expense and a time restraint that also has to be taken into account.

Finally, any future plans about winning the wars on the ground and for the hearts and minds of Iraqis and Afghans requires something that Americans are often notoriously short of, and that's patience. We have to be prepared for a much longer run to accomplish our goals than we have been discussing publicly.

We are engaged in massive deficit funding of our missions in both Iraq and Afghanistan. We need to look hard at what will really be required financially, both for the military and the political-economic goals that we are trying to achieve.

And we have to recognize that we are dealing with adversaries who have all the time in the world. This was summed up for me by the head of our USAID mission in Kabul, who told me that he had just come back from a trip to the southeast, meeting with a number of leaders including former Taliban who are trying to decide which way they move. They're on the fence now. Do they sign up with Karzai and the Americans or do they take a different route?

And as one former Taliban leader said to this American official, "You Americans have all the watches, but we have all the time."

That's a message that we have to take to heart. This is not something that can be accomplished quickly if we expect it to last. We have to be willing to make the commitment, just as we did in Germany, just as we have done in Bosnia and Kosovo. We cannot let our own elections, our own other priorities interfere with doing it right. And doing it right is going to take time and effort and commitment.

But I don't think we have any choice. We cannot afford to lose in the minds of the public in those countries what we won on the battlefields.

REED: Let me make one other point and open up the questions. One of the issues that we spoke to Ambassador Bremer with is the huge growth in Iraqi security forces. In one or two weeks, 20,000 were added to the rolls. And the concern that I have, and I think Senator Clinton shares, is that we can't assume that these forces are comparable to our forces.

REED: And it's interesting, in Washington, as the Iraqi forces go up, these pie charts show our percentage fall. We have to be very clear-eyed about that.

Some of these forces are trained a week, two weeks. They can only perform static guard duties. And, in fact, Ambassador Bremer seconded our concern and said he makes it clear, or he tries to make it clear, that this is not a one-to-one substitution.

And so we have to, I think, be very sensitive to this whole notion of Iraqi security forces taking over from our forces in the short run.

With that, let me open it up.

QUESTION: You expressed concern about the (inaudible), but over the weekend we've had attacks on Japanese, the Spaniards and South Koreans (inaudible) killed. What are your thoughts about that? I mean, what's the impact of that situation?

REED: Well, it's clearly the strategy of the insurgents to start targeting these representatives of foreign countries to see if they can dislodge their countries from helping us.

They figured out that taking on United States military forces head on is a losing proposition, so they're going after the softer targets.

I'm glad that the government leaders indicated that that would not sway their determination to stay the course in Iraq, but my concern is that in the publics of Japan and South Korea and other countries, that they will gradually put pressure on their leaders to circumscribe their commitment, limit their commitment, delay their commitment.

All this, of course, will adversely affect our ability to maintain stability and to provide for the development of Iraq.

CLINTON: You know, I think it's kind of a chicken-and-egg problem. If you don't have some kind of U.N. mandate and international legitimacy, you're not going to be able to attract and keep the international troops, because if both governments and citizens in various countries can escape responsibility by saying it's an American problem, eventually that's what they may choose to do.

So I would hope that we can move toward more U.N. responsibility.

But we're not going to get U.N. authority and responsibility if we don't expand the mandate. If all that we do is to invite the U.N. to come in and oversee an election process that basically the United States conceives of and implements, we're not going to get much buy-in.

I think it is time for the administration to look at a way of expanding the responsibility for this. It's easy for people on the outside to be criticizing us, but if we put them inside the tent, make them have to take responsibility for what the eventual outcome in Iraq will be, they're more likely to have to support what we're doing.

So I argue strongly that we need a broader U.N. mandate. We need a new U.N. high commissioner or representative to replace Sergio de Mello who was murdered, as you know, in the attack on the U.N. And if the U.N. feels like it has some authority, they will be more willing and quicker to come in with both civilian and military forces for the project.

QUESTION: Do you come away with any confidence that this political process that's being laid out will actually work?

CLINTON: Well, we came away with a lot of questions being raised. Certainly, the objections voiced over the last several days by Ayatollah Sistani have sent a clear signal that this is going to be difficult to implement.

Again, I think we would be smarter to come up with a process that had the stamp of international legitimacy, including some of the neighbors in the area, through the United Nations. It would be much more difficult for any one person or one segment of the population to throw a wrench in the works because it would have that broader U.N. mandate.

CLINTON: Do I think it'll work? I think that the jury is out. I think there are lots of problems with whether or not it is workable, based on the objections and based on the very difficult security environment in which it should be implemented.

REED: Just to add, it's a work in progress. It's a day-to-day process of trying to create real structure to the intention to turn over sovereignty, try to explain it to the Iraqi people.

We found, particularly, that they didn't have a real detailed grasp. What they assumed was that this was the final transfer of authority with a constitution to the Iraqi people, and that does not appear to be the intent of this interim arrangement.

So it's not understood. It's changing, as they try to solicit support of the Shia communities. And again, when they finally focus on the first minister, the person who will lead Iraq, that could set off underlying fault lines, which is essentially will the Shia lead the government, will the Sunni lead the government, what will the Kurds react to in terms of their leadership position and role?

And so, you can envision, even if this works out, in terms of the process, that it'll lead to disaffection either by the Shias, who don't feel that they have what they want, or the Sunnis, who are disaffected and see this as the final proof of their marginalization in Iraq.

And then, of course, the Kurds are a wildcard. Are they going to hold for such regional autonomy that they become de facto, a semi- autonomous region?

So these are all difficult issues.

Then beyond that, you get into some other difficult issues. How do you reconcile all the competing claims for property that was seized, expropriated during the regime of Saddam Hussein, which is a very hot issue outside of Baghdad -- not so much in Baghdad, but outside of Baghdad -- in particular in Kirkuk?

And second, when do we get along to privatizing the economy so it'll work, which is a huge potential unemployment issue which, frankly, we can't afford.

Our economic strategy in Iraq today is pay everybody more than they were getting under Saddam. We've tripled the salaries to teachers and other governmental workers. We've doubled pensions. It's creating quite a demand. In fact, Ambassador Bremer suggested we drive around and see all the appliances that are being purchased in downtown Iraq. But that's not a long-term self-sustaining policy either.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, it sounds to me that what you're saying is that the sense that you got from being over there is that this is a longer term project than you thought before you went over?

CLINTON: No. I've always thought that it was a much more difficult time-consuming project than the administration was prepared to admit.

I think one of the reasons that we are in some of the difficulties we confront now is that the numbers of our forces in Iraq were adequate to win the military battle, but not adequate to dominate the country after the initial conflict was over.

As a result, we are living with the consequences of refusing to admit the size of this undertaking. I've said on many occasions that it is bewildering to me how this administration, which is run by people who've been obsessed with Iraq and Saddam Hussein since the first Gulf War, could be so poorly prepared once the military success was assured.

No one doubted that we would be militarily successful. At least no one with any knowledge of the American military doubted it.

The hard part was, once our troops did their work, which was to drive out the Baathist Party and overthrow the Saddam Hussein regime: Would we be prepared to do what it would take to stabilize the country, provide security and put it on some kind of footing toward political self-sufficiency?

CLINTON: So the hard part started on May 1st. The easy part, if you look at it, was the military part because no one can contest us on the battlefield. We are so superior to any military force in the world today that if we're engaged in a battle, we're going to dominate. But when we take on an insurgency, when we deal with the complexity of a country that we, frankly, have very few people who speak the language or understand the culture, that's hard.

And I think we ought to be looking at the long-term commitment and being very straightforward in what it's going to take to be successful over time.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, just to follow on that, you talked about how we're, sort of, putting our troops in and playing catch-up in Iraq. Do you think that given the recent attack on the Koreans, the Japanese, the U.N. bombing a while back, does the administration have an underestimated view of the political savvy, if you will, of the Baathists dead-enders, holdouts -- whatever you call them? Are they continuing to underestimate the political savvy, because clearly this is a coordinated campaign to attack our allies who might (inaudible)?

CLINTON: Well, I think that there was at least a public understatement of the challenges that would be confronted after the military mission was accomplished. And I can't speak for the administration.

But in the numerous appearances before the Armed Services Committee and in other briefings that I attended by the civilian leadership and the Defense Department and the State Department there was an unwillingness to confront the challenges that many of us believed would be waiting.

You'll remember that General Shinseki was publicly embarrassed by the secretary of defense and the Pentagon when he said it was going to take 150,000 to 200,000 troops, at least, to try to provide stability.

And I think there was an unwillingness in some corners to admit what it was going to take financially and in terms of human resources. And there was a romanticism in other corners that the liberation would somehow lead a stable situation that we then could, in an orderly, way withdraw from.

Neither of those were on point. And we're living with the consequences of the poor planning for the postconflict period that we are in the midst of right now.

And as to your point: because we didn't dominate the country militarily after the organized fighting ended; because we didn't guard against looting, which sent a signal that I think was unfortunate to the Iraqi people and to the former regime loyalists; because we didn't guard any of the ministries other than the oil ministry; and because we didn't immediately move to secure the munitions dumps that we learned about -- 650,000 tons of munitions which were left unguarded, in many instances, for weeks and months -- we permitted there to be a reorganizing of the former regime loyalists, the Baathists. And we also didn't secure the borders, so if there were foreign fighters coming in, we'd not interdicted as many of them as we should have.

So I think there's a lot that is, in hindsight, causing problems for us in this current period, which is why we need to be realistic about where we stand today and how we should go forward.

QUESTION: Do you think it's too strong of a statement to say that the insurgents, whether they are Baathists remnants or whoever they are, are demonstrating some level of political savvy given, particularly, the weekend...

CLINTON: I think that that's both political savvy and organizational capability. You know, they're targeting these soft targets. They went after the U.N., they went after our allies, the Italians, the Spaniards, the Japanese. They're going after the civilians.

It's a strategy to try to undermine the resolve, first of America's allies and then of Americans, both our civilian workers as well as our military forces. And, obviously, that's what they intend to try to do.

REED: Let me add that, perhaps, an irony is that these insurgency leaders are showing a lot more cunning than Saddam Hussein did when he was trying to oppose our conventional attack.

And, second, I think there are several elements at work here. First, there are the former regime loyalists who are involved in some of these activities. And then there's that small cadre of highly skilled international terrorists who are in for the long run.

And their goal is exactly that, a political one. It's to destabilize our position there, to make the participation of other countries so expensive that they will not cooperate with us.

So all these things suggest a much more complicated insurgency than we anticipated. And, frankly, I can recall in the first few weeks after the military victory when Secretary Rumsfeld would refuse to admit this was an insurgency. It took General Abizaid to say, "We're in a classic guerrilla war."

So it suggests to me that the military had a much clearer vision of what they were dealing with, both before the attack and certainly after the attack, than the political leaders here in Washington.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE)

REED: We had an interesting conversation with General Abizaid, who I respect mightily. We were lieutenants together in the 504th Parachute Infantry Regiment. The point he makes is that this war on terror is borderless; it's international. You can see attacks in Turkey, attacks in Saudi Arabia.

And, indeed, the key arenas for our struggle in not only in the war on terror, but international, in the region may not be Iraq, after all. It may be Pakistan and Saudi Arabia, because of the need for the government of Pakistan to increase their cooperation, because of the potential there for a political upheaval, and certainly Saudi Arabia, also.

So to see this as a central front is to miss the major point. It's such a hard war because there is no central front. The central front is the point of attack, and that could be Angkor one day, Baghdad one day, Riyadh another day.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, earlier you talked about the timing of this being driven in part by our elections here. Can you expand on that? It seems like you're saying the president wants to solve -- make things nice and tidy by November. And then, separately, can you both talk about how Ms. Rice responded to your conversation with her today? Did she smile and say, thanks, or did she actually (OFF-MIKE)?

CLINTON: Well, with respect to the electoral timetable, my hope is that it is not driving any of our policy. My suspicion is that, indeed, it is. And clearly, the quick move toward some kind of sovereignty in whatever form by June of this year suggests to me that there is a political imperative at work to try to declare victory or at least to point to some kind of interim victory before the November elections.

I hope that I'm wrong, because, from my perspective, this should be way beyond politics. I mean, as you know, I supported giving the president authority. I disapproved of the way he used the authority, but I viewed the war against terrorism and certainly the danger posed by weapons of mass destruction around the world to be serious and real.

But we have to be in this for the long term, and I don't think the administration adequately prepared the American people for the level of sacrifice and casualties.

And we still refuse to accept how expensive this is going to be, how long this is going to take. And there are many issues that have to be honestly addressed. And that should be outside the political process, because clearly they go to the heart of America's security and safety.

CLINTON: With respect to Dr. Rice, we spoke to her by phone. We had a very (inaudible) conversation about the recommendations we were making with respect to both Afghanistan and Iraq. She said she wanted to talk with us further when she got our longer letter, which she should get sometime later today. And we look forward to that.

QUESTION: Did you talk to her at the same time?

CLINTON: Yes.

REED: We did. We were on a conference call. And it was a very positive response. She was very interested in our comments and she pledged not only to read the letter, but to get back to us and to continue this dialogue and discussion.

CLINTON: I mean, I think the bottom line for Senator Reed and myself is that we want to be successful in our efforts for our country in both Afghanistan and Iraq.

We cannot afford to fail. Whatever one thinks about the decision to go into Iraq, that's water under the dam. We've got to win and we have to establish a stable, functioning Iraq.

So that should be the focus of our concern. That should be the focus of debate in the Congress and in the country.

And we cannot forget about Afghanistan because, after all, that's where the face of international terrorism resides. Osama bin Laden is the face of international terrorism. And our failure to apprehend him means that whether he's dead or alive -- and we don't know which -- he is a mythic presence, he is a recruiting tool, and he is a continuing real and present danger to the security of Americans.

So there is no excuse for anything other than having the country united behind a winning strategy, and what we hope is to contribute to how that winning strategy can be devised and implemented.

REED: Anyone else?

CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you.

REED: Thank you very much. Thank you.

QUESTION: Your nice graphic says the 25th to the 30th, but didn't you leave on the 26th?

CLINTON: No, we left Wednesday night.

REED: Wednesday night.

QUESTION: You did leave on the 25th?

CLINTON: We left Tuesday night, Tuesday night. Sorry. Yes, Tuesday night, because it took us a whole day to get there.

QUESTION: And you were planning to go a week earlier?

REED: October we were planning to go. Well, many weeks ago. You're right. Originally, our trip was going to leave on the 21st and carry us before Thanksgiving. We'd be back early Thanksgiving morning here in the United States, but because of the session we had to just (inaudible). And it was, I think, interesting and helpful, because we could be with troops on Thanksgiving Day.

QUESTION: Did you plan this before or after the president planned to go?

CLINTON: No, we've been -- I don't know anything about his plans.

REED: We'd been planning this trip for weeks in early October.

QUESTION: Do you think the president's trip will have any long- lasting effects, or, as critics say, was it, frankly, a publicity stunt for the elections?

CLINTON: Well, I think it's always good when the commander in chief visits troops in a conflict zone. I was very pleased that he was able to go under the conditions that he had to travel. And I think the troops who got to see him were also very pleased.

You know, morale was high in both Afghanistan and Iraq, but it can always get a necessary boost when somebody comes to tell the troops what a great job they're doing. You know, Jack and I found that in our trip.

So I'm really pleased that the president could go. Having said that, you know, the trip doesn't substitute for a workable plan that has a higher potential for success than what we saw on our trip.

And I'm hoping that not only -- obviously what Senator Reed and I say, but many of our colleagues who have gone before us -- and this is Senator Reed's second trip -- on both sides of the aisle, Senators McCain and Hagel and others have delivered basically the same message.

We keep delivering it, hoping that we can get some kind of change in policy and response, because we see the same things on the ground when we're there.

And it's troubling, because the troops are doing a fabulous job. I mean, I just can't say enough about these young men and women. And of course, I was personally very proud to visit troops from New York, from the Niagara Naval Reserve Station in Niagara Falls.

Everywhere I went, we were flown from Baghdad to Kuwait one night with no lights and a dark takeoff by a crew from Niagara. You know, we saw the best of the best on our trip. And they, too, deserve to make sure that the policy is commensurate with their commitment and sacrifice.

REED: We got flown in a vintage 1961 aircraft by a vintage 1978 pilot. You can see the equipment problems we have.

The other thing about the president's trip, he set off a new fashion trend because when I arrived I was presented an Army jacket with the patch of the 143rd Military Police Brigade. So new fashion has been sent.

Thank you very much.

CLINTON: Thank you all very much.

"This Week with George Stephanopoulos," ABC, 12/7/2003

Just back from Afghanistan and Iraq, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has serious questions about the US mission.

graphics: headliner

DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK

It is clear that there is some concern that the process in Iraq for elections is being driven not by the conditions on the ground in Iraq, but by the timetable for our own elections. That the administration is intent on some kind of exit strategy, some kind of transition, before our election. I'm afraid that's an artificial deadline, and it may not be at all the right kind of time frame for what we need to try to accomplish.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Senator Clinton joins George Will and me here in the studio now. Welcome.

Thank you. Glad to be here.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) In that press conference, you also said we needed more troops, and that we had to be straightforward about what success would take in Iraq. In that vein, how many more troops are needed now, and how long should they stay?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, George, obviously, that is an issue that people have been talking about for a long time. You know, a lot of my colleagues, like Senator McCain and other have been saying it for many months.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Another division.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Exactly. We're in a real dilemma. As you saw on the front page of our newspapers just yesterday, you know, some of our divisions that are being rotated out have just been depleted, you know, not only in terms of their personnel and the energies that it takes to keep going, but the equipment that they have to recapitalize. What I have said is that I do think we need more troops. My preference would be that we look at the mix of troops that we have on the ground with respect to American forces, because over and over again I was told, we don't have enough intelligence, or civil affairs, or even MPs and engineers. But I still believe that we would be doing ourselves a great favor in the long run by trying to internationalize this and getting more troops on the ground from other countries who could be involved in this effort with us.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) But General Sanchez, General Abizaid, Secretary Rumsfeld, the president, all say we don't need any more troops. Were they telling you something different?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, what they say is that they don't need more troops, but everyone says we need a different mix of troops. And that's often lost. But I have to say that I understand why they don't want to have to move more troops in. Frankly, we're stretched so thin in our forces internationally, it's gonna be hard to find the troops that we would need to put into Iraq. I'm worried that we diverted too many troops out of Afghanistan and too many other assets. But the bottom line for me is what is our mission and how are we trying to do it? We did have enough troops on the ground to win militarily. Nobody doubted we were going to be successful, we have, as we've seen, the most extraordinarily successful military probably in the history of the world. We didn't have enough troops to dominate. Over and over again, I heard from Iraqis that why did we let the looting go on? I mean, that is still a huge issue for people. And I think part of it is that, you know, we had enough troops with respect to defeating Saddam Hussein, the Republican Guard, they didn't put up the kind of resistance that people feared, but we didn't have a big enough footprint to really dominate the country once the military victory was won.

GEORGE WILL, ABC NEWS

(Off Camera) Did the Iraqis you talked to say we should not have disbanded the Iraqi Army?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

You know, that's a really delicate issue. There are some people who obviously are glad that any remnant of the Baathists was -rooted out in that effort. I think the general opinion, though, is it was a mistake, that we could have de-Baathitized the upper ranks of the military. But to turn loose men with weapons and no payment for months was not only a practical error, but on an emotional or psychological basis, it sent the wrong message to people. You know, I, I look at some of the incidents of terrorism with the former regime loyalists and, obviously, could we have avoided some of that, prevented them from joining up and coming after us if they had felt they had a stake in Iraq's future? I mean hindsight's 20/20, but I think we, we might have been able to do some better planning.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) You say you're worried that domestic politics here may be driving our timetable and that we may leave before the job is done. What's the job? Is, the administration says Iraq is going to be a transformational moment in the whole region. We're going to bring democracy. Is that realistic?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, George, I've been reading some of what you've been saying and I know you recently gave a speech in New York raising some serious questions about that. I think the jury is out. We don't know. But let's have more modest goals. Let's try to stabilize Iraq first. Let's try to stabilize Afghanistan first. One of the reasons I went to Afghanistan is, as one soldier said to me, welcome to the forgotten front line in the war against terrorism. You know, we have a huge job in front of us to try to bring security and some kind of stable government to Afghanistan. Iraq, the job is clear to everybody because it's still on our minds and on the front lines everyday.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) But the president gave a speech a month ago said, to use a phrase from Ronald Reagan, said, we don't want to be guilty of cultural condescension, the prerequisites of democracy exist in Iraq. Do they?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I think wherever there are human beings who aspire to freedom and a better life for themselves and their children, we have to expect that the ingredients are there. But we know that stirring up the recipe and producing something that is digestible ...

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) But did they aspire to ...

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

... is a very long term project.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) Do they aspire to freedom as we understand it, or do they want a theocracy? Do they want ...

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

We don't know that.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) ... a secular state?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

We don't know that yet.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) How do we find out?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I think we find out by trying to have a more responsible internationalized transition. If it -you know, I, the sense I had is that many Iraqis are afraid we'll leave too soon and resent that we may stay too long. So, how do we strike the right balance? And, clearly, we don't have on the ground in Iraq the kind of ingredients for stability that many people, before the military action, said we did. So, there was a lot of miscalculation and, and, frankly, inept planning that we're now living with the consequences.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) You've raised the, the suggestion that this timetable is being driven by politics. And I want to show you something that was written in this morning's "New York Times" by Lucian Truscott who's with the 101st Airborne.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Voice Over) He said that "A colonel in Baghdad, who will go nameless here for obvious reasons, told me just after I arrived that senior Army officers feel every order they receive is delivered with next November's election in mind. So, there's little doubt at and near the top about who is really being used for what over here. The resentments in the ranks toward the civilian leadership in Baghdad and back in Washington is palpable." Is that what you found and do you believe the timetable is being driven by politics?

Well, George, I hope not. I raise it because, just as Mr. Truscott reports in "The New York Times," I got a sense of that. That some people, particularly with the abrupt change in plans about when we were going to try turn over ...

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) They were telling you this?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

... sovereignty. In so, in so many words, yes. I mean, nobody came out and said that, but a lot of people said to me, you know, we're worried that we're not gonna have the time to do the job right, however the job is defined. And look at the timetable we now have. After the first of the year in Iraq, we're going to be confronting the hajj, right? February. Start, you know, the planning and the pilgrimage will start mid-January going into February. There is a pent-up demand among Iraqis to make the pilgrimage to Mecca. There will be many people wanting to cross the borders from other places, their neighbors, wanting to go through Iraq to get there. We have the rotation of our troops starting in March and April. Many of the best relationships, and certainly the best work that's been done in Iraq on the ground, has been done by the US military. You know, starting with our general officers all the way down to our sergeants, they're the ones who have fixed the schools, fixed the hospitals, stood up the local governments. They're going to be leaving. And, you know, relationships and building trust is hard in any society, but imagine what it's like in this one.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) So, how long do you think the troops have to stay?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, you know, we're still in Germany. We're still in South Korea. We're certainly still in Bosnia and Kosovo. What do we want to accomplish? I mean, obviously this has been somewhat of a moving target on the administration's part as to why we went in in the first place and, and what it is we're trying to accomplish, but I think now that we're there, we have no choice.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Years, not months.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

We own this issue. There is no doubt that we're going to be there for years. Now, in what form we're going to be there, are we going to be there working side by side with a sovereign government that can bring stability and can avoid some of the pitfalls that any society will have on the road to a democracy? I don't know. Will we remain there as an occupier? I hope not.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) If the Shiite majority says, fine, it's our turn, we want a Shiite theocracy, do we say, well, that's a choice? That's a, majority rules and you rule.

Well, that's one of the most difficult questions facing this whole enterprise, and when the president or anyone else speaks about democracy, we have to ask our questions, what do we mean by democracy? Do we mean what we call here a liberal democracy where we have due process, where we have protection for minority rights, where we have a separation between church or mosque and state? Or if the majority rules and the majority happens to be of one particular religious or ethnic persuasion, they get to call all the shots? I think part of what should be underway is an effort to educate people about democracy. You know, in Afghanistan, we are a little closer, although it's still a very insecure environment. They're about to have their constitutional Loya Jirga. I mean, they have been slowly but steadily trying to educate people about what it is. We're still facing enormous odds in trying to stand up something we would consider a democratic government, but we're making progress there. You know, when I was being briefed in Baghdad, the coalition provisional authority kept referring to comparisons with Germany, and even showed us a chart saying, well, you know, look, we're ahead of where we were in Germany. We have a central bank up and going. And then you looked at one line, how long did it take to get a government in Germany? Ten years. And I think that we need to level with the American people in terms of what the costs are going to be, and the difficulty of this undertaking. Yes, it is a noble endeavor to try to provide the building blocks for a stable democratic regime in that part of the world. But let's not kid ourselves. We are going against history and culture and ethics and, you know, tribal loyalties and religious differences. Does that mean it can't be done? No. I agree that we should do everything we can to be successful. But does it mean we can do it in six months? You know, instill Jeffersonian or Madisonian democracy in that period of time? I think that's unrealistic.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Let's talk about President Bush. You were in Houston this week and I want to show our viewers something "The Houston Chronicle" reported you said.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) "President Bush has not only been radical and extreme in terms of Democratic presidents, but in terms of Republican presidents, including his own father. His administration is making America less free, fair, strong, smart than it deserves to be in a dangerous world." Radical, extreme, less free, strong, smart. Those are very tough words. Is that really what you said?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

It certainly is what I said and it is what I mean. I think we are dealing with an administration that has thrown over the consensus building and the bipartisan agreement that basically built the 20th century America that I'm very proud of, and I'm a product of. And, yes, you know, there may have been people more to the right or more to the left, but if you look at the efforts that were made starting in the 1930s to save capitalism from itself, to put us on the right track, to have the kind of middle class that would grow and provide ladders of opportunity for anybody willing to work hard, you look at how we build up alliances, the painstaking, frustrating work of working with other nations around the world, I don't think that this president had a mandate to do that coming out of the 2000 election.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) But if, but if you look at the president's main policies, Iraq, the tax cut, Medicare, in each case, he had significant support from Democrats. 29 Democrats on the Iraq resolution, a dozen on his tax cut, 11 just now on the Medicare prescription drugs. If these policies are so radical and extreme, why are so many Democrats going along?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I voted for the Iraq resolution as you might remember. And I'm a strong believer in giving the executive authority. I wish that when my husband was president people in the Congress had been more willing to recognize presidential authority. You recall, we didn't get authority to go into either Bosnia or Kosovo and I think that was a mistake. But I regret the way the president has used the authority. I mean, it's one thing to say, you know, we're heading down a road that is rooted in the values and ideals and practicalities of what got us to this point, looking back at previous administrations, and there was an expectation about how that authority would be used, which, you know, frankly, I'm, you know, disappointed that it wasn't.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) When you say that America is less free, are you referring to the Patriot Act?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

I'm referring to a combination of factors. I think there are serious questions about the Patriot Act. Again, I voted for it.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) Let me stop you right there.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Yes, sir.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) Dianne Feinstein recently said, Senator Feinstein, in a hearing, my office has received 21,434 complaints, and almost all of them were about Patriot Two, which hasn't even been submitted and isn't the law, and most of the other complaints just didn't bear out. I mean, is this, this is a part of the staple of campaign rhetoric during the presidential election, but who's less free because of the Patriot Act?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

We, you know, I -I didn't say just the Patriot Act and I, I want to make that clear. I think just this past week we had former members of the Bush administration raising really serious questions about holding American citizens incommunicado with no access to lawyers, no due process. I was delighted that people like Viet Dinh and others would raise these questions because these go far beyond, you know, Republican or Democrat. They really go to the heart of who we are as Americans. And I think that you can look and say, well, someone like Padilla who we fear was going to do us wrong doesn't deserve that anyway, but it's in moments like that that our values should be protected against undermining it for any reason.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) In, in your statement to the Houston paper, you said less free, less fair, less smart. How about ...

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

And less strong.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) How about safe, however. The, the big number is, well, if someone had said to you on 9/11, 2001, we're gonna two years and three months and zero additional attacks, I wouldn't have believed it. I don't know if you'd have believed it. Is this dumb luck or is it good government that has kept us safe?

It's a combination. And I have said repeatedly that we have made some real progress when it comes to homeland security. But we haven't done nearly enough according to any expert, any non-partisan, independent observer who has looked at what we've done since 9/11. Have we made ourselves safer? Yes, we have. We've done some good work that needed to be done. America was not in the mode of vigilance. I remember back during the 1980s reading research about how scientists and, and others had gone and left unattended baggage in Canada and Europe and Japan and the United States. Everywhere else people saw it, they reported it. We walked by it. We kicked it out of the way. So, we've changed attitudes. We've put into place some of the building blocks for greater security, but we have a long way to go.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Let's turn to presidential politics for a moment. Howard Dean is electrifying, I'm not going to ask you yet. First Howard Dean. John Breaux was on the program, Senator Breaux last week. Southern Democrat, Louisiana. Here's what he said about Howard Dean.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Do you think the Democratic party needs a stop Dean movement? Could you support him over President Bush?

SENATOR JOHN BREAUX, DEMOCRAT, LOUISIANA

Well, he wouldn't be my choice. I mean, I, you know, it's a question of not doing anything or supporting a candidate that you strongly believe in. And I think he is not my first choice as I've clearly indicated and I think that if he does not moderate his views it's going to be very difficult in a general election, particularly in my part of the country which is the South.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) So, he basically said he'd sit on the sidelines if Howard Dean got the nomination. Do you share the concern expressed by him and other Southern Democrats about the viability of Dr. Dean?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

No. I think we've got a very vigorous campaign for the nomination going on right now, and I'm sure you remember, George, back in December of 1991, we had candidates, including my husband, who were, you know, barely breaking the surface ...

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Actually, December was going pretty well.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, December, but still you were like 2 percent nationally, 4 percent. I mean, it was nothing. And then, even when he got the, finally clinched the nomination in June at the California primary, people were saying it's a disaster, he'll never win, we can't do this. These are, this is extremely volatile, fast-changing situation, and I think our, our goals should be to stand behind whoever the nominee turns out, because whoever our nominee is will be, in my view, a better president than four more years with no accountability, no election at the end of it, than the current administration.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) But your husband was a Southern Democrat who actively tried to move the party into the center, and it doesn't seem that's exactly what Howard Dean is doing right now.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I think that, you know, we just have to wait to see how it emerges. And I'm not going to comment on the races that anybody's running because I know how difficult it is to actually pull together the -delegates you need to win at the convention, but then we'll see where it goes from there.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) Senator Breaux speaks as a Southerner. We have a graphic here to show you. These are electoral votes 1968 through 2000.

graphics: presidential elections 1968-2000

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) There have been 1,385 of them. Republicans have won more than 80 percent of them. Now, that's a big load to carry going into an election. Is Howard Dean, who is going to campaign down there on three things, I guess, civil unions, you're undertaxed and the war is wrong. Are those three things going to help you down south?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I don't think he'd agree with that characterization, but, you know, I'm going to wait to see ...

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) What did I, what did I get wrong?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

But, George, I'm gonna wait to see who the nominee is because I don't want to comment on any one of them. This is nowhere near done. I mean, I remember the Monday before the New Hampshire primary being told that Bill Clinton would be lucky if he broke into double digits. So, I am very skeptical of all of this commenting and Monday morning quarterbacking about people's campaigns. I think people have to be allowed to actually vote and express an opinion in a primary or caucus. We'll see who emerges from that and then we'll see what they do for the general -election campaign.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) But there's rather a torrent of good economic news right now. I don't know. You've got some numbers on this?

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) We actually don't have them now, but President Bush is out there all week, high productivity, high economic growth, unemployment starting to inch down. How do Democrats make the case?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I think there is both a present and a future case to be made. Certainly, the job growth was disappointing and has not really returned, and I see no way that this president will not end up in November of 2004 with a net job loss. But there's also a responsibility to look beyond the present and look at what has been set in motion by this administration that will cause us to have long- term economic problems that will basically be transferring huge amounts of debt and burden onto the backs of our children. Now, some people say we can't make that case. I, I give the American people more credit than that. I think that having lived through the huge deficits of the '80s, having seen what Bill Clinton did to reverse our fortunes and what it meant in terms of job creation, I don't think people will be reluctant to look at the future economically, too.

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) Factory jobs are indeed down 16 percent, but American factories are producing more than ever before. Steel jobs since 1982 down 76 percent and more steel is being produced today because American workers are more productive. Isn't the job story, the difficulty in creating more jobs, good news. That America is now more productive than ever before?

Well, I suppose it depends if I'm, whether you're one of those without a job. I mean, one of the problems ...

GEORGE WILL

(Off Camera) 95 percent have jobs.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, but one of the problems are some very long-term, persistent under and unemployment among many populations in the country. And we're now seeing outsourcing of, of not just manufacturing jobs, and not even just service jobs, but increasingly high value, highly paid jobs. This administration has no economic policy, the best I can determine, except cut taxes. I don't think that's an adequate answer to what we face in this global economy. And I would hope that that will be part of the debate. What is it we're going to do, not just to have jobs, but to continue the standard of living that gave the American middle class the greatest run of prosperity in the history of the world? That is at risk. Now, there are people like us who are, you know, members of the kind of affluent intelligencia, or whatever we want to call ourselves, who can manipulate, you know, numbers, and symbols, and words, and the like, and there may be a place for us no matter what happens. That is not the case. I represent Upstate New York, which has had an exodus of jobs. These are good people, they're hard working people, they built this country. There is no real overriding policy that's going to bring back that kind of prosperity and I think we were on the road to doing that under the Clinton administration, and we've reversed course.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) We only have a minute left and I can't let you go without one final political question. I know you said you're not gonna run, no way, no how, but one question. The nominee comes to you in July, has all this polling, he's run it by your pollster and says, Senator Clinton, if you join the ticket, Democrats can win this race. If you don't, they can't, will you accept?

That is not going to happen, George. That is so, that is so, that is so far ...

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) That is not a no. It could happen.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

... out of the realm of the possible. That, that is not going to happen. Look, I'm going to support the nominee, and I think we've got at least a 50/50 if not slightly better chance of winning. And I know that's not something that people around Washington necessarily agree with, and so I'm going to support the nominee. I hope we're going to have a victory. And then I'll support the nominee whoever it is, assuming that person does a good job for re-election in '08.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) And if you're on the ticket, please come back and talk to us about it. Senator Clinton, thank you very much.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Thank you both.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) When we come back, "The List" has Howard Dean on the hot seat. Stay with us.

JOHN ROBERTS, host:

And with us now is New York Senator Hillary Clinton.

Good to see you this morning. Thanks for coming in.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Thank you. Glad to be here, John.

ROBERTS: So Andy Card paints a pretty rosy scenario of what's going on in Iraq. Do you agree with him?

Sen. CLINTON: I think rosy scenario is alive and well in the White House these days based on what Mr. Card had to say. There are some things that are going right. My trip to Afghanistan and Iraq illustrated clearly to me that our troops are doing a great job under very difficult circumstances and that we are making some progress on the ground, but we have such a long way to go. And I think that one of the missing elements in our strategy thus far has been the president and the administration leveling with the American people about what it is we're up against, how long it's going to take, how much it's going to cost.

ROBERTS: This is a rare moment where you seem to at least be partially in agreement with Newt Gingrich.

Sen. CLINTON: Yes, I--I--I find myself amazed by that. I'm sure he's even more so. He has apparently written quite a critical piece of the administration's policy in Iraq, and in it...

ROBERTS: Accusing them of going over a cliff in the postwar period.

Sen. CLINTON: That's right, and pointed out some of the deficiencies in the--on-the-ground operation in Iraq. No reasonable person looking at the facts can't see that there are some real problems that we have to deal with. I don't think happy talk, you know, is a substitute for a policy. And maybe they'll listen to Newt Gingrich. They certainly haven't listened to anybody else.

ROBERTS: You've talked about the need to internationalize the operation there. What do you mean when you say internationalize? How--how could it be more internationalized than it is already? You already have troops from a number of different--different countries there. You have a number of different countries participating in the rebuilding.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, what I have in mind is something more on the order of both what we did in Bosnia and Kosovo in the Clinton administration and what we have been attempting to do in Afghanistan. You know, if you remember in Afghanistan, we had a--a conference in Bonn that brought together many of the leaders of Afghanistan. We put into place a process that led to a Loya Jirga that selected President Karzai which provided legitimacy within Afghanistan for the Karzai government. We have a NATO mandate which has given some real support to what we're doing in Afghanistan, although, frankly, I'm disappointed NATO hasn't stepped up with more forces and equipment.

But Afghanistan is not under the same kind of attack as Iraq because, in effect, it has to been internationalized even though clearly the United States military and the United States political leadership is still calling most of the shots. In Iraq, it is clearly an American operation. We do have allies, unfortunately not as many or in the numbers that we need, and we don't have, though, the international legitimacy that would really benefit us as we move toward some kind of governmental transition.

ROBERTS: But when you talk about bringing the United Nations in and giving over some control to the UN, I mean, how much control would you give them? Would--would you give them command of US troops? Would you let them oversee the elections?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think those are two very different questions. In the Afghan situation, of course, American troops are under American command even though NATO troops are in there and we want more NATO troops, and even though the UN will oversee the elections, there are many ways of working this out. The administration's stubborn refusal to try to enlist friends and allies to be partners in our effort in Iraq I think is undercutting the legitimacy and the potential success of what we are trying to accomplish.

And what I would recommend is that we do something along the lines of what we've done in Bosnia, Kosovo and Afghanistan: Convene the friends of Iraq, convene some kind of oversight that would provide legitimacy. I don't think it would hurt us in the least to have an international face on the political side of this. American military command would stay right where it belongs under American military leadership, but perhaps we could persuade if not NATO than others to come in with more security support as well as political, economic and reconstruction aid.

ROBERTS: The administration has set a timetable for June to try to stand up a provisional government in an effort to try to draw down troops. You've said that this appears to be happening on a--a political timetable. But is it not legitimate to try to stand up an Iraqi government as quickly as possible, and to begin to bring the troops home?

Sen. CLINTON: Absolutely. And what I've said is that I hope it's not on a political timetable, although I certainly heard from a lot of people in Iraq that that was the concern. And I know today a distinguished military expert has written in The New York Times--expressing what he heard on the ground in Iraq from many of the military commanders, that they feel many of the decisions are being pushed by our election timetable.

And look at our dilemma. Yes, we do need some kind of Iraqi governance that is viewed as legitimate and that can serve as a transition, because we know that we're not going to make the progress on the ground that we need until that's in place. But we've lost valuable time, and we don't have a bridge between the American occupation--which, remember, we declared as an occupation--and that sovereignty or governance in Iraq. That's why I think the international bridge makes sense.

Unfortunately, if you look at the next six months and the transition that has to be undertaken, we're facing some big challenges. You know, the hajj, the pilgrimage to Mecca, begins late January, February. There's going to be a pent-up demand in Iraq for people to go to Mecca. There are going to be a lot of pilgrims who are going to want to cross Iraq. That poses tremendous security challenges. And also, we've got to look at March and April, when the troops who've been on the ground, doing a fabulous job--they're the ones who, frankly, have fixed those schools and those hospitals and stood up those local governments. They're going to be leaving.

So just at the most critical moment that we expect to make a transition to something in June, the people who've developed the relationships, who have been primarily military, not civilian, are going to be leaving, and the Iraqis are going to have to deal with a whole new set of military commanders. And this is not just a job that's been done by generals. It's been done by other officers down through sergeants and privates. And it's really, something that I think we don't understand fully, the implications of making that transition at such a sensitive time.

ROBERTS: So just back to my original question--you--you have suggested that there's a political imperative here to try to get the troops out. One of the places where you--you made that claim was while you were on the ground in Iraq, and people accused you of playing politics...

Sen. CLINTON: Well...

ROBERTS: ...taking--taking that moment to criticize the president. In--in hind...

Sen. CLINTON: Well, actually, that...

ROBERTS: In hindsight, would--would you have criticized the president while you were on the ground in Iraq?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, let me correct the record, that it didn't happen. I know that's the--the latest flaming charge by the right wing. But that's not what happened. What happened is that when I was in Afghanistan and Iraq, speaking with a lot of our soldiers, who I think are doing an extraordinary job under dangerous and difficult circumstances, they asked me on one particular occasion, 'Well, you know, what do people think of us and what we're doing back home?' Now I'm not going to lie to an American soldier, particularly a soldier in the 10th Mountain Division from Ft. Drum, New York. And what I said is, 'I think you have universal support among the American people. They cannot be prouder of you. And there are questions being raised about the administration's policies.'

Now they know that. They get the Internet. They get the media. They're well aware of that. When I returned home, Senator Reed and I held a press conference, and in that I said that I heard from many people, both Iraqis and Americans, that they were concerned that the administration's policy, which has hardly been an example of 'steady as you go' and has instead been improvised and--and, frankly, the failure to plan for the post-military period has really undermined and hurt us--that there were questions being raised about whether this was really about what's best for the long-term stability of Iraq or what's best for the November elections. Other commentators are starting to say that, too, because they hear the same things that I heard on the ground.

ROBERTS: Let me just ask you one more question about Iraq, if I could. You were there right after the president made his clandestine trip to Iraq.

Sen. CLINTON: That's right.

ROBERTS: Your--your impressions of that, and should, as the Iraqi people have complained--should the president have tried to get out a little bit more?

Sen. CLINTON: I have said--I was in Afghanistan on Thanksgiving, and I think it's--it's terrific any time an American elected official, particularly the president, who is the commander in chief, goes out and sees our troops in a conflict zone. So I had nothing but positive response to the president taking the risks, which are genuine, because I know from my own trip that, you know, the security situation is not good.

ROBERTS: Well, could he have risked getting out from the airport or was it prudent for him to be there for two and a half hours and then fly back?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, I'm not going to second-guess the planning of the Secret Service and the White House staff. I just would say that it was terrific that he went, and I think it gave a--a boost to our troops.

Having said that, a trip is not a substitute for a plan, and the administration has not had a plan. And for the life of me, I don't understand that. During the time of my service on the Armed Services Committee, since last January, there have been numerous hearings and witnesses who came before us, both before and after the military action commenced. Time and again we would say, 'Well, how many troops are we going to need? How long will we have to be there? How much is it going to cost?' and we were told, 'Well, we don't know that.'

And, well, we didn't get the facts except that one moment when General Shinseki, to his great credit, said, 'You know, we're going to need 150,000 to 200,000 troops,' and he was called on the carpet. The Army chief of staff telling the truth, not only to the Armed Services Committee, but to the American people, and he was, I think, treated rudely and unfairly. But--but the problem is that they weren't just holding something back. Many of us thought, 'Well, you know, they don't want to share their plans.' They didn't have a plan, and that's what we are living in the aftermath of, unfortunately.

ROBERTS: I want to move on to a couple of other topics because we're beginning to run out of time already. Can you absolutely, or will you absolutely rule out a run for the presidency in 2004?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, I've said--said this so many times that--and--I--you know, I'm not running. I'm going to support who the nominee is. And I think we've got...

ROBERTS: So you won't go back on that?

Sen. CLINTON: I...

ROBERTS: You can say absolutely not running next year?

Sen. CLINTON: I have said it over and over again. I think we've got at least a 50-50 chance for our nominee to win in November, and I'm going to do everything I can to elect the Democratic nominee.

ROBERTS: So who it? Is it--is it Howard Dean? Is he indelibly out in front now? I mean, he's obviously the person to beat. Can he be president?

Sen. CLINTON: John, I have learned a long time ago and--and sitting here now 12 years after December of 1991 when my husband had, I don't know, 2 or 3 percent in the polls, and even in the months after that, nobody thought he could win. I don't make any guesses. It's really up to the people who go to the trouble to vote in primaries and attend caucuses. I think we've got a vigorous campaign going on. I believe the person who will emerge from that is going to be in a good position to take on President Bush.

ROBERTS: Is Dean the sort of person that you could support?

Sen. CLINTON: I'm going to support the nominee. I am excited about this campaign. I'm not at all discouraged by, you know, the second-guessing that goes on here in Washington because having now been out in the country and having talked with a lot of people because of my--my book tour over the last many months, there's a tremendous unease about the direction this administration is taking our country. And if you just compare where we were and where we are now in the last three years, are we safer, are we stronger, are we fairer, are we better than we were? I think the answers to those questions are going to give a lot of people pause.

ROBERTS: Let me talk about the Democrats, if I could, for a second here. They--they seem to have had a lot of trouble in the legislative process recently. There's been a tremendous number of Republican victories. I think I--I read an article that said it very eloquently that on the Medicare bill, Democrats got steamrolled by their own steamroller. Why are they in such disarray? Why are the Republicans getting everything they want?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, first of all, the majority in both houses of Congress have tremendous power. You know, I've only been in the Senate a little less than three years. I've been in the minority, the majority and the minority. And the majority has an extraordinary ability to set the agenda. And once the agenda is set, it may not be your agenda, you have to react to that agenda. So I think on--on many grounds, the Democrats have ameliorated the most extreme versions of the right-wing agenda coming out of the Republican leadership and the White House. But it's a difficult position to be in. And I still believe that the majority of Americans are more in agreement with the policies of the Democratic Party, but we have to do a better job of communicating that.

ROBERTS: One of the big social issues that--that may rise to the surface next year is this idea of gay marriage. You've--you've said that you're in favor of civil unions. Are you still opposed to gay marriage?

Sen. CLINTON: I am, you know, for many reasons. I think that the vast majority of Americans find that to be something they can't agree with. But I think most Americans are fair. And if they believe that people in committed relationships want to share their lives and, not only that, have the same rights that I do in my marriage, to decide who I want to inherit my property or visit me in a hospital, I think that most Americans would think that that's--that's fair and that should be done.

ROBERTS: Would you be opposed to a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage?

Sen. CLINTON: Yes, I think that would be a--a terrible step backwards. It would be the first time we've ever amended the Constitution to deny rights to people. And I think that should be left to the states. You know, I find it hard to believe in one program I'm agreeing with Newt Gingrich, now I'm about to agree with Dick Cheney. But I think Vice President Cheney's position on gay marriage is--is the right one.

ROBERTS: Well...

Sen. CLINTON: You know, leave it to the states. Let the states decide what's in their constitutions, what is in their legislative agendas and let it go forward from there.

ROBERTS: Well, those two items if nothing else, are news. Senator Clinton, thanks for being with us this morning. Good luck at the Grammy Awards.

Sen. CLINTON: Oh, bless your heart.

ROBERTS: Your nomination for "A Living History."

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you so much.

ROBERTS: All right. Take care.

And we'll be back in just a moment.

(Announcements)

REMARKS BY SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY) TO THE COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, 12/15/2003

TOPIC: HER RECENT TRIP TO IRAQ AND AFGHANISTAN

MODERATOR: RICHARD HAASS, PRESIDENT, COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS

LOCATION: THE COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, NEW YORK, NEW YORK

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you very much, Richard, and it's delightful to be here this morning and to have this opportunity to speak with all of you.

I want to thank Richard and congratulate him for his transition from government to the council and especially for his role in the Northern Ireland peace process, which has been a vitally important one, on behalf of our country.

I also want to extend my best wishes -- and, I'm sure, the best wishes of all of us here -- to Secretary Colin Powell, who, it was announced this morning, will be having surgery for prostate cancer. And I think all of us send him not only our warmest wishes but our gratitude for his public service and his continuing contributions to our country.

You know, it is a great opportunity for me here in New York, before this prestigious body, to speak about where we find ourselves with respect to foreign policy. And I think it's appropriate to put it into the context of a quote that I agree with, that was made by the former council president, Leslie Gelb, who said that the purpose of the Council on Foreign Relations, as an organization, is to promote American internationalism based on American interests.

We stand at a point in time where we are now in the process of redefining both American internationalism and American interests. That probably would have been inevitable, because the process of adjusting to the changes at the end of the Cold War, the extraordinary advances in technology and globalization, the spread of so many problems globally, most prominently terrorism, would certainly have brought that about.

But it is also true that given our reaction to the events of September the 11th and to our missions in Afghanistan and Iraq and other problems that we face around the world, what was a description by Leslie Gelb has become an imperative, and an imperative not just for those in elected office, not just in the administration or the Congress, but, I would argue, for a much broader debate amongst our citizenry. There's a role for the private sector to play that I think has been neglected over the last several years. There's a role, certainly, for academia and not-for-profit organizations. There's a role for every segment of our society.

As we look out around the world and attempt to define internationalism and American interests, we certainly have our work cut out for us. But it is a timely discussion and one that we ignore at our peril.

When we were attacked on September the 11th and when we lost nearly 3,000 men, women and children, for many Americans, that was also a loss of innocence and a sense of invulnerability. I remain absolutely confident in our eventual victory over the forces of terror, but I also believe that we have our work cut out for us and that what we face is a long-term challenge that not only is external but internal, as we define who we are, what our values should be in the face of this new threat.

It is true that I am confident about the outcome, but I worry about the cost. I worry about the price being paid by young men and women in uniform fighting in difficult terrain. I worry about our brave first responders, who we will once again expect to answer the call of duty should we face another attack on our shores. And I worry about the fear that I see among so many of our citizens, a fear that is understandable but one which, unfortunately, may very well undermine the values that have made us so strong, so optimistic, for so long.

As you know, I recently returned from places where Americans are risking their lives. Foremost are military forces, but also civilians who have answered the call of duty as well. Hundreds have been killed and thousands grievously injured. With my colleague on the Senate Armed Services Committee, Jack Reed of Rhode Island, we were privileged to spend Thanksgiving with our troops in Afghanistan and then go on to Iraq. I was especially pleased that I could visit the 10th Mountain Division soldiers who are on the front lines in Afghanistan and could bring over 3,000 letters from school children here in New York expressing their thanks and telling the soldiers what it meant to them that they were there defending their freedom as well.

I know that a short trip such as the one that I took is only a snapshot, but it is a snapshot that both confirmed much of what I already believed and had learned from the countless briefings and other committee work and much of the attention that has been focused on Iraq and Afghanistan, but it also opened my eyes and led me to think a little bit differently about some of what we should be doing.

It is essential that we win this war against these borderless terrorists, but it is, I believe, critical that we once again recommit ourselves to that American internationalism that I mentioned in the beginning. For more than a half a century, we know that we prospered because of a bipartisan consensus on defense and foreign policy. We must do more than return to that sensible, cooperative approach. I think we should be in the midst of working to reform the institutions and alliances that we historically have been part of, revamping agreements that we reached in the past that may no longer be as timely and effective as we would hope, working and examining relationships around the world not because it's a good thing to do, not because it worked in the 20th century, but because it remains as essential today as it was in the past in order to meet the 21st (sic) challenges of terror and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

We obviously need to build a world with more friends and fewer terrorists. The question is, how do we do that? Everyone agrees on the goal, but what are the strategies most likely to result in success?

Turning to Iraq, yesterday was a good day. I was thrilled that Saddam Hussein had finally been captured. Like many of you, I was glued to the television and the radio as I went about my daily business. We owe a great debt of gratitude to our troops, to the president, to our intelligence services, to all who had a hand in apprehending Saddam. Now he will be brought to justice, and we hope that the prospects for peace and stability in Iraq will improve.

I was especially pleased that the capture was led by the 4th Infantry Division, whom I visited in Kirkuk and had a a briefing from the commander, General Odierno, and during that briefing was given some insights into the efforts to apprehend Saddam. And it's very good news indeed that they have come to fruition.

This moment, however, cannot be just about congratulating ourselves and the Iraqi people for this capture. It should be a moment where we step back and consider how now to go forward. What is it we can do today, based on the circumstances of yesterday, that will strengthen our hand and move the Iraqis closer to a time when they can have self-government and create a stable, free, democratic Iraq?

I was one who supported giving President Bush the authority, if necessary, to use force against Saddam Hussein. I believe that that was the right vote. I have had many disputes and disagreements with the administration over how that authority has been used, but I stand by the vote to provide the authority because I think it was a necessary step in order to maximize the outcome that did occur in the Security Council with the unanimous vote to send in inspectors. And I also knew that our military forces would be successful. But what we did not appreciate fully and what the administration was unprepared for was what would happen the day after.

It has been a continuing theme of my criticism and others that we would be further along, we would have more legitimacy, we would diminish the opposition and resentment that is fueling whatever remains of the insurgency if we had been willing to move to internationalize our presence and further action in Iraq. I believe that today. And in fact, I think that we now have a new opportunity for the administration to do just that.

We could, if the administration were to be so inclined, open the door to a stronger and wider coalition that would help us rebuild and safeguard Iraq and provide a transition to self-government. As President Bush said in his remarks to the nation yesterday, the capture of Saddam, while extremely important, does not signal the end of this conflict. The violence is likely to continue. It's unclear whether it will spike up or whether it will diminish, but we know it will remain, and therefore, all Americans and international aid workers and Iraqis remain at risk.

So what could we do to try to take advantage of this moment in time? Well, I have both some suggestions and some questions. First, I am worried about the administration's announced plans to transfer sovereignty to the Iraqis by next July, the way that those plans have been announced and how they would proceed.

The process coincides with the first major troop rotation, meaning that thousands of seasoned American forces will be withdrawing precisely during the time of great domestic sensitivity and even perhaps increased peril. That could be a recipe for disaster.

I and others have questioned the confluence of those two events, and having been on the ground, briefed by not just the generals but talking with colonels and captains and sergeants and privates, it is clear that much of the positive work that has been done in Iraq has been done by our military forces. They have been rebuilding the schools. They have been reopening the hospitals. They have been creating the relationships on the ground with Iraqis. Sitting in a meeting with the members of local governing councils in Kirkuk, it was abundantly clear that their primary relationship is with the military forces that are based there.

And so we not only create the inevitable dislocation that occurs when you're moving thousands of men, women and equipment, but also the destruction of those relationships, that trust that is so hard to build up over time.

So it is clear to me that we are going to have a lot of concerns that have to be addressed if this turnover is to occur smoothly. It would be difficult enough, but we also have no idea how the local people in the various parts of Iraq are going to react to this, because the plan laid out by the administration does not really go to an immediate transfer of political power, but a staging, through a caucus system, to create some kind of legitimate governance structure that can do the constitution and then oversee elections.

That was not at all clear to the people with whom I met in Kirkuk. They had the idea that come June or July, they would be in charge in Kirkuk and that they would have responsibility. And they were anxious to wield it, because they had felt particularly aggrieved over the many years of Saddam's rule, which focused often most harshly on the Kirkuk area.

It would be timely and, I think, appropriate to now create a bridge using international support and legitimacy, similarly to what we did in Bosnia and Kosovo. The timing would be appropriate. The American military would still be in charge and responsible for security, but we could begin to cede some of the hard political decision-making to an international presence.

Now as we look at the election process that is contemplated, Ambassador Bremer told Senator Reed and myself that he would very much like the United Nations to monitor the election process. I agree with that. But it will be very difficult to convince the United Nations to come in to help monitor an election process that it has nothing to do with setting up or creating the means of implementing. I can't believe that we could expect the United Nations to participate without some more authority and involvement. But now would be the time to try to create those conditions.

There are many other issues about our presence in Iraq and the transition that we are attempting to bring about. Among them are the continuing challenges that the Iraqi Civil Defense Force, the police force and the army face.

The Iraqi Civil Defense Force received high marks from both the civilian and military Americans on the ground. They're beginning to do quite a good job patrolling with Americans, as I saw in Kirkuk. But they need more training, they need vehicles, they need uniforms, they need communications equipment. We are further behind with respect to the Iraqi army, but again we can improve conditions there by increasing the pay and the prestige in order to stop the widespread resignation -- as high as 20 percent -- that is occurring.

We also have to reconsider including Ba'athists who were Ba'athists in name only in positions of responsibility, such as teaching and the medical profession. When we disbanded the army, we disbanded the army of teachers and doctors and others who were compelled, in many instances, to join the party in order to practice their profession and continue their livelihood in Iraq under Saddam.

We are also going to be facing a tremendous movement of people throughout Iraq with the Hajj in late January and early February. There is a pent-up desire among many Iraqis to go to Mecca. So we will have thousands, if not millions, of people on the roads, moving across the country. We will also probably have people coming from Syria and Jordan and elsewhere. There is no way that I can imagine we could prevent that, but providing for the security that will be necessary during this period is an enormous undertaking. And it is only slightly before the date that the massive transfer and movement of our own troops take place. So first, dealing with the Hajj, and then secondly, dealing with our own troops, in mass numbers on the road in their equipment, poses another significant security challenge because, of course, as some troops are moving out, the other troops haven't yet come in. So we're going to be in a transition there, as well.

So the question that I was asked most frequently when I returned was, well, are you optimistic or pessimistic, and I have to confess that my answer is neither. I am both a little optimistic and a little pessimistic, but what I'm trying to do is be realistic about where we are and what we need to be successful. We have no option but to stay involved and committed.

To that end, I applauded both Secretaries Powell and Rumsfeld for their recent trip to NATO to persuade NATO to become involved in Iraq. This may be somewhat tardy, but it is very welcome. Unfortunately, there has not been a very positive response from NATO as of yet. At this point, I think, NATO -- and indeed, non-NATO allies -- have as much of a stake in the success of Iraq as we do. And therefore, they should be looking to work with the administration to create the opportunities that they can then pursue to become more involved in Iraq. It would be extremely important and it would remove the taint of this being an American occupation.

Secondly, I would strongly recommend we create some kind of organization -- call it what you will; the Iraq Reconstruction and Stabilization Authority, or whatever name is chosen.

It could include a proper role for NATO and for the U.N., which would replace the Coalition Provisional Authority, which would add both military and civilian resources so that this was not just an American occupation, and would provide more flexibility for us in achieving the timetable at whatever speed is appropriate to transfer sovereignty to the Iraqis.

Let me turn now to Afghanistan, a place I believe we have not paid sufficient attention to in recent months. And by "we," I refer to all of us -- citizens, the media, elected officials, the administration. And this point was crystalized for me when I was greeted by a soldier saying, "Well, senators, welcome to the forgotten front line of the war against terror."

Over the course of this past year, we've heard so much about Iraq, which is understandable, and so little about Afghanistan, which is not. Afghanistan, I don't need to remind New Yorkers or any Americans, is the place where September 11th was conceived and implemented. It was and still is the place where al Qaeda was based, where its terrorists were trained, where Osama bin Laden lives, there and across the border in Pakistan.

We went in fast and strong in 2001, toppling the Taliban and scattering al Qaeda, and we made tremendous progress in helping a new government form. But too soon, the eyes of the administration moved from Kabul to Baghdad and we began pulling out resources -- troops, intelligence -- and shifting them to Iraq. We reduced our troop commitment substantially. In fact, we had more law enforcement personnel on duty in Salt Lake City for the 2002 Olympics than we have soldiers in all of Afghanistan today.

Now, forgetting Afghanistan seems to come easy to us. We've done it before, leaving a vacuum after a regime was toppled. That was 1989. And after years of helping and equipping and financing Afghan and foreign rebels that were supported by Arab Mujaheddin whom we essentially created -- such as Osama bin Laden -- to combat the Soviet occupiers, we pulled back. After the Soviets left, we washed our hands and we walked away. And we know the results. Having failed to leverage whatever influence we might have had in 1989, by the mid- 1990s, we had no influence on the Taliban, and less-than-useful influence with Pakistan, who had been the primary sponsor of the Taliban.

Now, some of us spoke out about the excesses of the Taliban regime, especially its treatment of women, and the Clinton administration did attempt, through military action with missiles, to ferret out bin Laden and his training camps. In the years that followed, the government looked for efforts, covert and overt, to try to hit bin Laden, but he was, as he is today, an elusive enemy.

September 11th gave us the opportunity as well as the obligation to do what there had been no domestic or international consensus to do before we were attacked on our own shores: to go into Afghanistan and to try to root out both the Taliban and al Qaeda. We cannot afford to make the same mistake that we made in 1989, yet I fear we might unless we ramp up our involvement in this forgotten front-line land in the war against terror.

First, here we have a commitment from NATO. We were given that commitment, and after some back and forth with the administration, it has been decided that NATO will expand its commitment of troops and equipment. But it has not yet happened. When we were in Kabul, we couldn't even find anybody in the command structure of NATO with whom to speak. When Secretaries Powell and Rumsfeld went to NATO to request assistance with respect to Iraq, Lord Robertson responded, "Well, first we have to fulfill our commitment in Afghanistan." I could not agree more. There is a structure in Afghanistan. We have troops of many nations, including from those that did not support us in Iraq, most notably France and Germany, and we should make sure that the Article 5 commitment is fulfilled in Afghanistan.

Second, we have to do more along the Afghan-Pakistan border. And we were reminded yesterday, with the assassination attempt on President Musharraf, how difficult that effort to control that border remains. We met with President Musharraf at around midnight on Thanksgiving night, after coming from our visits in Kabul, Bagram and Kandahar. And he is a man in a very difficult position. He has been a very vocal and helpful ally to the United States in the war against terror. He has for the first time attempted to put troops into the tribal areas along the border in Pakistan. But he faces considerable risks at moving more effectively against the Taliban and the al Qaeda. We have to support him in every way that we possibly can, and we have to make clear that we need and expect that support.

We know that new training camps have sprung up across the border in Pakistan. We know that new jihadists are being recruited on a regular basis. We know that the madrasses, which become the not only educational facility but the indoctrination tool for between 600,000 and 700,000 young men in Pakistan, are a rich breeding ground for future terrorists.

(Short audio break) -- support President Musharraf is not just with more military equipment, as important as that may be and as much as he may want it, but we should be doing more to help him deal with the educational shortcomings in Pakistan that drive families to turn their young boys over to madrasses. There are no other schools in many of these areas. And because it is a dangerous and largely ungovernable area, it is difficult to recruit teachers and to put in the equipment, the curriculum that could provide an alternative to the indoctrination of the madrasses.

I spoke about that with President Musharraf. He is well aware of it. They are attempting to address it. But this is a rich and important potential area of cooperation not just for the United States but for the larger world community.

Third, we have to continue our close efforts with President Karzai and the United Nations to assure that the constitutional loya jirga that is going on as we speak, and then the elections that are planned to follow in June or July, will stay on track and will provide a real means for the Afghan people to express their newly found freedom and to create a governing structure that will try to unify this disparate land.

I'm heartened by the news that the loya jirga has commenced, but the news reports that I've seen have been also very touching to me because some of the officials running the loya jirga have said, "Well, the delegates came together and all they wanted to talk about was when will we get a new school, when will we get a new health clinic, how will we get some help for the people who have no money and no means for income?" You cannot proceed, in my opinion, on just the track of electoral, constitutional, governmental effort.

There has to be a comparable parallel track that tries to provide tangible results for the Afghan people about the improvements in their lives.

I suggested to President Karzai that he could perhaps think about adopting some signature issue that would send a clear signal to all Afghans, whether they be Tajik or Pashtun or Uzbek or whatever, that their president was thinking about them and where they lived and the challenges they faced. Because of my strong conviction that attention paid to the role and development of women is the most effective investment one can make, I suggested an effort to try to improve maternal health.

You know, women have always been at the fulcrum of Afghani politics and reaction. It happened in the early part of the 20th century, when the kings of Afghanistan attempted to modernize Afghanistan and pick as one of the principal objectives the more fully participating role of women. And that caused a backlash, which led to all kinds of reaction in the tribal areas. One of the reasons why we were able to marshal the Mujaheddin and the warlords against the Soviets is because the Soviets tried to provide more opportunities for women.

So women's roles is a critical point as to whether there can be a stable, free, democratic Afghanistan. If we were to focus on improving maternal health, that is an objective that is not in any way contradictory to the concerns of the most traditional, as well as the hopes of the most modern Afghans.

I was told that the hospital in Kabul delivers 200 babies a day. That is an astonishing number. And they do it in very difficult circumstances. We could cut in half the maternal death rate in Afghanistan, which is the highest in the world, with relatively little money.

The next step would be more difficult and expensive, but to clearly send a signal that the United States, President Karzai, all of us around the world wish the people of Afghanistan, particularly the mothers of Afghanistan, well would be a political and strategic statement, as well as a humanitarian one. Afghans need better schools, they need more health clinics, and they're expressing that at the loya jirga.

Finally, we have to address the drug problem in Afghanistan. The country produces more opium than any place in the world -- some for export and some, unfortunately, for increasing use right there in Afghanistan.

The consequences are bad all the way around -- for users, wherever they might be; for those who will contract HIV from sharing needles; and for the stability of the Afghan government, because of the role that the warlords and the drug traffickers play in obtaining the results of selling the opium and then having money flow to terrorists and criminal cartels.

There are many other issues of concern that were raised with us: the imbalance of Pashtuns and Tajiks in the army, and the lack of Pashtuns in the government; the touchy relationship between India and Pakistan and Afghanistan, which cannot be permitted to become another proxy for their ongoing conflict.

But the overriding immediate objective of our foreign policy must be to significantly step up our military engagement, preferably through greater involvement from NATO, and then ramp up our domestic involvement by funding education and health care, and putting in place an aggressive anti-drug strategy.

We simply cannot afford to let Afghanistan slip once again into chaos and become a haven for terrorists and drug lords and criminals.

Finally, with regard to both Iraq and Afghanistan, we need more of something that is often in short supply here in our country: patience. I was struck, during our briefing at the embassy in Kabul, by a comment made by one of our U.S. aid workers, who had recently returned from the Southeast and had met with a number of former Taliban, so-called former Taliban. And one of these former Taliban said, "Americans may have all the watches, but we have all the time." I think it's a lesson that we forget at our peril. This will not be an easy undertaking. It will require patience, and it will require the continuing support of the American people.

I was struck, in my briefing with Ambassador Bremer -- his frequent reference to the American occupation in Germany. I think we've all heard Secretary Rumsfeld, Secretary Wolfowitz and others refer to the German example. There certainly are lessons to be learned from that, and in some respects we have actually exceeded the time line in place there. The banking system is further along than it was at the time in the post-World War II era in Germany. There is a central bank that's up and going, to some extent.

But it took 10 years to create a stable, sovereign government, and we still have troops in Germany, as we do in Japan, as we do in South Korea, as we do in Bosnia, as we do in Kosovo. So the idea that we can somehow bring about dramatic transformational change in either a short period of time or with a relatively limited financial commitment is contradicted by our own history. And therefore we have not only the need for patience but a sense that we are going to be involved over the long run, or we will not guarantee or create the conditions for potential success.

There are a lot of lessons that perhaps we can learn from already looking back at Iraq and Afghanistan. The overriding lesson I take away is the need for international support. And that has become almost a mantra, and people say it, and no one's quite sure what it means, but everyone keeps saying it. But to me, it is clear that just as we were reminded with the quote that I recited from Leslie Gelb that our interests are often embedded in American internationalism, I think have seen that clearly.

The irony is that while the administration was quite dismissive of broader international support before the war in Iraq and until relatively recently, the recent moves to try to obtain NATO support, the appointment of James Baker signal without -- (off mike) -- broaden the international involvement. That certainly seems appropriate, and not just because it is the right thing to do, but because it is the smart thing to do. It is smart to have more people involved. It is smart to move toward multilateralism and away from unilateralism. It is smart to look at how we can get more people to have an ownership and participation interest in what we do.

And of course, that has been undermined in this last week by the by the administration's announcement, very publicly, that they were going to be cutting allies out of reconstruction contracts. Well, I think all of us can agree that American firms should be given preference. The extent of our role in toppling and capturing Saddam Hussein, the risks and losses incurred by our troops and our civilians, the hefty contribution of our taxpayers, the domestic economic situation that we face all argue for preference for American firms.

But the idea of so publicly prohibiting other nations from competition is unnecessarily antagonistic and may hinder our ability to gain support for such causes as debt relief and the fulfillment of financial commitments that were made at the Madrid conference.

We already have a profound problem with how we are perceived today in the world, including among many of our traditional allies with whom we have a lot of shared values in common. And I have to add that no-bid contracts to the likes of Halliburton here at home does not help our government's image abroad, nor when it appears that taxpayers may be disadvantaged does it help our government's image at home, either.

And finally, let me just end with a few remarks about what we need to do to maintain domestic support for the patience that is required and the commitment that we've undertaken, since failure is not an option. It is extremely important that the administration level with the American people about the costs and the sacrifices that will be required in Afghanistan, in Iraq and in the ongoing war against terror.

Many of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle have urged that the administration not only level with the American people but begin to talk about sharing sacrifice for this ongoing commitment. The lack of call, the absence of a call to sacrifice and to share the burden has been quite telling. And compared with other points of danger and risk in our history, it stands alone. We have gone forward with not only huge tax cuts for the wealthiest among us -- now, of course, since my husband's making money, we're in that category -- (laughter) -- so I certainly am aware of it and the implications -- but the extraordinary deficit that we have now accumulated of a half a trillion dollars suggests that we are not serious about engendering and maintaining domestic support.

One cannot continue to expect the American people to postpone fixing up their own schools and hospitals or foregoing the kind of infrastructure improvements that are called for, in sewer systems and water treatment systems and the like, or continue to do less than is necessary in homeland security to protect our own citizens, without undermining the support for the long-term commitment in the war against terrorism.

I worry a lot about how difficult it will be in the political arena to stay the course. And I would hope that not only in more transparency and openness and candor with the American people, but in a rhetoric that matches the sacrifice made every day by our men and women in uniform we can begin to create a deep and lasting support for what is necessary to be done to protect ourselves and to spread our values around the world, over however many years it may take.

You know, when we look back on our own history and we think about the leaders who have led in the past and have summoned us to difficult goals, it is a great tribute to the American people that they responded to that call for sacrifice and duty. Now we don't have a draft, and it would be all too easy to begin viewing our military as a mercenary force, somebody else's son and daughter or husband and wife, when, I think it's fair to say, that these are the best of the best of our young people in this generation. And if we don't have those of us who are most able to give being called to, it is very easy not only to be apart from, but turn our backs on, the level of sacrifice that is still required.

We need a tough-minded, muscular foreign and defense policy, one that not only respects our allies and seeks new friends as it strikes at known enemies, but which is understood and supported by the majority of the American people. The consequences of unilateralism, isolationism and overtly expressed preemptive defense, I think, are severe. We will end up with fewer nations, fewer intelligence services and fewer law enforcement personnel internationally helping to protect us against attacks, fewer nations helping to counterattack when we are struck, and less leverage in advancing democracy, freedom, open markets and other values that we believe elevate the people of the world even as they protect our people here at home.

This is not to propound some golden rule of international affairs, because I think it's rooted in the intelligence and the success of the 20th century. The more we throw our weight around, the more we encourage other nations to join with each other as a counterweight. We have a lot of problems besides Iraq and Afghanistan on the horizon. The number one problem remains the spread of weapons of mass destruction and those falling into the hands of either rogue nations or borderless terrorists. And so we have to have a united front of the world that cares about life more than death; that consists of builders instead of destroyers, standing together, fighting together, working together.

It is important that we remember the admonition, more than 40 years ago, of Dwight Eisenhower against arrogance. President Eisenhower said that "the people of the world must avoid becoming a community of dreadful fear and hate, and be, instead, a proud confederation of mutual trust and respect." I think we should listen to such wise counsel from our history, if we are to lead in the 21st century in a way that is keeping with our values and our interests.

We have many, many reasons to work more closely together, but the most important are our children, our future grandchildren, all the children who deserve from this generation of leadership the same commitment to building a safer, more secure world that we inherited from the last generation.

Thank you very much. (Applause.)

MR. HAASS: Again, let me thank Senator Clinton.

What I'd like to do is abuse the prerogatives of the chair here and just try to get clarification on two issues or so, which were central to your talk, and then we'll open it up.

The first is on Iraq. You said, as I was listening, that we should not transfer sovereignty to the Iraqis until an appropriate time, and you argued, obviously, for internationalization, and you were worried about troop rotations. I was trying to deconstruct that. Were you saying, therefore, that we should delay beyond July 1 the program of transfer of sovereignty? And if so --

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think that we should transfer leadership when we have maximized the conditions for stability and success. That may be in June or July, but it also could be undermined by our troop rotation, which will be disrupting a lot of the relationships on the ground that are essential for the trust and confidence to be present that must undermine such a transition.

I think everyone agrees that we should move as quickly as possible, it's just the devil is in the details about what is possible. I think we could buy ourselves some time, particularly because of this massive transition that we are going to be in the midst of, by creating some authority or organization with international participation and legitimacy that would help to oversee this transition. And it is also important that we bring in the neighbors in the region, who have a stake in the stability of Iraq, to support the move toward self-governance.

The idea behind the administration's proposal that was originally adopted by the Governing Council, which then seemed to have some second thoughts, was a kind of caucus system with mostly appointed people coming to some agreement on how to write a constitution and then create the conditions for elections. That has been, as you know, strongly criticized by at least Ayatollah Sistani. I think that we would have a greater chance of dealing with the legitimate objections of the Shi'a, which clearly go to one man, one vote, and move toward some kind of bridge, an international bridge, a creation of an organization or, as I suggested, an Iraqi reconstruction and development authority, something that would put a non-American face on these decisions.

You know, it is quite difficult to deal with Ayatollah Sistani since no American has met with him, that I'm aware of, and it's all through intermediaries. And I think that there are lots of issues that remain open and unanswered that I'm not sure Americans alone can successfully deal with. But I think in a broader, more expanded coalition, we would improve the chances that we could.

MR. HAASS: Why don't I open it up. George? I'm sorry, if we can have people wait for the microphone and just very quickly state their name and their organizations.

Q George Schwab, National Committee on American Foreign Policy. Thank you very much, Senator, for your in-depth remarks.

I had one question. You mentioned very briefly danger of weapons of mass destruction. My question is, do you have any thoughts on how we should proceed with North Korea?

SEN. CLINTON: I do. I actually have spent an enormous amount of time trying to educate myself on this issue because I do think it is the number-one issue that we confront. And just briefly let me put North Korea into some kind of context.

And let me also recognize former congressman Ben Gilman, who is here, who has been a stalwart voice for internationalism during his time in the Congress and is now at the United Nations. And I deeply respect him and am delighted to see him.

You know, the administration's approach to weapons of mass destruction, I believe, is ill-considered, the efforts to both reject and undermine nonproliferation treaties, the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty and other international efforts, without anything replacing them. I mean, it's one thing to say we're not in favor of this set of agreements, but let's work together to try to create a new 21st century protocol that would more accurately reflect the dangers we face. The administration's lukewarm support of Nunn-Lugar, I think, is a very big mistake, and I hope we can remedy that, because it has proven effective in many instances. I think we can point to, you know, Ukraine, Belarus and other places.

I also think it's a mistake to undermine the International Atomic Energy Agency in the almost derisive way that sometimes comes from the administration. Instead, I think, again, we should be looking to support them where we can and looking to try to upgrade and change where we can't, and deal with one of the real loopholes in the, you know, regimes that they attempt to enforce, which is the continuing presence of spent-fuel rods in places that are dangerous to have them.

With respect to North Korea, I have a hard time figuring out what the administration policy is. On the one hand, we know that there is a group of what might be referred to as very hard-line, anti-North Korean officials who don't want any kind of bilateral talks and don't want any kind of United States agreement of any sort. And they point to the continuing flaunting of agreements going back to '94 with the Clinton administration and forward, that demonstrate to them there's no point in having an agreement with North Korea.

There are still some multilateralists who believe that we can get an agreement by having this process with China and Russia and others involved. And it kind of moves in fits and starts.

And there are those lonely few who think we ought to move quickly to reach some kind of agreement with North Korea because it's too dangerous not to.

I'm sort of in the last camp, I guess. You know, my view is that the 1994 agreement, insofar as we can track it, did have a positive effect with respect to spent fuel and plutonium. It was, clearly, breached in spirit because of their efforts on enriched uranium. I always believe it is better to try to figure out if there some agreement that can be reached that is enforceable, rather than letting a dangerous situation drift without any real understanding of where it's going to end up.

So, from my perspective, I've urged the administration that if they are intent upon multilateral talks, hold the multilateral talks, but don't be adverse to having some bilateral pathway going at the same time.

You know, North Korea can't do anything very well except create weapons. And they live in such a delusional state, the best we can determine, that the idea of being able to become a nuclear power, and then having yet another cash crop to sell to terrorists and others, is very attractive. And they also could well pick up the message that if Saddam Hussein had had nuclear capacity instead of intending to and threatening to, we might not have invaded him.

So, it is a very difficult situation for the administration to find itself in, but I think they have been unwilling to really set a course and stick with it, at least as I would hope that eventually we could because it's a very dangerous part of the world and we can't afford to have them be any more nuclear than they are right now, whatever that may be, since our intelligence is somewhat up in the air about it as well.

MR. HAASS: Yes, ma'am? Do you want to wait for a microphone? That would be helpful. It's right next to you.

Q Mia Bloom (sp), Rutgers University, the Office of Counterterrorism. There was an article, a week ago Sunday, about tactics surrounding Abu Hishma with barbed wire. And there's been a lot of cooperation between the Israelis and the Americans in urban counterterror tactics. Could you comment on that because there's a possibility of it going really wrong.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think that many of us were taken aback when we saw that article and we saw the barbed wire and the fence. I did hear one report in the last 24 hours that the military command in that region is going to consider using the capture of Saddam Hussein as a way to back down from that, and I hope that's the case. I think it is important.

It is very hard to build any fence that's going to keep a terrorist out. That is certainly the tragic lesson of Israel's efforts against terrorism over all these years. And what we have to figure out how to do -- and we succeeded with respect to the capture of Saddam Hussein -- is to convince enough Iraqis that their future lies with us and with the possibility of a free, stable, economically viable Iraqi state. And I hope that that's the tactic that we will pursue.

MR. HAASS: Yes, ma'am?

Q Felice Gaer, the -- (inaudible) -- Institute. Thank you, Senator, for your speech and for reminding us -- (brief audio break) -- also falls into that category. And with the constitutional loya jirga in Afghanistan right now meeting, I'm wondering if you could tell us whether you think, in terms of right things and smart things, whether the administration is adequately amplifying the voices of moderates and persons seeking freedom in that country.

Thank you.

SEN. CLINTON: You know, Felice, I don't have any basis for an opinion about that. I know it's a concern of a number of people, and there's even a coalition of delegates going to the loya jirga who are raising that concern.

Obviously, this is a tough situation to be in. And there is a potential clash between realpolitik and our highest ideals at work here, because somehow the loya jirga and President Karzai, along with us, have to thread this needle. On the one hand, we've got the warlords and their militias and their potential destabilizing impact. On the other, we know that if we just side with them or we create a situation, either de facto or de jure, where they are once again in control, we haven't really succeeded. So it's going to be a tough balancing act.

From my impression and my conversations with President Karzai, he's well aware of that, and he's got some very good people around him. So I know that they are trying to strike that right balance. We'll have to see how it comes out.

MR. HAASS: We're a bit over schedule. We'll try to take one or two more. Sir? We've got a microphone right here, to your left.

Q Gerry Hamilton. I'm the president of the American Council on Germany, and it is that professional connection which prompts me to ask you to delve back into one point which you made. You've said so many things today, Senator, that I could agree with wholeheartedly that I hate to pick on the one thing which I feel can't. But I have to ask the question: Do you feel that in the post-Cold War era, the presence of American forces in Germany has had anything to do with stability in that nation? And do you feel in fact that that was the case throughout most of the Cold War, or weren't those our own interests we were serving there? Thank you.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I am by no means an expert on Germany. But I think our interests and German stability were coincidental for much of the last part of the 20th century. I believe that creating the conditions for a stable, peaceful Germany and particularly the integration of the East and the ongoing challenges that that poses was the highest priority for Germany and for us.

I remember very well conversations with Helmut Kohl, who was so grateful for the American presence and believed that without the continuing American presence and support for the forces of democracy and freedom and stability, the outcome might have been different.

Now who can look back and second-guess history? I'm -- I certainly can't. But I think it was in American interest and in German interest and in the eventual interests of our defeating Soviet communism that we retained troops in Germany.

Now I think we have to take a new look at, you know, where we deploy troops, where our bases are, what our interests are. But I certainly believe that it was an important and necessary step for us during those decades.

MR. HAASS: We have a rule of ending council meetings on time, and I'm going to violate it, give Ben Gilman -- I always found it hard to resist the former chairman. So --

SEN. CLINTON: (Chuckles.) Most people did.

MR. HAASS: (Chuckles.)

Q Thank you, Mr. Secretary, and congratulations on your presidency.

MR. HAASS: Thank you.

Q Senator Clinton, we welcome you, and we welcome your astute analysis of what's been happening.

Having met with the military commanders in Afghanistan and in Iraq, do you favor more U.S. troops? I know you've suggested NATO, which is a good, sound suggestion. But what about our U.S. troop involvement?

And secondly, what are your thoughts about the Middle East peace process? (Laughter.)

SEN. CLINTON: (Chuckles.) Well, let's --

MR. HAASS: All within a minute!

SEN. CLINTON: Yeah. Let's end on an easy question. (Laughter.)

With respect to troops, I still believe we need more troops, and we need a different mixture of troops. I would prefer that they be other than American troops, for all kinds of reasons.

We have this commitment by NATO in Afghanistan. I'm waiting for them to fulfill it. And I -- you know, I landed at Kabul. It's run by the German military. We know that they're already there, doing important work, like these provincial reconstruction teams. But we need more of a presence. We did not keep enough troops there, and we haven't gotten enough of our NATO friends to participate.

In Iraq, I know that the refrain constantly from the administration is, we don't need any more troops. I think that we clearly had enough troops to win the military victory, and everyone knew that it was inevitable. We did not enough troops to dominate the country after we secured the military victory.

And I cannot tell you how many people -- Iraqis -- mentioned to me the looting. It is still a huge overhang. "How could you come, get rid of Saddam, and then let everything be looted?" Well, part of it is because we were there in a kind of, you know, cognitive dissonant way, if you will. We were there to win a military victory, but not to be viewed as an occupier. And the administration didn't want to put in enough troops to do that, and they were reluctant to declare martial law. And they weren't really equipped with the right mix of troops, the MPs and the Civil Affairs and the others, to be able to move in immediately with respect to a postwar situation.

So I still believe we could do with more troops. I'd like to see them be non-American troops. And I think there are some things we could do. And if we are able to convince our NATO allies to go into Iraq, you know, we could move American troops out of the Kurdish area, because that is a much more stable environment right now. We could put in NATO troops there. We could move British and American troops out of the South and put in different NATO troops there. And we could concentrate our troop strength in the central part of the country, around Baghdad.

But we also -- continually we're told we did not have enough intelligence, we did not have enough MPs, we did not have enough Civil Affairs and probably not enough engineers. So we've got to keep in mind not only numbers but troop mix.

And of course, then, you know, that this raises the issue that is now percolating in Washington: What should be the end strength of our Army and the rest of our military? I have supported Senators Hagel and Reed in their effort to just be honest about it and talk about expanding the numbers in our Army, particularly in light of the fact that many of the key components that we needed in both Iraq and Afghanistan were Reserve and Guard forces. And we are depleting them, and I worry greatly about the strains that we've put on these citizen soldiers.

So there's a lot to be looked at as we go forward with Secretary Rumsfeld's transformational strategy, but it's essential that we be honest about what it's going to require of us to be effective in these various theaters.

And you know, we can talk about that at greater length, but I think that's how I see it.

You know, really, this would take another hour, but it is imperative that the United States be actively involved and perceived as being actively involved in the Middle East. I think we lost some very valuable time and opportunity with the transition from the Clinton to the Bush administration. Obviously the roadmap is a possible vehicle for getting people together to try to talk about what the future holds. We have to continue to bear down on the Palestinians to deal with the terrorists and we've seen a respite from terrorism, which always suggests to me that it is controllable and it can be stopped and we therefore have to expect it to be stopped.

But we are in a very dangerous period right now, it seems, and I would hope that the administration really puts a lot of time and attention. You know, I know that there were many criticisms and questions about the Oslo process, but I do believe that having people engaged in a process -- particularly one that steadily cuts the number of terrorism incidents and diminishes the loss of life in Israel and among the Palestinians, as happened in the 1990s -- because there was a sense of engagement: the Israeli economy picked up; there were economic investments made in Jordan and elsewhere that I believe have helped to stabilize, especially in this rather volatile period with what's going on in Iraq, the relations not only with Israel and a country like Jordan, but with respect to American interests.

So it's a very important issue that we ignore at our peril, and we have to stand steadfastly for Israel's security, but how the best way we do that is increasingly -- (audio break) -- by some of the statements by leading Likud officials about the dangers posed to Israel without a two-state solution, you know. And I -- so there -- history and demography may not be on Israel's side, in the absence of some kind of agreement, sooner instead of later, that then is enforced by the United States and the international community and people are held responsible for their actions.

So that's a very brief, overly generalized response, but we have to protect Israel's interests and we have to do everything we can to end terrorism emanating from the territories there.

Thank you.

(Applause.)

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY) HOLDS A NEWS TELECONFERENCE ON JOB TRAINING FUND CUTS, 1/5/2004

CLINTON: I wanted to react to the stories coming out about the proposed budget that the president will be presenting to Congress.

And the report in the New York Times yesterday about the '05 budget proposal suggests that there will be significant cuts in job training, in employment programs, housing assistance programs, even health care benefits for the nation's veterans.

And it's clear that none of these proposals, even if enacted, will do anything significantly to reduce the massive federal deficit that has been run up in the last three years, but they will do significant harm to many American families.

So today I have written to the president asking that he reconsider these ideas.

Specifically with respect to the proposed cuts for job training and employment programs, I fear that this will greatly undermine the chances of unemployed and long-term unemployed Americans to acquire the skills and find the opportunities for new jobs.

And it is especially troubling to me because, as many of you know, I've been trying to persuade the administration to extend temporary unemployment compensation, which expired the last week of December. And as the unemployment rate continues to have people exhausting their state benefits, we have an increasing number of discouraged workers who aren't even counted in the unemployment rate. And the administration has, so far, refused to do anything to help them.

At the same time, if they are contemplating cutting job training programs, it will be even more difficult for a lot of these people to get the new jobs, assuming that they are going to be available, which is still not clear to me.

So we have 4.9 million Americans working part-time right now and I think that proposals with respect to cutting these programs is very ill-advised and, combined with the unemployment numbers, would be a real blow to a lot of people.

CLINTON: And that's the same for the housing vouchers and for the veterans' health care benefits.

So I am urging that the president reconsider all of these moves and face the reality that we are in this deficit ditch because of the dramatic increase in expenditures on defense and homeland security -- which I and many of my colleagues have supported -- coupled with the tax policies that have given so many rather large and in my view unsustainable cuts to the wealthiest of us.

And I don't think that that is the kind of choice that Americans should face, to continue these tax cuts, many of which are going to kick in '05, at the expense of health care for veterans and job training for the unemployed and housing for the homeless.

So I feel very strongly about this. And I hope that before we see that budget, we can see some changes.

QUESTION: Senator, so do you think the president will make changes to the budget? Or are you just hoping to sort of put up a fight once the budget is received by Congress?

CLINTON: Well, I know from my experience in the White House that sometimes information is leaked out to see what sort of response it creates. And if that is the case, and this was a trial balloon, I want to try to help shoot it down.

If they go forward with these kinds of decisions, then I will join with my colleagues to try to derail them.

QUESTION: Do you agree with some of the Democratic presidential candidates that the strategy of the Bush administration is to in effect transfer wealth from the middle class to the more wealthy Americans?

CLINTON: What I believe is that we are undermining the capacity of the vast majority of Americans to have the standard of living available to them that I was blessed with and previous generations were provided with.

CLINTON: And I think we see that across the board, the long-term unemployment, the outsourcing of jobs, the lack of health care benefits, the undermining of retirement security, the administration's attitude towards issues like overtime and other ways that we've tried to support middle-income people, the very unfair way that their tax cuts impact on most Americans. I think that there is a growing awareness that the administration's agenda will leave the vast majority of Americans worse off than they were in 2001.

QUESTION: Upstate New York is starting to see the effects of some of these jobs that have been shipped overseas. And increasingly, we're hearing Hindu accents on our phone calls from telemarketers and service companies. How is this fitting in with that? And what ideas do you have for replacing some of those jobs?

CLINTON: Well, I think that's an absolutely critical question, because to cut job training when we see so many jobs being shipped overseas, sends a message to the American worker that we're not only going to ship your job out, we're not going to give you a chance to get new skills that will, you know, make you employable in the jobs that may be left.

That's just unacceptable. I have a number of ideas. I'll be making a speech in the near future, laying out what I think should be done on dealing with the outsourcing of jobs and trying to provide incentives within the tax code to keep jobs in America, to enforce trade rules so that we have a much fairer and more balanced approach to trade.

But I think you really hit on a critical point, that the administration is not doing anything to help keep these jobs and, in fact, they're going to make it more difficult for people to get jobs by undermining the employment training programs.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, are you going to make another try at getting unemployment benefits extended once everybody returns at the end of the month?

CLINTON: Yes, I am. In fact, we've been working on that, trying to get some kind of agreement with the administration and the Republican leadership. I sent a letter to Senator Frist asking that this be the first item we take up when we return. I'm co-sponsoring several bills, including a bipartisan bill with Senator Smith of Oregon that would just provide a simple extension.

So I will certainly try to do what I successfully did last year in getting it extended when we get back into session.

QUESTION: Senator, do you feel now that maybe some of the past trade deals that have been passed need to be revisited and maybe have provisions for environmental standards and health standards and labor standards added to them?

CLINTON: I've always thought that. And I was pleased that at the end of the Clinton administration that was the direction in which we were heading. The Cambodian trade deal, the Jordanian trade deal all were big steps forward.

So I think that we need to continue to be a trading nation. I'm very much in favor of trade. And it has benefited New Yorkers tremendously over the years.

But we have to look at where we are realistically now and understand that all too often the rules that have been set up to govern trade are not enforced in a fair and effective manner when it comes to American interests. And we have a really important stake in trying to make sure that labor and environmental standards become global and are not just left in one part of the world to the exclusion of the rest of the world.

So I think that we need a rethinking of our trade policies, not to turn our back on trade, but to come up with a more effective 21st century trade policy. And I will be talking about that when I make some speeches in the next several months about what I think should be done.

QUESTION: In view of what you just said, Senator, do you feel that NAFTA and GATT should be revisited?

CLINTON: In view of what I just said, I think you should take that as what I said, which is that I think that we have to enforce the trade rules that are inherent in both NAFTA and GATT.

This administration has been very slow in filing any kind of trade claims in regard to any of our trading deals. I mean, they got a lot of publicity for the steel tariffs, but they've let a lot of other important issues go by the side and not tried to enforce trade rules.

I think on balance NAFTA has been good for New York and America, but I also think that there are a number of areas where we're not dealt with in an upfront way in dealing with our friend to the north, Canada, which seems to be able to come up with a number of rationales for keeping New York agricultural products out of Canada. And I think that needs to be given much greater emphasis than it has.

But this is a much bigger issue than to give you a short 30-word- or-less answer. And as I say, I will be addressing it in greater detail in the future.

QUESTION: On the Bush tax cuts, there doesn't appear to be a great public ground swell to reverse or stop these things. And I wonder, given that, how are we supposed to reduce the federal budget deficit without cutting domestic programs?

CLINTON: Well, you can't possibly reduce the deficit by cutting these programs. I mean, if you want to be serious about reducing the deficit, you've got to do both. You have to increase revenues and cut spending.

And if the administration wants to pretend that you can make veterans pay more money for their prescriptions and limit the number of people who get into housing or do away with employment programs and somehow that's going, you know, demonstrate fiscal responsibility when in fact it won't.

And I think that the nearest example is what happened in 1992.

CLINTON: You know, part of the reason that we were able to reduce and eventually eliminate the deficit that was inherited in 1992 was through eight years of fiscal discipline that included spending cuts and revenue increases. There isn't any simple way to do this.

We have a lot of unexpected expenses that I think the country believes we have to bear in national defense and homeland security. So if we're going to have to increase our expenditures in that manner, then we're going to have to figure out how we're going to deal with the deficit. And you can't do it by, you know, these rather minor adjustments that will actually hurt people, as opposed to having equal shared sacrifice.

I mean, you know, my biggest critique of this administration is that, you know, they're not thinking about the future. They're not making decisions today that will make us richer and safer and smarter and stronger in the future.

And in fact, on so many fronts, the decisions they're making are undermining the standard of living for, you know, average Americans. And I don't think that's what anybody wants.

And although there may not be, you know, a loud hue and cry, it's in part because, you know, people know that with this Republican president and Republican Congress, there's not going to be any chance for a responsible fiscal policy, which is why we need to have a vigorous election this year that really raises these issues.

Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY) HOLDS A NEWS TELECONFERENCE ON PROTECTING THE NATION AGAINST ELEC-TRICAL BLACKOUTS, 1/14/2004

CLINTON: Hi, everyone. This is Hillary Clinton. Thank you for being on the call.

I wanted to talk about an issue that I consider so important, particularly to New York, but not exclusively to our state. And that is the question of the electricity reliability standards.

Congress needs to act on reliability standards. And we need legislation to do that that would create mandatory, enforceable reliability standards as a necessary step to address the blackout we had five months ago and the continuing stresses on our electricity grid.

In November, the Electric System Working Group of the U.S.- Canadian task force on the blackout released its draft report on the causes. And among the report's finding was that the North American Electric Reliability Council's voluntary reliability standards were violated at least six times during the series of events that led to the cascading blackout.

In addition to that finding, the New York Independent System Operator released an interim report on the blackout just last week, January 8th, stating that, and I quote, "There is one conclusion that was unequivocally confirmed by the blackout: Reliability standards must be mandatory and they must be strictly enforced," unquote.

Now there are a lot of reasons why we need this legislation.

CLINTON: And I will be introducing legislation based on a bill that Congressman John Dingell has introduced, because I'm not persuaded that we will get the reliability standards that we need or that the energy bill, which I opposed which has lesser standards than I support, will even be passed because of the bipartisan opposition that it faces.

So the bill's main provision will direct the FERC -- the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission -- to establish by rule an electric reliability organization and to require all users, owners and operators of the bulk power system to comply with these reliability standards and to be penalized and to be ordered to comply if, for whatever reason, they fall into the pattern that we saw leading up to the last blackout.

In addition, this electric reliability organization would be looking to see what else needs to be done to ensure the adequacy of our power system in North America.

You know, when the report came out last week on January 8th from the New York Independent System Operator, it didn't get a lot of attention. And yet it fully underscores the need for doing something legislatively.

And I don't believe, as I said, the energy bill can overcome the strong opposition that it currently faces.

So, perhaps, we will persuade the Republican leadership to do a stand-alone reliability bill, which is something I called for on the very day that the blackout occurred. And that's what I want to be prepared to try to push when we return next Tuesday.

So I'll be glad to answer any of your questions.

QUESTION: How are you?

CLINTON: I'm good, thank you.

QUESTION: Just to make sure that I understand, have you already -- I guess you haven't introduced this legislation yet, but you'll be doing so next week, I take it?

CLINTON: Yes. I sent a letter today to the majority leader, Bill Frist, and in it I discussed all the reasons why we should have a stand-alone reliability bill. And I will be introducing a bill as soon as we return next week.

QUESTION: Is it basically a carbon copy of Representative Dingell's bill? Or does it have differences?

CLINTON: It's very close. It's very close to Congressman Dingell's.

QUESTION: Thank you.

CLINTON: But there has been no introduction in the Senate. And given the reports I just referenced, it's obvious we need to do it.

QUESTION: What is an appropriate penalty for somebody who doesn't comply? Obviously, it would have to be big enough that there would be some bite to it for not complying and triggering such an incident.

CLINTON: I agree. Obviously, we're going to have to have significant enough penalties in order to get the attention of the operators.

When you have a pattern, as we saw leading up to the cascading blackout last summer, and nobody has any (OFF-MIKE) that can be effectively used, we have to have some penalty. And we have to have the ability for the federal government, which must oversee this interstate system, in fact, international system, to be able to act before disaster strikes, not wait until something occurs.

And so I will provide for that authority with respect to a threatened violation, if we know that we can stop it.

QUESTION: Are we talking fines or civil penalties? Is there a mechanism for that that you've got in mind?

CLINTON: Yes. Civil penalties, which would include fines -- compelled action by the FERC in the case of persistent, continuing violations.

QUESTION: I'm admitting on this conference call that I don't know what a reliability thing does.

QUESTION: What does it do? What does it mean?

CLINTON: Well, you know, part of what I'm trying to accomplish here is to put into place an enforcement mechanism that would have the ability to review the existing programs, the other kind of actions that operators are supposed to be taking on a regular basis, something as simple as...

QUESTION: These are state or local utilities that are supposed to maintain some standard or something?

CLINTON: Exactly. But for example, one of the problems that came to light with the August blackout was the fact that you're supposed to, on a regular basis, trim the trees that are impacting your wires. Now that seems so obvious. But apparently, it had not been done on the regular schedule that was expected.

And I don't know that it's been found to be the cause, but it certainly can be a contributing factor -- all the way up to having, you know, problems in the number of personnel that you need to be in your command center, to make sure your computers are as virus-proof as they can be made.

There are just many different elements...

QUESTION: Wasn't this a whole new area of federal law? I mean, wasn't this left to the states at one time and the states got overwhelmed when they had deregulation and they, sort of, let the whole system of regulation fall apart?

CLINTON: Well, I think that that, to some extent, is a fair comment. You know, we use to have a regulated utility industry. And it was primarily done by the public service institutions and agencies. And there's been this big move for deregulation and, unfortunately, there hasn't been anything really put in place.

And you know, after the big blackout, years and years ago, there was some movement toward taking care of the problem. I think that something called the North American Electric Reliability Council was created after the 1960s blackout.

CLINTON: And what it did was to develop and implement reliability standards on a voluntary basis.

So the industry has already, in effect, agreed that there need to be reliability standards. But because they're totally voluntary, there's no mandatory standard, there's no penalty attached, people have ignored them -- not everybody, but unfortunately some have and we've seen the consequences of that.

So I thank you for tuning in on this. And you might want to take a look at the January 8th report from the New York system operator. It's clear that we need to do this.

Voluntary standards are not sufficient, and we need mandatory standards. I've argued for that. A lot of people agree with me. John Dingell led the way in the House, and I'm going to be introducing companion legislation in the Senate.

Thank you all very much.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON IRAQI WEAPONS OF MASS DESTRUCTION AND RELATED PROGRAMS, 1/28/2004

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

And Dr. Kay, I join with my colleagues in thanking you for your public service. And it's with great admiration that I have followed your service over a number of years, and I thank you greatly.

I just wanted to clarify a few other comments that have been reported in the press just to get the record clear in my own mind. There were some references to your decision to leave the effort due to the failure to have the full complement of analysts, translators, interrogators and others to work with you.

And I know that that was a concern that had been expressed to this committee and others because of the movement of people out of the group into counterinsurgency efforts.

CLINTON: Was that a factor in either impacting the quality and substance of the search or your decision to step down?

KAY: Senator Clinton, there were two factors that led me to decide it was the appropriate time to return to private life. When I agreed to take on this job, I had only two conditions. As you know well, when you negotiate with the federal government, salary is not one of the things you can negotiate back.

I said there were two things that were important to me. One is that the instrument we were going to use, the Iraqi Survey Group, be totally focused on elimination of WMD as long as we carried out that mission.

That was based on two facts.

One, my experience with the federal government is that when you have multiple masters and multiple tasks, you get the typical interagency mush and you don't get directive action, and I didn't think we had the time to do that.

The second was -- and I told George Tenet directly this -- by undertaking this task from the president of investigating and trying to determine reality compared to your estimates, you are going to run a moral hazard -- the moral hazard of self investigation. And that the only way I was willing to be a party to that is that I had the independence to choose the instrument that was going to be doing it and I had the resources that were necessary to do it. And that was agreed.

By September, I was in the process of running battles both with the DOD and with the intelligence community that wanted to redirect resources and the activities of the ISG to the looming political insecurity crisis that was Baghdad.

I perfectly understood the difficulty we were having. I lived there. I knew how hazardous it was. I just thought the ISG and those resources were inappropriate for it.

By November, I had lost that battle. The decision had been made to give ISG parallel priorities in addition to WMD, and resources were being halved off. And at that point, I did what I had said in June when I took the job: I'm simply not prepared to run that moral hazard for myself or for someone else under those conditions.

KAY: No big surprise and no anger on my part. You know, it was clear going on, it's actually in writing, on those two points when the administration felt that it couldn't live up to that any longer because of the security situation, which I fully understood. I thought it best to let someone else who I have great respect for and has capabilities -- I think he can do it -- take on the job.

CLINTON: Well, Dr. Kay, I appreciate your explanation.

But it raises two additional questions, at least in my mind, that -- we have addressed one before and that is whether we had enough resources on the ground to begin with. Making this Hobson's choice as to whether to continue with the full complement of resources and personnel you required and were agreed to be given to you to pursue this important task or having to divert because we didn't have enough resources on the ground to do the other job illustrates clearly the confusion at the very center of this whole enterprise post-military action.

But it raises an additional concern to me, which is that this wasn't a priority. You know, if you have a real priority, you figure out how to meet that priority.

And I think that the administration's decision to divert resources and personnel speaks volumes about what they really thought was at stake. I think by, certainly, November, if not by September, the fact that so much of the documentary evidence had been destroyed in the looting; the preliminary reports that you provided the Congress -- the administration prestaged what has become the final conclusion you've reached -- that we were not going to find such evidence of weapons of mass destruction, certainly raises for me serious questions about the real intention of the administration to begin with.

Secondly, I'm very interested in what you have concluded about the Iraqi decisions to abandon production of WMD because of the U.N. inspection process, that during the 1990s, in fact, the international community's effort to discover and destroy Saddam's weapons was working. Is that a fair statement of your findings?

KAY: It's compressed, but fair. And I must say, I had, as you know, because you were there, I had a number of former U.N. inspectors working for me. We often sat around and said that, you know, it turned out we were better than we thought we were in terms of the Iraqis feared that we had capabilities and although they took tremendous steps to try to compromise us and to lie, in fact, the U.N. inspection process achieved quite a bit.

CLINTON: And of course, my time has expired, but I think that rightly does raise questions that we should be examining about whether or not the U.N. inspection process pursuant to 1441 might not also have worked without the loss of life that we have confronted both among our own young men and women, as well as Iraqis.

KAY: Well, Senator Clinton, let me just add to that.

We have had a number of Iraqis who have come forward and said, "We did not tell the U.N. about what we were hiding, nor would we have told the U.N. because we would run the risk of our own" -- I think we have learned things that no U.N. inspector would have ever learned given the terror regime of Saddam and the tremendous personal consequences that scientists had to run by speaking the truth.

That's not to say, and it's not incompatible with the fact that inspections accomplish a great deal in holding a program down. And that's where the surprise is.

In holding the program down, in keeping it from break out, I think the record is better than we would have anticipated. I don't think the record is necessarily better than we thought with regard to getting the final truth, because of the power of the terrorist state that Saddam Hussein had.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS
HEARING ON THE FY 2005 DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE
BUDGET, 2/4/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Secretary, when Senator Reed and I were in Afghanistan over Thanksgiving, we learned that NATO had not yet met its obligations or its commitment to provide additional troops for the provisional reconstruction teams and other purposes. So far as I am aware, they still have not done so. Could you please advise us as to what, if any, progress is being made to persuade NATO countries to contribute additional troops as they had obligated to do so?

WARNER: I know that Lord Robertson, before he left at the end of December, had worked very hard on it. And the U.S. had been involved in assisting and the new secretary general has been working on it as well.

The last time I looked, there were still -- out of the totality of the requirements, there were a few pieces that had not been filled.

And I suspect that what's happening is that the United States, which has been -- under a memorandum of understanding, first with ISAF and now with NATO ISAF, has worked together with them to fill in gaps, as they occur from time to time.

But to my knowledge, they have not fully completed everything, although they must be in the high 90 percent.

Do you know?

ZAKHEIM: Well, there is that and also with respect to the provincial reconstruction teams that you mentioned, the British are, in fact, in Mazar-e-Sharif. The Germans have one up and running as well.

One of the issues has been where they go. We have eight of those now up and running and the idea is to have new ones stood up. We are talking, to my knowledge, to at least five different NATO countries right now that have given preliminary indications that they do want to go in and set up PRTs. And the question is how do you do that in an organized fashion.

CLINTON: And you'll keep this committee informed as it goes forward?

RUMSFELD: Absolutely, Senator.

CLINTON: And is Turkey one of those five countries?

RUMSFELD: They are one of them, but there are several others, as I say.

CLINTON: With respect to the budget, it's my understanding that at least during the Vietnam War, the cost of the war were in the budget. Supplementals were used for additional costs.

CLINTON: In September of this past year, I asked Ambassador Bremer, when he appeared before our committee, whether the administration would request an additional supplemental for Iraq and Afghanistan.

He replied, and I quote, "If there is any further need, I would anticipate any further requests will be done through the normal appropriations process. In other words, it will come forward as part of the regular appropriations process -- the 2005 budget --- presumably early next year."

With respect to the comments that the Congress instructed.

RUMSFELD: Excuse me. Were you referring to Iraq or Afghanistan in that last comment?

CLINTON: Iraq and Afghanistan.

RUMSFELD: Both.

CLINTON: Both.

With respect to the comments that you have made, Mr. Secretary, that Congress essentially told you not to do it a certain way, would you provide this committee with the names of those members of Congress or the staff and with whom they communicated that demand in the secretary's office at some very early date, please?

RUMSFELD: Well, it was the Congress overall. They just simply took it all out.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Secretary...

RUMSFELD: They said -- they zeroed out the $10 billion we'd requested.

CLINTON: But, Mr. Secretary, that was for a discretionary pool of $10 billion to be used as, presumably, you saw fit. We're talking about a budget that connects costs to missions and functions.

And as late as September of '03, Ambassador Bremer, who I believe reports to you, assured this committee that there would be requests done through the normal appropriations process.

Now, if there is someone in the Congress -- not just the Congress as a large undifferentiated mass -- that is saying, "Don't do that," we'd like to know it. But I think what the response from Congress was we're not about to give you a blank check of $10 billion to be used with no oversight.

So I think we need to clarify that, because it goes right to the heart of the authority of this body and the kind of oversight that we're expected to provide.

And, indeed, it raises some questions, because at least the press reports that there will be a supplemental after the election, which seems to me to be inappropriate and I would hope that we could get to a meeting of the minds as to exactly what's expected from the budget to these ongoing expenses in both Iraq and Afghanistan.

RUMSFELD: Senator Clinton, I'm told that you're right, that there had been some portions of wars that have been funded through the normal process. It appears that in '67 to '70 in the Vietnam War they included some estimates. After '70, I'm told, they stopped putting cost estimates in because they didn't prove to be very accurate and thereafter the Vietnam War was not, nor have, I believe, subsequent wars.

Second, I suppose you could say $10 billion -- it wouldn't be fair to say what you said, "$10 billion to be spent anyway you want, without any oversight." No department of government does that. They always report. They always say what they're doing. They have to get it cleared if it's major changes at all from eight different committees. So there's plenty of oversight.

The answer to your question about what Bremer said I think is also correct. And that is that if you take the supplemental, a portion of it was for the Coalition Provisional Authority -- $18.6 billion, as I recall -- and he said, and I believe Mitch Daniels and later Josh Bolten said, that that was for that period and that funds for that purpose, non-military purposes, the $18.6 billion, would, in fact, be put into normal appropriation process. And that's what's planned to be done.

CLINTON: Planned to be done. It's not in the '05 budget?

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON THE FY 2005 DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE BUDGET REQUEST, 2/10/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And thanks to all of you for the work you do every day and for, once again, coming to appear before this committee.

I am equally concerned, along with Senators Chambliss and Allard, on the investigation, General Schoomaker, into the allegations of sexual assault and misconduct. And will you be sharing the results of the investigation with this committee at some future date?

SCHOOMAKER: Senator, be glad to. What we're doing is taking a look at our internal processes and making sure that they're being complied with and find out if there are things that we have to tailor.

But we'll be glad to share that.

CLINTON: I would appreciate that. Does the internal processes review also include looking at the individual cases that have come to the attention of the press? Obviously that concerns us as well.

SCHOOMAKER: Yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: Thank you, General.

General, also, with respect to the news that yesterday the Army Corps of Engineers admitted that it had falsely stated that the Air Force and the Small Business Administration were involved in the awarding of the contract to Halliburton for the rebuilding of Iraq's oil industry, will you direct the corps to provide to this committee information on how it did decide to award that contract to Halliburton?

SCHOOMAKER: Would I do what, ma'am?

CLINTON: Direct the corps to provide information.

SCHOOMAKER: I'll ask them to do that.

CLINTON: Thank you, General.

General, I am deeply impressed by the work that the Army is doing under the rubric of transformation. And the report that you have provided us in this posture review is very reassuring and persuasive, as you make these significant changes.

But I'm also concerned about some very old problems. And the recent unclassified study by the Army's Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, a 504-page internal Army history of the Iraqi war, pointed out considerable problems in logistics.

And in reading the press reports of this report, I was struck by all of the old-fashioned problems we have: people couldn't communicate; they always were outracing their supply lines; they didn't have the information as well as the resources that they thought; the fact that the strategy of starting the war before all support troops were in place in order to achieve an element of surprise taxed the resources of local commanders. H

How are you addressing that issue? And is that an issue that is reflected in this budget? Or are there additional resources and changes that need to be taken into account?

SCHOOMAKER: Those issues are reflected in the budget. The logistician for the combined force, land component commander, General Christenson, is the G-4 of the Army. So he had the problem. I mean, he suffered the problem on that end. He's now part of the solution, and we're aggressively looking at this.

You're exactly right, we have not made the best use of our information technologies, we have not done things that we can do to fix this.

But in all fairness, I also have to say that the distances and the speed at which all this occurred seriously exposed these issues. These are far greater than the distances that were anticipated doctrinally.

And I've heard it said that the distance from Kuwait to Mosul, up where the 101st was, is like going from Omaha Beach to Berlin. That's a pretty good distance. And it's a lot further than Patton tried to do in his Red Ball Express.

So I think this is a serious issue. Because it has everything to do with our strategic and operational-level agility -- our ability to do the logistics.

Plus, there's a lot of money tied up in this.

Believe me, we're going to school on this piece.

CLINTON: Well, General, I know that many of us on this committee want to be very helpful to you in confronting this set of challenges. And it does strike me that there is an opportunity here to think a little bit outside the box.

I mean, some of the supply of fuel and energy problems that you ran into, I have long thought that we ought to be pushing much harder on alternative energy, clean energy, because I think that, you know, we use fuel cells, for example, to lift off our space shuttles, but we're not yet figuring out how to use them in our military on a day- to-day basis.

So there are I think some opportunities not just in the immediate arena about how do we solve this problem the best we can right now, but thinking outside the horizon, what could we be working on at this moment that would help us?

CLINTON: And we would appreciate any suggestions or ideas that you or any of the other services have that would enable us to help on this.

Because I was particularly struck in the report about the failure of communication, which was so reminiscent about what happened in New York on 9/11, police not being able to talk to firefighters, people in one part of the building not being able to communicate with someone in another part. And then to read that again the radios were out of range, people were improvising with cell phones. We just have to get a better grip on what we need to do with technology.

And, you know, just as for years DARPA and the space program were the source of new technology that had tremendous affects, both for the military and civilian side, we need to be making some of those investments today as well.

SCHOOMAKER: I don't disagree with you.

CLINTON: The final point I would make, General -- and this really is for all the services, but because the Army is so much on the point here -- I appreciated what you said about train, alert, deploy. And I continue to be concerned about the medical and dental readiness of our Guard and Reserve.

And I asked this question for all of our service chiefs at last year's posture hearing, but since then a GAO study, released in 2003, found that the Army had not been able to consistently carry out the statutory requirements for monitoring the health and dental status, with the result that many reservists called up frankly couldn't be deployed because of health and particularly dental problems.

So I would like to get some additional information about what we're doing to try to deal with that.

And of course, the fact that we don't have universal health insurance and so Guard and Reserves are on the civilian economy and they don't necessarily have the health care that they need is an issue far beyond this hearing, but whatever the Army is doing or the other services to try to make sure that we have the health status as good as possible, I'd appreciate knowing about.

"Inside Politics," CNN, 2/13/2004

Last night, I sat down and talked about this with senators Hillary Rodham Clinton and Kay Bailey Hutchison. And I started by asking Senator Clinton why she thinks it is so important for "Osama" to reach as wide an audience as possible.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CLINTON: This is a tremendous movie. I'm looking forward to seeing it. I've heard so much about it. Because it tells the story in very down-to-earth terms about what women and girls went through under the Taliban regime.

And it's something that is hard for American girls and women to really understand, that you would be so discriminated against and treated so badly, you couldn't even go out and help support your family unless you disguised yourself as a boy. And I think it's a good reminder that, you know, when we destroyed the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, we created freedom and opportunity for countless young women.

WOODRUFF: Senator Hutchison, you've been to Afghanistan, as has Senator Clinton. Is this movie -- and I realize both of you are planning to see the movie -- but is this -- is this movie telling a story that reflects the real-world experience of young women in Afghanistan?

SEN. KAY BAILEY HUTCHISON (R), TEXAS: Oh, yes. And we heard so many stories that were look this, where a little boy would die because the mother couldn't take him to the doctor because she was unescorted. So it does tell a story.

The wonderful thing is that this movie has been made in Afghanistan, and that it's now winning Golden Globe awards. And so that is the great news. But it also is the reminder that we must see this through, that the Taliban left a scar on that country, and we are trying to heal it.

WOODRUFF: I do want to ask you all about the broader situation in Iraq, as well. Afghanistan, some progress being made. Still a long way to go. In Iraq, here we are, it's February, the turnover, the U.S. to cede control just four months from now in June.

Senator Hutchison, how confident are you, given the bloodshed we're still seeing there, practically on a daily basis, that Iraq is a country that's going to be able to come together peacefully and to be stable just in a few months?

HUTCHISON: Well, we are all troubled every time we see one of these horrendous bombings or a mine set. But I do think we are making progress. It is much slower than we had hoped it would be, but the people of Iraq are hoping to be able to put together a government.

But it doesn't mean we're going to leave them in the lurch. It doesn't mean that we're going to not provide that security. We must stay there to do that, and I think we are planning to do that. But it is -- it's going to be difficult, there is no question about it. And when you see how unsettled it is, you look at that June 30 date and you think, what more can we do?

WOODRUFF: Senator Clinton, how much do you worry about that?

CLINTON: I worry about it a lot. And I think that we've got to come up with a plan that is not just a transition to sovereignty for Iraq, but which tries, before that even happens, to put into place some of the guarantees about what any new government will look like, and how the rights of people, particularly women, will be protected. I was very disturbed to learn that the Governing Council had adopted a law that they intended to turn all matters of family life, which includes women's rights, over to religious courts.

WOODRUFF: I want to ask you another question about Iraq, Senator Hutchison. And that is, with the new information coming out from David Kay, the chief weapons inspector, that there really is no hard information that there were weapons of mass destruction in Iraq before the war. You voted with the president, as did Senator Clinton. If you had known then what you know now, would you have cast your vote the same way?

HUTCHISON: Well, I am disappointed, there is no question about it. I am very concerned about the doctrine of preemption. And I am concerned when we don't have good intelligence information.

I think the president is doing exactly the right thing in now appointing a commission that has Democrats and Republicans to look into this intelligence. How could we have failed? If, in fact, there aren't weapons of mass destruction, how could our intelligence have been so uniform in saying, yes, they had them?

Now, you bet (ph) evidence was there. The fact that Saddam Hussein was helping to pay people who were doing suicide bombings, and in the Palestinian Authority, did make him a threat. But we have to make sure that we -- if we're going to go forward in this way, that we do have good intelligence so that we don't make a mistake.

WOODRUFF: Senator Clinton, the same question. Would you have cast your vote the same?

CLINTON: You know, Judy, I regret the way that the authority that I voted for was used. Based on what was made available to us publicly, in classified briefings, I certainly had every reason to believe that there were weapons of mass destruction. And that given Saddam Hussein's track record of what I would consider aggressive, belligerent irrational behavior, you could never discount him as a threat.

But I do wish that the president had permitted the U.N. inspections to continue longer than he did, because maybe we would have found that out. And maybe then we would have adopted a different strategy.

Now we've got a responsibility no matter how we got there, and we have to see it through. And we have to do the best job we can. We need still more international support. I'm hoping that the United Nations comes up with a plan for elections and a transition to a government that will be viewed as legitimate.

WOODRUFF: All right. Two very quick last questions to both of you back in this country about the presidential campaign. On the Democratic side, we're moving very quickly toward a nominee. It looks, perhaps, on the side of the president, Senator Hutchison, a flurry of questions this week and last week about the president's service in the National Guard. The White House putting out all of these documents.

Is this relevant? Is this a story that we're going to have answers to? Because some are saying, with all these documents, there's still unanswered questions about the president's service.

HUTCHISON: I don't think the people of America are going to make the choice for president of the United States based on something like that. I think they are going to determine their vote based on his leadership in this war on terrorism, how he has handled the aftermath of 9/11, and the economy.

WOODRUFF: All right. And last question for you. Do you -- with regard to John Kerry, Senator Clinton, are you with those who say we need to get -- Democrats need to wrap this up and come together, supporting Senator Kerry? Or what about what your husband said, who said it's a good idea for John Edwards to stay in the race because I think he said you never know what happens toward the end?

CLINTON: I'm not going to have any political punditry comment to add to the mix that's out there. I'm just going to wait until we have a nominee, and then I'll do everything I can to support that person.

WOODRUFF: So no...

CLINTON: I'm just going to wait. Right now, I'm concerned about Afghani and Iraqi women. And looking forward to seeing this movie.

PRESS CONFERENCE RE: INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO EX-EMPT CERTAIN STATES FROM MEDICARE PRIVATIZATION, 2/25/2004

PARTICIPANTS: SENATE MAJORITY LEADER TOM DASCHLE (D-SD); SENATOR DEBBIE STABENOW (D-MI); SENATOR JEFF BINGAMAN (D-NM); SENATOR BARBARA BOXER (D-CA); AND SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY)

LOCATION: SENATE RADIO/TV GALLERY, THE CAPITOL, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I join with all of my colleagues who understand what's really at stake with this. And what we're saying today is really rather simple. America's senior citizens are not and should not be treated as human guinea pigs. You know, our seniors have worked their whole lives providing for their families, building their businesses, contributing to their communities, serving their country. And just when they need help, just when they are looking for some security, we're about to pull the rug out from under them with this ill-conceived, and in my view ill-advised, proposal.

Now in New York, there are two areas, Buffalo and Rochester, that are immediately eligible for the so-called premium support experiment that is expected to start in 2010. But even more areas are well within striking distance.

By 2010, given the large additional subsidies that are provided to private plans under this bill, 10 million senior citizens and people with disabilities, one in every four Medicare beneficiaries could easily be forced into this privatization program. In New York that goes far beyond seniors in Buffalo and Rochester. It goes to Albany and Glen Falls and in New York City.

Now, what will it mean to be forced into this experiment? Well, the bottom line is that anyone wanting to stay part of the traditional Medicare program will be forced to pay a big surcharge for that privilege and right. Now, by virtue of geography alone, health care costs will take a significant jump. This provision will especially harm the sicker, more chronically diseased beneficiaries, those whom private plans consider bad risks and those who, frankly, look to us in the public sector to protect them.

Now, if you think these numbers affected are small, think again, because in Buffalo, 33 percent of Medicare beneficiaries report fair or poor health; in Rochester, 34 percent. Now, these seniors should not be penalized by an additional discriminatory surcharge just to keep their traditional Medicare.

So I join my colleagues in filing legislation. We'll be filing in the Senate, and one of our New York congresswomen, Louise Slaughter, will be filing in the House, to prevent the administration from choosing New York for this experiment.

Now you know, the proponents of this bill in the administration and the Congress, if they believe their own rhetoric that privatization will benefit seniors, then they should apply it to their own states. During the debate, I said that this should not go to any state that George Bush did not carry and that all of the members of Congress did not want it. I think that's a fair trade. You know, for those of us who see it as a wolf in sheep's clothing, a Trojan horse, whatever metaphor we want to use, we don't want them experimenting on our seniors. If they want to experiment on their seniors, fine, then let them do it, but leave our seniors alone.

And as far as we can see, we think, based on what Senator Bingaman just said, this is not unprecedented. States have tried to opt out of such experiments before. And I'm hoping that we will be successful in doing so again.

And indeed, this whole bill that was passed, if it's such a good idea, why doesn't it kick in before the election? If these privatization experiments are such a wonderful gift to our seniors, why don't they put them into effect before the election? You know, let people have a vote on whether this is the direction they want their country to go in providing Medicare and prescription drug benefits to our seniors.

So we're going to do everything we can to fight this ill-advised provision and make sure that our seniors don't have to be the ones who suffer from this privatization effort to undermine Medicare.

SEN. DASCHLE: Any questions?

Q A quick one. One of the reasons it appears that seniors are signing up for these PPOs now, and one of the reasons that CBO and CMS predict they will sign up in the future is because they're paid more than Medicare -- (inaudible). I guess the question is, is that advantage still around -- if they still receive that advantage in the future, is there the risk of seeing premiums under traditional Medicare increase --

SEN. DASCHLE: Absolutely. I think that virtually every analyst who has looked at the impact of what is now prescribed in the bill virtually guarantees that we will see significant increases in traditional Medicare premiums and costs for seniors. No doubt about it.

So this is coercive and very, very prohibitive cost-wise.

SEN. STABENOW: I might just add one number, and that is that the Congressional Budget Office said under the current Medicare Plus Choice plan, where seniors right now, as has been said, can choose an HMO if they wish, but under that plan, those who are going into HMOs now are seeing the cost, the cost to provide them care, 13.2 percent higher than traditional Medicare. So when this was said, "This will save money, we need to do it to save Medicare, to protect Medicare for the future," that's exactly the opposite. It costs more to provide service through an HMO, and we see that because they are subsidizing HMOs and giving them more money than traditional Medicare.

Q Senator Daschle, this is a little off topic, sir. But you're running for reelection in a state where many constituents support gun rights. Does that factor into your decision to support the gun liability bill?

SEN. DASCHLE: Well it does whether I'm running for reelection or not. Obviously, these bills are issues that represent issues, of course, that are important to various constituencies within any one of our states. And this is an issue that is very important to South Dakotans. And we hope that we can find a good balanced bill as it moves forward.

Q Senator Daschle, why was the administration's estimate of the cost of this Medicare as off as it was?

SEN. DASCHLE: Well because I think they rushed to judgment without adequate time to very carefully consider a lot of what was thrown together almost in the waning hours of the debate. First of all, they didn't include all of us, so we didn't have a vigorous debate within the conference. Secondly, they tried to get it done prior to the time we had the recess, and because they did, they weren't able to get the kind of analytical support that oftentimes comes with decisions of this magnitude.

So because there really wasn't the kind of give and take, and because they didn't include many of us or the people that could give them the best analytical information, they made some judgments that we now know were all wrong.

SEN. BOXER: Could I just add, I think it's part of the pattern here. I mean, we were told the deficit number would be smaller. We were told job creation would begin. We were told all these things about WMD. I mean, you could go down the line here. And this is just one example added to so many others of a lot of us being misled. And so I'm not quite as charitable as my leader on this point.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I would add -- in the uncharitable vein -- (laughter) -- that I think it's becoming clear that they had the numbers and concealed them. They may have shared them with a very few members of Congress, as Senator Daschle said, the very few who were inside the room, but some of them claim they didn't. And I think a recent news report suggested that they had the numbers and had no intention of revealing them until after the vote.

SEN. DASCHLE: Let me add one more uncharitable comment. (Laughter.) And that is that this is nothing compared to the mistakes they made with regard to projections of the deficit. I mean, the deficit was projected -- I think it was something like $14 billion for this fiscal year. Amazing how off they were. And it may have been in part because they've concealed information. But without a question, this is something that's consistent, a pattern consistent with this administration on virtually all fiscal projections today.

Q One quick follow-up, Senator Daschle. As you know, had some of your Democratic colleagues not supported this measure, it would not have seen the light of day. Have you heard any of them express -- (inaudible)?

SEN. DASCHLE: Oh, absolutely. Senator Dorgan is filing a bill today to allow for reimportation. He's going to Rule 14 a bill to the floor to force the Senate to vote on reimportation. I think if you talk to most of our colleagues, they voted for the bill with great reservation but ultimately voted for it with the recognition that many of these issues had to be addressed. And they join us, I think, in virtually every one of the concerns we've raised so far.

Q Senator Daschle, Senator Dorgan and Senator McCain are talking about putting a hold on the nomination of Mark McClellan for CMS. Will you be backing that effort to block that nomination?

SEN. DASCHLE: Well, I think that they're right in exercising their prerogatives as senators concerned about the issue of reimportation. The biggest reason, I'm told, for their concern for this nomination is because he has so vigorously opposed something that is overwhelming supported by the American people and by seniors in particular, and that is the opportunity to access quality drugs at lower cost from other countries, especially Canada. So I think they're right in doing so, and I hope they continue to persist, in the hope that this administration will get the message.

Q Senator Clinton and Senator Boxer, back on the matter before the Senate. A lot of your colleagues voted for cloture on the gun bill. Did they make a mistake? Is that a mistake, for Democrats to vote that way?

SEN. BOXER: Well, we don't have a party stand on this particular cloture vote, and people are voting their constituencies on it. And I never tell my colleagues they're making a mistake. I just speak out for my position, which is I personally find it outrageous that with all the issues facing this great country of ours, with all the issues, including the fact that we are still losing jobs and outsourcing of jobs and deficits as far as the eye can see, and the rollback of 350 environmental laws -- and I could go on -- that this is what the Republican leaders are choosing to go forward on.

And I just want you to know that every year a hundred children die of accidental gun shootings and four times as many get wounded in our country. And I don't see that this bill's going to do a thing to help stop the violence.

But this is an individual call. I'm very respectful of my colleagues. And the Democratic Party is a very big umbrella. It is a very big umbrella, and that's why I think we are the party of the vast majority of the people.

Q Senator Clinton, do you think it's a mistake?

SEN. CLINTON: I couldn't say it any better than my colleague has.

Q Could you please go to the podium, ma'am?

SEN. CLINTON: I couldn't add anything more than what my colleague has said.

SEN. DASCHLE: Thanks, everybody.

"Lou Dobbs Tonight," CNN, 3/3/2004

DOBBS: The shipment of American jobs to cheap foreign labor markets and its impact on American life, its quality of life, is, of course, a key focus of this broadcast.

My next guest, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, today announced a number of proposals to prevent what we call here the exporting of America. Senator Clinton wants tax credits for corporations, for businesses that create and keep jobs in this country. The senator also wants to create a manufacturing research agency to advance factory innovation.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: We have the tools that we need. All we lack is the will. And, once again, we can not only make the American dream strong, but restore the strength to the words "made in America," put the American team back on the field, demonstrate that we can outcompete anybody and that we are open for business for the 21st century.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

DOBBS: Senator Clinton joins us now from our studios in Washington, D.C.

Senator, good to have you with us.

CLINTON: It's great to be with you, Lou.

DOBBS: Senator, on this proposal of yours to provide tax incentives to corporations, the cost would likely be sizable. How are we going to pay for it will be the first question critics would put before you. So let me lead with that.

CLINTON: Well, Lou, I think we have to play both offense and defense.

We do have to provide some carrots, some incentives in order to persuade some of our corporate leadership to think twice about exporting jobs. But we also know that we have a lot of loopholes that should have been closed years ago that truly do provide the kind of incentive to go offshore, to set up some charade on some island somewhere to pretend that it's a headquarters or -- when it's really just a mail drop.

We need to look at our tax code and be honest about what it does produce, the consequences of the actions that we're taking. The debate we're having now in the Senate that was brought about because of the European Union threatening tariffs against us if we didn't end an effort to provide subsidies to manufacturers here at home gives us an opportunity to begin to create a bipartisan consensus along a range of possibilities that will help us keep jobs and prevent the exporting of America.

DOBBS: You also recommend a manufacturing research agency modeled on DARPA, the old program that actually led to a couple of interesting things, like the Internet, amongst others.

The idea of government stepping into this is one of those issues that is sure to be a lightning rod for criticism. What do you envision that agency really doing?

CLINTON: Well, Lou, I think, in so many ways in our past, we have had government investments that made us richer in the future, whether we talk about the Internet, a recent Defense Department, government-funded, originally scientific communication system that we obviously know what has resulted from, but, also, the interstate highway system, our airline system, our space program, other investments that we make.

And I think, if we look at what is on the horizon -- you know, we could produce a lot of jobs in our country through clean, smart alternative energy. We could be more competitive in both conservation and in, you know, new means of producing energy for everything from the automobile and other forms of transportation to power plants.

We are ceding that field. The European Union and Japan have rather significant government programs under way to take the risks that are often difficult for the private sector to take in the beginning. And then, once you get over those obstacles, where something is doable and has commercial implications, you put it out in the private sector. And we then can outcompete anybody anywhere.

DOBBS: It's nice to hear you say that. It's nice to hear any elected official say that, because, too often, we are hearing some -- some rationalization, it seems to me, on the part of a few, saying that, not only is labor cheaper, but, in some cases, the suggestion that it's better somewhere, the competitive side of it really masking just simply cheap overseas labor.

I'd like to read, if I may, Senator, a reaction to -- from the manufacturing side to your proposals today. I'm quoting Randall Wolken, the president of the Manufacturers Association of Central New York, who said "it is more important to get the government to aggressively retain and attract jobs than to create a new agency."

How would you react to that? And he was generally supportive of your proposals, I must add that.

CLINTON: Well, I think that he's right, that what I'm advocating is a whole range of approaches and policies. The Manufacturing Research Agency is only a part of that. I would certainly start with the more immediate needs because anything that took some time for research and development is some years off. But I wouldn't forget that, because I think planning for the future is something that we can reap benefits from. But I think we need to focus on, number one, getting our tax system right, quit giving incentives to people for moving jobs offshore.

Getting our trade system right, you know, I was very disappointed when the current administration moved away from the Jordan free trade agreement, which began to try to put into place higher labor and environmental standards so it wasn't a race to the bottom. We also need to be looking at the fair treatment of our workers, and that's a big problem for us in Upstate New York, because we've lost so many manufacturing jobs and now we're losing service jobs. And we're not giving people the support they need to find their way back into the job market. But at the same time, we've got to have the jobs for them to be able to take.

DOBBS: In your suggestion for honesty, Senator, I have to say that we all bear some responsibility here, it seems to me, Democrats, Republicans, media, corporate America, because there was an acceptance of the initial idea that manufacturing jobs, the loss of them, the millions of them that we've lost over the past, really, almost two decades in this country, somehow would be offset by high-value jobs.

Now that those are being exported, I think there's a little more keenness to be just absolutely honest about it on all our parts. You talked about a bipartisan approach. How reasonable is it to expect a new consensus here? Because we're looking, frankly, at a free trade environment that has led to a half trillion dollar, better than half trillion dollar current account deficit for last year. We're on our way to exceeding that now, as you know. How are we going to do this?

CLINTON: Well, Lou, I think your cautionary note is exactly right. We need a little more humility too. We don't have all the answers, but one thing we can be sure of, if we do nothing, we're going to continue to export American jobs. And that's not only bad for America, that's bad for the entire global economy.

You know, I think of the global economy as an inverted triangle, resting on the shoulders of the American consumer. And if the American consumer cannot have enough disposable income in order to maintain a standard of living that creates more opportunities generation after generation, that's bad for everybody. So it is in our interest to create this bipartisan consensus.

Unfortunately, I think the administration has really bought into the fact that all we need to do is cut taxes on the wealthy, and we have to have a laissez faire attitude toward trade and toward retraining workers, the tax system and everything else, and somehow it's all going to come out in the end. That has never been the American way. You know, what I sense is a sense of fatalism and defeatism that I just reject.

DOBBS: I think we're all with you on that part. I would just like to point out, however, that free trade didn't begin with this administration. Your husband's administration was a leading proponent and a rather effective advocate of that, including the onset of NAFTA, of course.

Amongst the number of things, when we said you were going to be our guest here, Senator, a number of people pointed out to us, e-mailing us and calling us, saying, ask the senator about her helping Tata Consulting, a well-known outsourcer, open jobs -- and office in Buffalo, New York. I'm asking you, did you really understand the degree to which they were involved in outsourcing jobs when you were there?

CLINTON: Well, of course I know that they outsource jobs, that they've actually brought jobs to Buffalo. They've created 10 jobs in Buffalo and have told me and the Buffalo community that they intend to be a source of new jobs in the area, because, you know, outsourcing does work both ways. You know, we cannot close our borders. We have to be smarter about competing. We have, more enforceable trade agreements. But we also have to attract jobs from around the world. And you know, we are still the biggest market with the greatest potential for growth for businesses from literally every corner of the world.

So what I've tried to do is not only figure out tax and trade and retraining and other policies that will enable us to attract and keep jobs, but to be attractive, especially in Upstate new York, which has lost so many jobs that we can get people to come and bring their jobs to our states. So we're making real progress on that.

But, you know, it is something that I'm well aware of, and conscious of the implications. But I think that we've got to percent have trade going both ways. And again, if we're given a chance to compete, we can compete with anybody anywhere.

DOBBS: Senator, the -- John Kerry obviously is now going to be the nominee of your party. Do you think that what you've heard from him at this point is a strong enough statement on reaching a redress in trade imbalances and eliminating deficits and stopping outsourcing?

CLINTON: I think that John Kerry really understands the challenge in front of us and has made some very good proposals about addressing them. I look forward to supporting him in any way that he requests, because I think that we are going to provide an alternative, just as we are today on the Senate floor providing an alternative to the lack of economic policies by this administration and really the celebration of outsourcing.

You know, we're not going to stop all outsourcing. I'm not in favor of putting up fences around our country. I think what I want is to address the challenge we face and make sure that we are equipped to provide the incentives both to our workers and to our employers.

And Lou, let me say one other thing, because this is not just an issue for the public sector. I think that private sector leadership needs to take a good look in the mirror. They take every advantage of the American economy, the American contractual system, the rule of law that we support, everything that is great about living in America. And I think, frankly, that they need to be more responsible in how they view their obligations to this country.

Again, I'm not asking that, you know, they never do business anywhere else. But we've seen too many decisions made. Just in Syracuse, New York, this past year, we saw Carrier shut down a plant that was still operating profitably. And, you know, from my perspective, there needs to be a little more awareness of the implications of this kind of leadership on the part of the private sector. So it becomes a public/private partnership to do what is necessary to make sure that America continues to be as strong in the future as it has been for those of us who grew up enjoying the benefits of a strong economy here.

DOBBS: Senator, one last question. Do you want to be vice president?

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: No. I'm having a great time being senator, and talking to you about an issue that I care deeply about.

DOBBS: Let me put it another way, are you open to the idea?

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: You know, that is totally up to the nominee. And I don't think I would ever be offered. I don't think I would accept. Obviously, I want to do everything I can to see John Kerry elected president.

DOBBS: Do you think you would be helpful in that role as vice presidential candidate?

CLINTON: I think I could be helpful in my role as senator. I think I can do a lot to help people focus on the strengths of our candidate and the weaknesses, frankly, of the opposition. You know, we now have evidence, it's no longer speculative, about what this administration means for our country at home and abroad. And I think we're going to be able to make a very convincing case.

DOBBS: Senator, I think you're moving -- swerving rather sharply away from that call for bipartisan support for those proposals.

(LAUGHTER)

DOBBS: We thank you very much for being with us, Senator Clinton.

CLINTON: Thank you, Lou.

DOBBS: Just ahead, the price we pay: illegal aliens are costing this country billions every year, they are also, so say, their advocates, bringing us billions of dollars each year. But is the president's new immigration proposal the right response? We'll have two very different views, opposing viewpoints next in our face off. Stay with us.

U.S. SENATOR PAT ROBERTS (R-KS) HOLDS HEARING ON DEFENSE SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY BUDGET, 3/3/2004

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

This is really to all three of you. And it's a problem that we have been struggling with, and that concerns the Reserve and Guard unit training and equipment and access to technologies, because with this higher operations tempo we have seen and heard disturbing reports about reservists and guard members not receiving adequate equipment, or at least not equivalent to active-duty. And what I'm wondering about is have those been any of the lessons learned about how we better equip and train on the newest technologies, Guard and Reserve units that are called into active duty, General Cartwright?

CARTWRIGHT: Yes ma'am. A couple of initiatives the Army has going is what we call the rapid fueling initiative. We started about a year ago. That equips, under the chief's direction, will equip every unit with the exact same equipment, whether it be active or reserve. Those units deploying on OEF-2 that are deploying now, whether they be guard, reserve or active component, will have the exact same equipment, whether it be knee pads, whether it be rifles.

As far as training, one of the lessons learned we have done, ma'am, is we have what we call, in conjunction with the combat commander and IED task force, that IED task force has actually gone to every Guard brigade and done training on IEDs. Both here and before the unit crosses into Iraq, they'll get training on what should be the tactics, techniques and procedures. They train on that before they go into theater on how to be able to do that.

So that's two of the initiatives and the lessons learned that we're doing to be able to do that.

CLINTON: Thank you, General Waldhauser.

WALDHAUSER: Ma'am, I can't speak directly on the equipment side of the house, but I can talk about the training to a certain degree. The Warfighting Lab, in conjunction with coalition partners and other agencies within the Marine Corps, has put on a training evolution in Southern California for all battalions going back to Iraq. And this has to do with cultural sensitivity, IED awareness and how to work in the environment that the Marines will find themselves in here very shortly.

And I would say that the Reserve units, the battalions that are going back with the Marines, have participated in that training, so they've essentially received the same training that the active-duty units have.

CLINTON: General, would you mind submitting to the subcommittee an answer with respect to equipment?

WALDHAUSER: Senator, I'll do that.

CLINTON: Thank you. General Cartwright, I know that General Curran has visited Watervliet Arsenal. And since 1813, actually, the war of 1812, Watervliet Arsenal has played a vital role in arming our military, and it is our nation's only manufacturing facility for large caliber cannon in volume.

At that same facility, Benet Labs performs scientific and engineering activities that range from basic research through design for production and engineering support for the production of its design team. And this co-location of the Arsenal and Benet Labs allows for complete lifecycle management, from idea through research, engineering into prototype, testing and, finally, full-scale production.

There isn't, so far as I know, any other co-located facility, and certainly no other arsenal that has this kind of resource.

When I visited Watervliet and Benet Labs obviously there were a lot of questions about their future. And I was impressed by what I saw there, and I certainly have been impressed by the role that they've played in the last two years because I think that having that facility available and open and operating, no matter what the conditions that we confront are, is essential to meeting our security needs. Are you familiar with Benet Labs and Watervliet Arsenal, General?

CARTWRIGHT: Yes ma'am, I am.

CLINTON: What are your thoughts on its future role?

CARTWRIGHT: Ma'am, I'll speak only to Benet, since they are one of my labs (inaudible) actually own up there, and I'll give you a couple of examples of the work Benet is doing right now.

One of the things they're doing is looking at in tank tubes (ph), particularly the Abems (ph) tank tube. Over a lifecycle, the tube will actually bend. One of the technologies they're looking at is to actually use a process to re-straighten barrels, which would be applicable from anything from large caliber to small arms to be able to re-straighten barrels.

The second technology they're looking at in cooperation with Lawrence Livermore is a process called laser peening that actually allows the metal to be harder. You actually shoot the laser at the metal. And it allows it to be harder than it actually is, and it lasts a lot longer.

And that's two of the pieces that Benet Lab is doing. So it's not only supporting the arsenal, but it's looking at: Can I look at using them across a lot of the products, particularly laser peening; can I use it not only for tank tubes or artillery tubes, but could I use it for fan blades on jet engines, ma'am?

CLINTON: So that could be part of a, sort of, transformational recapitalization strategy with respect to a number of items?

CARTWRIGHT: Yes, ma'am, we're looking at that across all the labs. And it goes back to the chiefs -- really, direction of how do I take future technologies and put it to current use today? Because we can't wait till 2010 to bring the technologies in. I need the technologies now. And we're looking at that across all our labs, industries and the arsenals to say, "How do I bring those in today?" Because the old 90 percent solution is a day gone by when I can give the soldier a capability they need.

CLINTON: Thank you.

ROBERTS: You know, Senator, the thought occurred to me that at Fort Riley, Kansas, we do an awful lot of -- it's the best tank firing range in America. I guess maybe relocating all that to Kansas wouldn't be what the answer...

CLINTON: I think a memorandum of understanding and partnership would be really the -- jointness is what I think it would ...

ROBERTS: Well, everything has to be joint today ...

CLINTON: Yes.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON THE FY 2005 CENTRAL COMMAND AND EUROPEAN COMMAND BUDGET REQUESTS, 3/4/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I, too, want to thank both of you for your service and for your patience being here today and answering all of these questions.

I am struck, General Abizaid, by the last pages of your testimony, starting on about Page 35, where you list the needs that you continue to have and both with respect to personnel requirements, as well as logistic support and even some legislative authority changes.

And I appreciate the specificity that you have presented here and we will certainly follow up on that. I particularly support the Commander Emergency Response Program, which I saw firsthand and it's effects when Jack Reed and I were there. And again, thank you for meeting with us during our time in Iraq and Afghanistan.

And I think getting the flexibility for those funding decisions down to local commanders made a huge difference.

CLINTON: And I'm glad we were able to fix some of the glitches and get the money flowing again. And I appreciate your raising that.

I wanted to ask your comment on a recent news report that I found very interesting and somewhat troubling. It concerned a report by NBC News a couple of days ago, and I quote: "The Bush administration had several chances to wipe out Zargawi's terrorist operation and perhaps kill Zargawi himself, but never pulled the trigger."

The story goes on to report, with both on-camera sources and off-camera anonymous sources, that, again quoting: "In June 2002, U.S. officials say, intelligence had revealed that Zargawi and members of Al Qaida had set up a weapons lab at Kirma in northern Iraq, producing deadly ricin and cyanide. The Pentagon quickly drafted plans to attack the camp with cruise missiles and air strikes and sent it to the White House, where, according to U.S.

government sources, the plan was debated to death in the National Security Council," end quote.

The report also went on to say that, quote: "Four months later, intelligence showed Zarqawi was planning to use ricin in terrorist attacks in Europe. The Pentagon drew up a second strike plan, and the White House again killed it," unquote.

General Abizaid, do you have any knowledge of this report, or do you have any information about any opportunities we might have had to take Zarqawi out?

ABIZAID: Thank you, Senator. And also, before I answer, I just want to say thanks for your support on the CERP. And you are absolutely correct, that ammunition is money, and money is ammunition, really has an important impact on the troops in the field.

With regard to Zarqawi, I read the report. I think we all know from open sources that we were always looking at this facility in Kirma up in northern Iraq, which we did attack during the war.

But the association with a particular terrorist, at a particular point, with the quality of targetable information, I would dispute. I don't think -- and of course I didn't have full access to all the information at the time -- but I would be very surprised to find out that we had a precise location on Zarqawi or UBL or Zawahiri or half a dozen of these other people that would allow us to launch a cruise missile from afar and kill that person. And I suspect that that portion of the report is not correct.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, I would ask consent to submit to the record the transcript of the report. I do think it bears further investigation. And I understand that the general may not have direct knowledge, but I think we should inquire further on the basis of that.

General Jones, I appreciated your report about NATO. And I was intrigued by your reference to expanding Partnership for Peace to include some of the countries that may not yet have formal membership in NATO. And I would be interested in hearing specifically which countries those might be, if that's possible in an open hearing.

But secondly, I am still bewildered by the delay that we have seen with respect to NATO deploying further assets in Afghanistan. You know, when Senator Reed and I were there, we looked for somebody in authority in NATO to talk to, and we couldn't find anybody.

We landed at Kabul with German and Belgian troops obviously assigned there. But despite the fact that they took action under Article 5, despite the fact that they came in early to provide military support and policing support, despite the fact that for months we've heard about their considering going in in greater numbers and working with the provincial reconstruction teams, and despite the fact that both secretaries Rumsfeld and Powell were there a few months ago discussing this matter, we have no action.

Can you explain in more detail what are the problems, the obstacles, the resistance on the part of our NATO allies?

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON NATIONAL SECURITY THREATS, 3/9/2004

CLINTON: I apologize. My voice is terrible. I thank both of you for your service. The real crux of the questions comes down to number one, our support for your efforts, our understanding of their vitality to our well-being and yet at the same time legitimate questions about our capacity and about the use of intelligence. And I've been troubled in the last couple of days by comments coming from certain sources about whether or not the Iraqi defectors were providing accurate information.

CLINTON: Admiral Jacoby, I understand from news reports that the DIA has concluded that almost all the claims made by Iraqi defectors about Saddam Hussein's alleged secret weapons were either useless or false. What is your view of the intelligence on WMD provided by Iraqi defectors?

JACOBY: Senator Clinton, we could go into detail in closed session. In open session, I would tell you that that news report does not accurately reflect our opinion. There are some situations where the information has been verified and corroborated through multiple sources. There have been other situations where we believe that information was either fabricated or embellished. It's a situation that we have in other HUMINT operations where the information spans a pretty broad range of veracity, and we need to go into the situation very much like we do in any HUMINT situation, our eyes very wide open, looking to verify, confirm, and continue to do that even as we work with various sources.

CLINTON: Do you know if any defectors with whom you and your agency dealt with also were given an audience and worked with Assistant Secretary Feith's Office of Special Plans?

JACOBY: Senator Clinton, I have no knowledge of that.

CLINTON: You just don't know.

JACOBY: I just don't know. I'm sorry. Yes. Make sure I'm clear.

CLINTON: Director Tenet, on this week's "60 Minutes," Ahmed Chalabi stated that he wants to come and testify before the Senate Intelligence Committee in open session. I, for one, think that's an invitation we ought to accept.

He accused U.S. intelligence of making bad use of the defectors that he steered to us. Specifically, in reference to U.S. intelligence, Chalabi said, quote, "I mean that people, intelligence people, who are supposed to do a better job for their country and their government, did not do such a good job," end quote.

How do you respond to Mr. Chalabi's statement?

TENET: Well, Mr. Chalabi's an interesting man. He's got an interesting history. And I think hearing him would be interesting. But, you know, I guess I don't have much of a response to it, Senator. Let's just leave it at that.

CLINTON: Well, also on that program it was disclosed that we --, meaning, I guess, the United States government, I assume through the agency -- is continuing to pay the Iraqi National Congress $350,000 a month.

TENET: We're not paying them.

CLINTON: Admiral, are you paying him?

JACOBY: Senator, you have me in a situation where this would be best dealt with in closed session. I could give you detail.

CLINTON: Director Tenet, with respect to Zargawi, who I think you have rightly identified as one of our most dangerous enemies currently, there was a recent report on NBC News that reported in June of 2002 U.S. officials say intelligence had revealed that Zargawi and members of Al Qaida had set up a weapons lab in northern Iraq producing ricin and cyanide, and that the Pentagon quickly drafted plans to attack the camp with cruise missiles and air strikes and sent it to the White House, where, according to U.S. government sources, the plan was debated to death in the National Security Council.

Four months later, intelligence showed Zarqawi was planning to use ricin in terrorist attacks in Europe. Again the Pentagon drew up a second strike plan and the White House again killed it. Did we miss an opportunity to get Zarqawi?

TENET: I read the same newspaper report. I don't know that Zarqawi was up there at the time, Senator, and I don't know that the report accurately reflects the give and take of the decision making at the time. So I'll just leave it at that in open session.

CLINTON: All right.

Also, with respect to this continuing question about the quality of intelligence -- and I do think that frankly the people we should be talking to in closed, open or any session are the people who are the policy-makers, because I think you've made very clear what you have tried to do with respect to providing intelligence.

But I was struck by a comment by Mr. Kay that was reported in the British newspapers, The Guardian, last Wednesday. David Kay -- and I quote -- "it was time for President Bush to come clean with the American people and admit that he and his administration were wrong about the presence of WMD."

And Dr. Kay went on to say that he was worried that our intelligence would lose credibility, not only among our allies but I would assume among others as well, and concluded by saying, the next time you have to go and shout there's fire in the theater, people are going to doubt it.

I don't think any of us in this committee doubt the seriousness of the threats we face. And I am personally very grateful and impressed with all the work that has gone on to roll up networks and diminish their effectiveness.

CLINTON: But it is, I think, a legitimate point that Dr. Kay makes that if we're going to be waging an ongoing struggle against terrorism, it's clear that we have to rely on intelligence and we have to persuade others of the intelligence. Do you have a response to Dr. Kay's comment?

TENET: Yes, I would say, Senator, first of all, whether we were wrong or right is an important professional judgment for us to reach. That's why we're going through all of this.

I would say that we weren't -- and I've said publicly -- we're not going to be all wrong or all right. We have to critically -- and we are and the committees are -- assess every bit of intelligence we've collected, what our shortfalls were.

I tried to get up in a public statement at Georgetown to basically say, "Here's my bottom lines today. Here's what I think was good. Here's what I think didn't work so well. Here's where I think we are in all of these major files."

There is no other community of people that take this as seriously as we do. Our credibility matters. It matters on terrorism and proliferation and other issues.

So open, honest debate, telling the truth, standing up when we come to conclusions is what we're about in this country.

And, you know, many of our allied service, quite frankly, saw this the same way as we saw it. We're all playing off the same sheet music.

Well, that's just not good enough. In this society, we have to give people the confidence that we know what we're doing. And if we were in error, then we have to be willing to stand up and say so.

The only thing I'd say is I think that the men and women on the ground in Baghdad who work at the ISG who I visited two or three weeks ago don't believe their job is done. They still think they have a lot of work to do. And I think we need some patience to find out the additional data that they will give us, and we'll report it honestly.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE (R-OK) HOLDS HEARING ON THE FY 2005 EPA BUDGET REQUEST, 3/10/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I join in welcoming Administrator Leavitt here. And before I get into budget and policy issues I want to thank the administrator for his role in getting the World Trade Center expert technical review panel started. We had a launch of that last week in New York and I'm very hopeful about what that panel will teach us concerning the air pollution problems post-9/11. The panel will retest some buildings in New York that were contaminated with toxic dust. And also examine concerns raised by the Inspector General last summer with regard indoor air quality. And I just want to publicly thank the administrator because I know that he's concerned about this issue and he has really been committed to it. And I know that he'll work to make sure the panel runs smoothly and helps to get some answers for the people of New York about the quality of their air and their homes and their workplaces. So I thank you again.

I would like to raise just a few budget and policy issues. With regard to the budget there are a few bright spots. I'm extremely pleased that the clean school bus program is proposed for funding at $65 million, a substantial increase over the $5 million appropriated last year. This is a program that I've worked on with Congressman Houghton and Walsh and it will definitely improve the quality of the air that children breath while they're on these busses by retrofitting old school busses with modern pollution control equipment. And I think that's a tremendous step forward.

But I do join my colleagues in expressing disappointment about the overall budget because the amount requested and the way that it is allocated I think is a step backwards in our commitment to strong environmental protection. I just want to make a few specific points. According to the EPA's own estimates, as you've already heard, we're facing a clean water infrastructure funding shortfall of $500 billion over the next 20 years. Those of us in the District of Columbia at least part-time know what a challenge we face. The discovery of lead in the water, the implications that has for particularly pregnant woman and children is something that has to be taken seriously. So I think this clean water infrastructure issue will be at the top of the congressional agenda.

But I'm also dismayed by cuts in research funding. And one that I joined with my colleague from California in pointing out, is that the budget zeroes out the EPA's building decontamination research program. It's a small amount of money, less than $10 million, but I think our experience in New York post-9/11 shows how important it is that we continue to look at this issue, and also our experience here with anthrax and ricin. You know, we've got to be better prepared and we have to have the technical and engineering expertise. When anthrax hit, you know, everybody turned to EPA. When we had problems figuring out who was going to be responsible for indoor air contamination in the buildings that were contaminated in New York, everybody turned to EPA. I think EPA responded the best they could, but without this continuing research we're not going to know exactly what we should do. So I'm going to work hard to restore that cut.

But I'm also concerned about some of the policy choices. And I think that the mercury pollution issue is a perfect example. I don't think that we're requiring cuts that are deep enough or fast enough. And I am opposed to allowing trading of mercury emissions because that will lead to dangerous hotspots where emissions and exposures remain unacceptably high. This is a real urgent public health issue. In New York the Department of Health has issued 38 fish consumption advisories that warn children and pregnant and potentially young women who could become pregnant to limit the amount of fish they eat. We know that mercury is a potent neurotoxin. We know that prenatal mercury exposure can lead to poor performances on tests of attention and language. And I think we have to start looking at this, not only as an environmental issue, or as a health issue, but as a education issue because according to recent EPA analysis 630,000 of the 4 million babies born in this country could have mercury blood levels at or above the agency's safety limit. So I just can't stress too much how we have to look at this from a multi-issue perspective. And EPA has to be in the vanguard of dealing with these issues that have so many grave implications.

I have other concerns that my colleagues have touched on like Superfund and new source review, as well as several New York issues, but I wanted to raise those specifically for the administrator's attention.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I apologize for my voice.

Administrator Leavitt, I think that, you know, the problem is that there is so much information available about mercury that is in the public record and I would ask consent to include an article from the National Journal dated February 14 entitled...

INHOFE: Without objection.

CLINTON: ... the Next Arsenic. And there's also a lot of information about the rather torturous path that EPA has trod in trying to get to the point where you're on the verge of this rule. And it's very difficult to, in this kind of setting, get questions answered because they're complex questions and we don't have a lot of time. So on this particular issues, I would like to submit questions that go through in detail because I think we need to clarify this. I mean there's a -- you know, there's just such confusion and if we're going to start down a path that would do less than many of us think is possible, but even some of the EPA's own officials at one time thought was possible. And I think we need to be very clear about what we're trying to achieve and I am still of the opinion that we, you know, not only could do much more for the environment by providing incentives of whatever kind to these very recalcitrant utilities because there's a group of utilities that have done the work, that have already put in the equipment. We're in a sense penalizing them because they went ahead and made the investments that were called on.

You know, the clean energy group within the utility industry is equally distressed because, you know, this doesn't -- it looks like we're kind of changing the rules on them. So I still think we should look for some kind of incentive to get this over with and to employ people and to put together the technology. And just, you know, very honestly, I don't see that coming from your well-meaning effort that I think is designed to fit it into the Clean Air Act and do what's necessary to try to get something on the table. But it is putting off the problem way too long. It has the potential for enormously legal challenges, from those recalcitrant, stubborn utilities that refuse to join the rest of the world in dealing with this problem. So this could be tied up in courts forever. It'll employ a lot of lawyers. It's not going to make the air any cleaner.

So I will submit some very specific questions. But I wanted to get a little parochial for a minute. You know, because New York has been an industrial state forever and been around forever, we have a lot of problems that we've inherited that are now coming to the forefront. In just one county that I would like to focus on for a minute, Dutchess County, New York, the home county of Franklin Eleanor Roosevelt. We have as many as 10 sites that have been contaminated by PCEs from manufacturing processes, mostly from the old IBM plants. And we have also sites that are contaminated by TCE. We have well water that is polluted. The limited testing that's been done so far shows widespread contamination of this well water. We also know that where there's PCE contamination there's likely indoor air contamination. We learned that at the Endicott site outside of Binghamton, another IBM site.

So I am going to be submitting some very specific questions about PCE and TCE sites. But today there's a site called Hopewell Precision in East Fishkill, New York, and there've been a number of calls, my Republican colleague, Sue Kelly, who represents that area, Senator Schumer, others have called for it to be included on the Superfund site. When the list of national priorities came out it wasn't on the site. But I would like to ask you to evaluate that again. And I'd also like you to take a look at the Shenandoah Superfund site and several of the other PCE contaminated sites. We need some help. And what happens is we ask for help from the EPA and EPA understandably says well go to the state. The state is overwhelmed. They come back and say we need EPA help. And then we get kind of caught in the middle and, you know, we have these very serious hotspots of contamination. And I think it also raises issues about whether the Superfund site list is adequate and whether we can't afford to put more on, getting back to Senator Boxer's position. So I will also be submitting some very specific issues about these Dutchess County sites. But, I'd appreciate you're taking a look at that and seeing whether there's something more we could do to help these communities.

Finally, in your response on clean water, you made the reference that we wanted to be reducing demand for water use and that payments for clean water should fall on ratepayers, not taxpayers. What exactly did you mean by that?

LEAVITT: Senator, it's the gap on infrastructure is so significant that we as a nation, in my judgment, will have to wrestle with what the components of a partnership will be. The national government clearly has a role. Taxpayers clearly have a role. The question is how large is the role? And that's what this committee wrestles with now. And it wrestles with every year as we go about the task of determining what contribution we will make to the water loan funds.

As a governor I wrestled with this issue because they are state revolving loan funds. And the states make contributions. So the question is does the water company who has the control of the system and the local community can define how they want to approach it, do it, or do we make the decision at the national level and fund it through a national mechanism? That's the policy question I'm raising. And I think it's not a new one.

INHOFE: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

We're going to have a last round since there are only four of us here, but we'll confine it to the four of us. And that is for five more minutes.

First of all, let me just -- I know there a difference of philosophy and of opinion that we keep hearing the polluter pays and the polluters not paying. And we need to have a polluters' tax. And I just want to restate it again and I'm sure I will again and again and again. This is not a polluters' tax. This is a tax on business. Since we've had Superfund, of the potentially responsible parties, the PRPs, 70 percent of the cleanups have been paid by the responsible parties. In 2003 it was 87 percent. And I just would admonish you every chance you get, Mr. Administrator, to make it very clear that this is not a tax on polluters. It's a tax on businesses who are already having very serious problems.

In reviewing the portions of the spill prevention control and countermeasures rule that's been promulgated, there are three specific constituencies that I'm concerned about in Oklahoma. One is the air transport. One is the nation's farmers, and then last, the small oil producers. When I say small oil producers I'm talking about the marginal operators. And I know that there's been an arrangement reached with the API and some settlement talks. But I'd like for you to keep in mind, for all of us to keep in mind, that some of the problems of smaller producers are not the same problems that you have with the very large producers.

Now I've often said that in the other two categories, the air transport and the farmers, they shouldn't be a part of this anyway. In fact, I have a letter here that I sent to Administrator Whitman two years ago last month where I talked about the air transport. It's transport, not storage. And that there's a serious problem treating it as storage should a spill occur, trucks would necessarily have to be close together and it could have devastating results. But, having said that, what can you tell us about the relief the EPA would be providing for these two constituencies, the air transport and the farmers?

LEAVITT: Senator, I want to understand more clearly your question. But let me respond and see if I can get close to it and then you can redirect me. The Interstate Air Quality Rule is designed as a cap and trade system which essentially sets a standard of where we are today and where we want to get.

INHOFE: OK. I'm talking about the spill prevention control and countermeasures proposed rule.

LEAVITT: OK. I thought when you said the interstate, I misdirected.

INHOFE: No. No. No.

LEAVITT: Why don't we ask Marianne Horinko who I think might be able to respond specifically to your inquiry?

INHOFE: Well, go ahead and take that for the record, that'd be fine. I am concerned about it because I've written letters for over a two-year period believing that these should not be a part of that rule anyway. And I kind of want to, before the train gets too far down the road, to address that.

The EPA is deliberating on another issue of great importance to the small oil producers, their inclusion in the storm water phase two regulation. In December of 2002, the EPA proposed to extend the deadline for small oil and gas construction activities to comply with storm water phase two by two years to review the affect of the rule and what it would have on these sites. What progress has been made in reviewing the rule and the affect it might have on small producers? Of course we've taken the position that they should not be covered under this in the first place because it specifically talks about constructions and they are not in the construction business unless you say the construction of a well when it starts. Any thoughts about this or if it's something that you'd like to respond to in the record, that would be fine.

LEAVITT: We'd be happy to respond to the record. I could have Ben Grumbles (ph), who is the acting assistant.

INHOFE: Yes. And the reason I keep talking about the small producers is not just that we have so many in my state of Oklahoma, but when you look at the energy shortage and the problems we're having in America today, the small marginal producers, one statement that has never been challenged is if we had all of the marginal wells flowing today that we have plugged in the last 10 years that it would equal more than we're currently importing from Saudi Arabia. So it is a very important thing to me and very important to our state.

Senator Jeffords?

JEFFORDS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'd just like to go to repeating a request here. As you know, Senator Inhofe and I sent a letter to you last week regarding my information requests that are still outstanding. I have shared with you, as well as Senator Inhofe's staff's compilation of the request outstanding. I ask unanimous consent that that type of -- have that delivered to you and make it a part of the record.

Administrator Leavitt, you indicated to me earlier this week that your staff was reviewing our letter and that they would advise you on the appropriate responses. I'd like a commitment from you. Give me kind of a date in which I could get some response for this long, outstanding request.

LEAVITT: That's a response I'm happy to give you when I have it. And I will provide it as soon as we've concluded. We're in consultation with the chairman and the chairman's staff. We recognize the prerogative of the chair to ask for those documents. We want to do all we can to be cooperative. As I indicated earlier to Senator Wyden, our purpose is to share information when it's needed and when it's appropriate.

JEFFORDS: I appreciate that.

JEFFORDS: As I begin my next question related to lead contamination of Washington, D.C., water supply, I would offer my colleagues and the administrator a drink. You ought to take some of this water.

INHOFE: It's actually recycled urine.

JEFFORDS: Which are filled both water from our taps here in the Dirksen Building, supplied by the Washington Aqueduct, the water source for the district.

INHOFE: I hope you let it run for five minutes.

JEFFORDS: Then I would remind each of my colleagues that we have a choice to drink or not to drink this single glass of water before us today. This is not a situation which the people of the District of Columbia find themselves in. They don't have that option. I happen to be one of them too, so that applies to me as well. Many people who live here just don't have a practical or economically feasible alternative to tap water for cooking, bathing their children, mixing baby formula or drinking. For these people and for many others around the nation the decision that are made on all levels of government regarding water supply protections present immediate health issues. I urge my colleagues, the administrator and everyone involved in this issue, to keep this in mind as we move forward.

Administrator Leavitt, here in Washington the EPA is particularly responsible for the safety of the city's drinking water because the district does not have primacy under the Safe Drinking Water Act. This means that EPA region two must act as a state would normally act as the first line review of the city's actions. I'm extremely concerned with some of the reported actions taken by WSA. However, I am equally concerned whether EPA has acted appropriately in executing its responsibilities under the Safe Drinking Water Act. This committee will be holding a hearing on the Washington D.C. water lead contamination issue on April 7. I have a long list of questions for the record that I would like the agency to answer before that hearing.

However, there is one question that needs to be addressed today. Administrator Leavitt, can you describe what you see as a major failure of EPA in dealing with the lead contamination in the District of Columbia metropolitan area and are you concerned about similar lead problems in other regions of the country?

LEAVITT: Senator, much will be learned, I believe, in subsequent months as we look back on this period. It's clear that the Environmental Protection Agency does have a heightened responsibility in this case. And we have made clear to WSA, the agency that manages this on behalf of Washington D.C. and to Washington D.C. that there are certain things that we expect of them. We intend that they are done and done in a timely way. And if they are not that we'll be stepping up the involvement of the national government. But we have every assurance they've been operating cooperatively. Our intention is to assure that when you and I and every other member of Washington D.C. public drink water that it's safe.

JEFFORDS: Just get around to global warming at this point, the world scientific consensus, including the American geophysical union, and the National Academy of Sciences could not be much clearer, manmade emissions are contributing to global warming and climate change. This in turn is likely to have a serious negative environmental economic and national security impact upon the United States. Why shouldn't greenhouse gasses be regulated under the Clean Air Act because of the harm they already appear to be causing and will cause in the future?

LEAVITT: I see the red light is on. I will simply say, Mr. Chairman, that when the EPA, if the EPA is called upon by Congress to regulate them, we would do our best. But at this point they are not regulated pollutants and, therefore, we're concentrating on other things.

INHOFE: Well, I'd like to respond, but if I do that then I know there'd be other responses. But the science is certainly not settled. There is some confusion, as I said air transport, understandably you might think we're talking about air and it doesn't recognize state lines. I was talking about the air transport or the airline transport industry being under this particular rule and the problem, the danger, that comes from that. So I think...

LEAVITT: I'll do our best to respond in that light.

INHOFE: Right. That'll be fine. We'll get to that certainly.

Senator Voinovich?

VOINOVICH: Yes, I'd wish that Senator Carper was still here, but the reason why some of us haven't been able to support his legislation is according to EIA, the Energy Information Agency, that that legislation that deals with the question that Senator Jeffords raised would cost six times more than clear skies or $150 billion because it basically caps carbon. And the problem we have here and it's something that you're going to have to reconcile is that we have been, through environmental policies, limiting the supply of natural gas and exacerbating the demand for it so that all of the new energy facilities in my state are natural gas.

By the way, they're not going to produce any energy this year because natural gas is out of sight. We are losing jobs overseas because of high natural gas costs. And a part of it is because we have had unrealistic environmental policy. And I think it's up to you to stand up and point these things out. And I'm certainly going to point them out to the people in the city of Cleveland and in Akron and Columbus and Cincinnati and the urban areas that the LIHEAP program is just being inundated because of the fact of these high natural gas costs.

Somewhere along the line we've got to balance this up with our economy and the impact it's having on the least of our brothers and sisters. And for some reason we can't get it done here. And maybe you can provide some leadership in this area.

The other thing we talk about the locals and paying for it. We got 200 and some 64 townships that have been asked to comply with the storm water management regulations phase two. They can't comply with them. Akron can't comply with them in 15 years. Now we went back and I think Senator Inhofe was here and Senator Jeffords was here, we amended the Safe Drinking Water Act several years ago. In fact, I was over at the White House when President Clinton signed that legislation. We eliminated the requirement that every three years you take on 25 new contaminants when they didn't exist. And we said that if the old fashion technology gets the job done that you can go with that and not have to go to the maximum available technology because these communities of less than 10,000 couldn't afford them.

I think it's about time that you started looking at some of this stuff. What are you requiring these communities to do? What's the cost benefit? And for goodness sakes, if you can't come up with the money and I know what they're telling you, let them take care of it, the rates. Well, these people can't take care of it, 100 percent increase in rates? These communities are in bad shape today. And I think it's about time that the agency looked at this thing realistically and make some recommendations and said you know we can't come up with the dough because we've got a financial problem. These folks in the local level can't come up with the money.

The fact of the matter is in this country when we really did something about clean water it was back in 1971 when we went forward with the 75/25 program where the feds came up with 75 percent of the money and the locals came up with 25. And that went off in the middle of the '80s. There are just a lot of things that need to be reconciled around here because we're in a global marketplace today, you know? I've got jobs moving overseas. I've got companies closing down because of the fact that we just haven't figured out our harmonizing our environmental and our energy and economic needs in this country.

And somebody's got to stand up and start talking about it because I'm telling you it's killing my state today. If you want to respond you can.

INHOFE: Amen.

LEAVITT: Well, Senator 126 days ago I was the governor of a state who had a similar number of small communities struggling to meet these standards. I find myself now in a new role. I'm the administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. I have a body of law called the Clean Water Act passed by the Congress, given to the administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency to administer. I have an obligation to achieve compliance, that's my goal. I have an obligation to enforce the law. That's my responsibility. I will tell you that the president of the United States gave me a very clear charge, purify the water, but do it in a way that will allow us to remain competitive as a nation.

I share your concern. I share that goal. There is no question that we have a national standard. We have to have neighborhood solutions. That's the tenant of my personal philosophy. Somewhere in between all of the hard edges of the Clean Water Act the hard responsibility of enforcing the law, the economic needs of small communities and the need for economic competitiveness there's a productive center, our objective is to find it.

VOINOVICH: Well, I think that because of the position you're in you should be able to provide us some leadership in this area, even if it is controversial. You should be able to say, you know, if the emperor has no clothes. OK?

LEAVITT: I've seen the emperor. He has no clothes.

INHOFE: Thank you, Senator Voinovich.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, this has turned into quite an ending here. You know, I have the deepest respect for my chairman and for the very able Senator from Ohio. And we are in a box. And we're in a box of our own making. And we're in a box that we don't need to be in, but apparently we'd rather stay in the box than get out of it. I think there's a way to both grow the economy and protect the environment. But it's not going to happen because of the positions that people have found themselves in. And some of the assertions that are made about what our state of knowledge is, what the clear, overwhelming evidence of science is, how we could create literally millions of jobs with respect to the environment in places like Ohio and upstate New York that are having lots of economic challenges. And it is discouraging because every year that goes by we hollow out the commitments of previous generations.

You know, back in 1971 it was Republican president at a time when our tax rates were much higher on both individuals and corporations, when we sat down a consensus about how we were going to begin dealing with the environmental problems that are the natural consequence of the way we have built America over the last 200 years. Now we're in the 21st century. We've slashed tax rates. And we have more competition that we have to figure out what to do with and we are, I think, turning our back on our responsibility to the future and to those who came before who figured out a way to deal with clean air and clean water. And most of the progress was made under Republican presidents.

So it is very concerning to me. And I wanted to just ask a few questions about science because this is where I have a deep disagreement with my friend and chairman. Let me start with a specific question and then maybe get a little more general. You know, in the '05 budget the EPA acknowledges the importance of the research you're doing on building contamination, this is just one example. And yet we know it zeroes out the relatively small amount of money spent on building contamination. And in describing this cut the EPA budget frankly explains, and I quote, "this cut represents complete elimination of homeland security building decontamination research and the cut will force it to disband the technical and engineering expertise that will be needed to address known and emerging biological and chemical threats in the future" end quote. This is just an example of being extraordinarily short sided.

And it also, of course, is of great concern to me because of all of our problems in New York. And I think that the research in this area is critical to go on. I mean we've lived through anthrax. We've lived through ricin. We've lived through the contamination of the collapse of the towers. So I just don't understand how with a relatively small amount of money the EPA made this decision. Could you explain to me how this was arrived at?

LEAVITT: Senator, I want to express appreciation for the generosity that the Congress has shown over the last two years in funding decontamination research. We've done our best to use those funds wisely. The research continues, and, frankly, we have not yet used all of the funds that Congress appropriated. This recommendation was based on that fact. We're going to continue to assess it. If, in fact, there's a need for more money, the generosity that the Congress has shown in funding it we hope will continue and we would come back to ask for additional funds. But it was our belief that we could complete what was necessary based on the existing appropriations or previous appropriations.

CLINTON: Well, we will take a hard look at that. But, finally, I am concerned about the use and misuse of science. And in February when the Union of Concerned Scientists issued a report detailing a series of suppression and manipulation of scientific information that report was accompanied by a statement signed by 60 prominent scientists. You know, they didn't work for the energy industry. They weren't in the environmental movement. They were scientists. And they expressed deep concern about what the administration was doing. And, of course, they highlighted some of the decisions being made in the EPA, particularly about the proposed Clear Skies Act, which they believe and I agree with, would be actually a step backwards from the Clean Air Act, a mercury rule and some other related issues.

And I was struck by a comment from Russell Train who was the EPA administrator under Presidents Nixon and Ford, who said how radically we have moved away from regulation based on independent findings and professional analysis of scientific health and economic data by the responsible agency who regulate these matters. And it's driven by the White House and political consideration.

These are really serious allegations. And they go hand in hand with Senator Wyden's concern about how 12 paragraphs from a document prepared by the law firm that two of the EPA officials were once part of got into the mercury rule. So I'd like to ask you, Administrator Leavitt, what steps will you take to make sure that the American public and the Congress can trust the information coming out of the EPA?

LEAVITT: Senator, it's been my experience that there are some remarkably able scientists, engineers at the EPA. And that we have partnerships with universities all over the world, and I will tell you that all over the country may I just emphasize that we are making decisions in this administration at the EPA on the basis of science, peer reviewed science. It's the first question I've come to ask. Whose produced this science? Has it been peer reviewed? Was it the basis of this decision?

With respect to what you said earlier, may I just say that in the context of any proposed rule information comes from lots of different sources. I took the rule home over the Thanksgiving holiday. It was about -- at least I took 275 pages of it to understand the policy of it. I don't know where all of it came from, but I will tell you that what I'm focused on in finalizing the rules what is the policy. And I want you to know that peer review is a very important standard we're holding all science to at the Environmental Protection Agency.

INHOFE: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

Senator Jeffords has two UC's and then we'll adjourn.

JEFFORDS: I ask unanimous consent to place Senator Lieberman's opening statement into the record.

INHOFE: Without objection.

JEFFORDS: I also ask consent to place the March 6 New York Times article entitled, quote, "How Industry Won the Battle of Pollution Control at EPA" end of quote, into the record.

INHOFE: Without objection.

JEFFORDS: Mr. Chairman?

INHOFE: Yes?

JEFFORDS: I'd like to ask unanimous consent to include the results of my information survey on mercury control companies as part of the record.

INHOFE: Without objection.

JEFFORDS: I believe that's...

INHOFE: OK. Did you have a final comment?

LEAVITT: I just wanted to make sure that Senator Jeffords knew that it's 10 minutes you should flush your water, not five. I misspoke.

INHOFE: Thank you very much, Mr. Administrator. We appreciate your time this morning very much.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON MISSILE DEFENSE BUDGET, 3/11/2004

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

The GAO is publicly releasing a report today that expresses concern about the lack of test data, something we've been focusing on here. And the report warns that the test plans through '07 do not include sufficiently challenging targets and decoys.

Now, the report, General Kadish, says that the first attempt at launching two interceptors against two targets is not scheduled until 2007. Is that correct?

KADISH: That's incorrect. I haven't read the report specifically, but part of the problem we have here is that we continually evaluate our test programs, and change our plans significantly sometimes based on the performance of the system. So we're not able to keep it up real time, given how those reports are made.

So I'm sure at one time that was what the schedule was, but I believe we have accelerated that effort.

CLINTON: So sometime after deployment in '04 but before '07?

KADISH: I think the current plan -- I'll have to make sure it's right for the record, but is next year.

CLINTON: The report also says that no plans exist to assess the effect of severe weather on the system's performance or to conduct flight tests under unrehearsed and unscripted conditions. I assume that relates to Senator Reed's point about the GPS.

But with respect to weather and the unscripted conditions, is that a fair statement?

KADISH: I don't think it's fair in the sense that we don't currently wait for a storm to do our tests. We have time lines to meet. We have certainly had weather effects on our system. Rain storms occurring during the test, that type of thing.

(UNKNOWN): If I might caution you, this report from the GAO that you referred to ended up being a classified document. I know it came into the committee as an unclassified document, but then the committee reclaimed it, I understand, as a classified document. I think we have to be a little careful about -- I just want to warn you about that.

CLINTON: I appreciate that caution. It's my understanding that's a different document. The GAO report I'm referring to is going to be publicly released today. And I believe there's a confusion about the report.

(UNKNOWN): OK. As long as we're not getting into -- as long as you understand and are aware of that. I was...

CLINTON: I'm very much aware of that. I'm very much aware.

In fact, I'm reading from The Washington Post.

(UNKNOWN): Well, there was an article written about the classified document that I understand should not have been made public.

CLINTON: I know, that's a different issue.

(UNKNOWN): That's a different issue. OK, very good, just as long as we're aware of that.

CLINTON: And I assume that doesn't come out of my time.

(UNKNOWN): It does not.

(UNKNOWN): Mr. Chairman, I'd also ask for 30 seconds, not out of Senator Clinton's time, to put in the record a GAO highlights of the report that Senator Clinton is referring to, because there are indeed two reports. The one that she's referring to is not the classified report. But I'd put in the record the one page that we have, which is clearly unclassified, that I know she has...

ALLARD: Without objection, that will be done.

And Senator Clinton, you may proceed.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, Senator.

(UNKNOWN): Thanks for your time.

CLINTON: The other point raised in the unclassified GAO report refers to the reliance on tracking data from an old surveillance radar, called Cobra Dane. But the report notes that the radar will not have been tested in its new role and will lack the ability, even with software improvements being contemplated, to provide more than a rudimentary analysis of incoming missile threats.

Is that a correct statement?

KADISH: I don't believe it's going to be correct. It may be correct today. But the radar Cobra Dane, again, I'd rather not get into the specifics here, for classification reasons. But as of today, we have installed our software on that radar and it's actually tracking objects.

CLINTON: General, last year at our hearing, my colleague, Senator Bayh asked a question -- and he unfortunately had to leave -- but I want to reiterate the question, because I think it really gets to the core of our concern.

Last year, Senator Bayh said, suppose that our best effort at negotiation and containment of North Korea prove unsuccessful, and that at some point next year the president, whoever that is, is confronted by actionable intelligence that for whatever irrational reasons the North Koreans are contemplating or preparing to launch missiles against our territory and most likely that would mean Hawaii or perhaps Alaska.

And the president calls you, General Kadish, and says, "Tell me, am I ready to defend against a potential attack from North Korea today?"

Now last year, the response, as I recall, to Senator Bayh was, that's classified. Is that the same response this year?

KADISH: The actual performance data would be classified, yes.

CLINTON: Now, what that leaves, though, it leaves a tremendous amount of concern on the part, not just of members of Congress who, like myself, support a National Missile Defense System, if it's done appropriately and if it actually works, but it also raises the possibility that whether it works or not at this point, it has deterrent effect, the very fact that we are engaged in it may in some way deter those, assuming they act rationally.

But do you have any prediction as to when performance data will be made publicly available so that it can be debated and analyzed by members of this body and equally important the American public? I'm not talking about details, but at least being able to answer the question, will it work? If we are confronted with a launch from North Korea, is this a defense system that we can count on to work?

KADISH: I think there are two questions there, so let me try to answer two questions, unless somebody else wants to help me answer this question.

But from my responsibilities, I firmly believe, personally, that the performance characteristics of any weapons systems, especially this missile defense system, should be properly protected with classifications appropriate to it.

So public discussions of specific performance capabilities would not be appropriate. I don't think we generally like to discuss in public our offensive performance capabilities, for the same reason.

So having said that, however, the next question is, how are we going to maintain increasing confidence in the effort? And what characterization could you make at any given time in the system?

And I guess my response to that would be that at any given time, we will have an understanding of the behavior of our systems, its performance based on testing to date, and it will change over time. And it is my belief, given the investments that we have going in here, that it will always get better.

Now at any point in time, Admiral Ellis, our successors in these positions, will have to make that judgment. If we're ever asked the question what is the capability we have today, we'll have to describe that in ways that people can understand and act on.

But it's a different equation when you say there is no capability today, zero, and there is something different than zero. And there's a different assessment between when you have something that's constantly improving to describe that in a way that people can understand. And I think we'll be in a position to do that, when and if called on to do it.

And in fact, as we put it on alert, that's part of the process of learning about the system.

WYNNE: Senator, I'd also like to follow up and just say that after each test, I know that the Missile Defense Agency comes and discusses with this committee the results of those tests. And I expect that that interaction will continue to make sure that you do, in fact, have a very robust knowledge of what the capabilities are.

And I know that beyond that, this committee has been, and continues to be, extremely sensitive to making sure that we do in fact express a deterrent effect.

WYNNE: I mean, I go back to the Strategic Air Command and their nuclear mission. And peace was their professions, and that was their motto. And I know it is the motto of the Atlas missile people who watch right now under the watchful eyes of Admiral Ellis. And I know it's going to be essentially the mission of the ground-based missile defense that we hope that we have invested sufficiently and are technologically clear that it will have the deterrent effect our triad has had over the years.

CLINTON: Mr. Wynne, could I just ask you: Do you believe the recent Russian claim about their development of a capacity I guess -- I don't know if it's fair to say -- evade, or their recent announcement that they've developed a maneuvering warhead to evade missile defense?

WYNNE: I read that in a public policy. I have not seen anything beyond that.

There's no doubt that the Russians are continuing to invest in offensive missile capability. Don't know that it's yet what the level of development is.

CLINTON: General, do you have an opinion about the Russian claim?

DODGEN: I think it's the same as Mr. Wynne. At this point in time, our missile defense systems are not oriented to Russia. So we're not paying -- I'm not paying much attention to that.

ALLARD: Senator Clinton, we need to move forward. I gave you an extra two minutes, by the way.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

U.S. SENATOR JEFF SESSIONS (R-AL) HOLDS HEARING ON THE FY 2005 ARMY TRANSFORMATION BUDGET REQUEST, 3/11/2004

CLINTON: No, that's fine, Mr. Chairman. Thank you. I don't have enough voice to make both an opening and ask questions.

But I wanted to pick up where Senator Dole was leading, because I think that she's articulated very well some of, you know, the questions that I have. And maybe we could put it into more of a practical example, which might help me understand the modular concept as you're describing it.

Because I'm very intrigued by it. And I think it sounds as though not only have you given a lot of thought to it, but certainly, as you describe it with full organic and independent capability and with this ability to be networked and really be part of a joint theater, I mean, obviously that makes an enormous amount of sense.

Let's, for the sake discussion, assume that one of these new modular brigades, say a heavy brigade, is in a conflict similar to OIF, and across a border of an enemy country and they're moving on whatever the target is. Now, the modular brigade, which is self-contained, as you have described it, General, how would that, as you envision it, deal with both the supply chain and logistical problems that you have discussed?

And I appreciate it when General Schoomaker testified before us, his assessment which went along with some of the after-action reviews, that there some real logistical glitches and you're now about the business of trying to figure those out.

So on the one hand, how does this modular brigade perform differently and more effectively in conjunction with whomever on the, sort of, supply/logistical end?

And then suppose this new modular brigade gets to a target objective and holds ground where all of a sudden you need MPs and civil affairs until something else occurs. I mean, just, kind of, give a more practical down-to-Earth explanation as to how we can be modular, smaller, more productive and deal with these continuing challenges we have.

CURRAN: OK.

CLINTON: Either General Curran, General Casey, Secretary Bolton.

I'm just really curious, because, I mean, the concept is so attractive, but I'm just trying to understand it better.

CURRAN: If you would permit me, I'd like to address the last part of your point first.

The brigade has moved, as you stated, through a major combat operation, has now secured its objective and is now transitioning into a different mission, for instance...

CLINTON: Right. But it happened so quickly.

CURRAN: And it does happen very quickly.

The rest of the modularity story is not just about these modular maneuver brigades, heavy and light. The rest of the modularity story is that there will be support units of action or brigades that are in a force pool nested at what we call the unit of employment level -- read division, corps or army of today. And these capabilities -- MPs, engineers, aviation, fires, psychological operations -- these pools of capabilities will be resident and available to be tailored with the brigade.

As we talked about, we are changing a number of our positions within the Army, reducing the amount of artillery, moving to more resident MPs, civil affairs, PSYOPS capabilities within the organization. They will fill out and round out the support units of action. The support units of action are also modular in design.

A combatant commander can pick and choose from this pool. "I need this many maneuver units of action, I need this many protection support units of action or brigades, which would include MPs and engineers. I need this many sustainment units of action." And from the force pool, the combatant commander will be able to tailor the force to meet the needs they would.

If we would take OIF as an example, one of this new modular brigades is part of the 3rd Infantry Division that's marching on to Baghdad, it arrives at Baghdad. In the force flow, you could have additional support units of action that are following to flow into theater to meet up with that brigade when it transitions to that new mission.

It already will have some embedded capability. It has MPs and it has engineers already nested within the modular design. But we're speaking about now is really a transition to a stabilization mission, peace mission.

But these will all be nested in modular capabilities at a higher echelon but in a force pool that the combatant commander can draw upon.

I wanted to take that part anyway.

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

BOLTON: Senator Clinton, if I could add another example, and really it's what our sister services are already doing. The Navy, for a number of years, if not decades, has used carrier battle groups, which brings together certain capabilities to affect some type of capability that the combatant commander wants. So we'll have X number of Aegis cruisers, destroyers, attack boats or submarines, carriers, domestic aircraft and so forth.

Back in the mid-'90s, the Air Force went to the expeditionary Air Forces, which then took fighters and cargo and tankers and other assets, both airborne and spaceborne, and put them in packages.

The Army has done a similar thing, but here the scale is a bit larger, particularly when you get onto the ground and particularly in stabilization situations. And as Mark's already pointed out, there are groups that we will modularize to take care of stabilization, whether that's contracting, setting up of infrastructure, the civilian policing forces, opening up hospitals and libraries and mail service and roads and so forth.

And once again, it's the combatant commander who will drive this initially to say, "This is what I want." And it's up to us to figure out which modules we're going to put together to meet that.

And I agree with you, this is an interesting concept. It's exciting and I'm glad to be a part of it because some of my folks will be some of the first on the ground to take care of the infrastructure when we go into stabilization.

CLINTON: General Casey?

CASEY: Let me see if I can try it this way. Maybe if I compared it to the capabilities of a brigade moving on a mission today compared to what a modular brigade would do. Maybe that would help out.

Today, a brigade formation moving, it would have a reconnaissance company, a smaller unit, about 75 to 80 folks. And their job is to go out and find the enemy and develop the situation. The modular brigade would have a battalion, about 600 people, doing the same thing.

The current brigade may get some time from the division level UAV to look at in front of them. And if they're really lucky, they may have some small UAVs that they can use forward. In the modular brigade, the reconnaissance squadron would have its own UAVs that they would use to develop the situation in front of them. The target acquisition element with the artillery would have their own UAVs to develop targets for the artillery to shoot at. So instead of sharing time, they've got their own and they've got their own in a way that facilitates the commander seeing the battlefield and at the same time getting his targets for him.

In the current headquarters, you have attachments showing up; your civil affairs, your MPs, they don't normally train together.

CLINTON: Right.

CASEY: Those folks are all built into the new headquarters at the modular brigade.

In the current brigade, you probably will have an Air Force liaison officer and a few small air liaison teams that you'd share down to the units. In the current modular brigade, you'd have a joint fires planning cell with all of the appropriate connectivity to reach back into the joint fires system. So much, much better able to see the battlefield and to bring joint fires and joint effects into play.

The other thing is because it has its own enablers, it can operate on a much wider piece of ground. When the division commander is trying control all of his elements, they generally have to stay in close contact or at least maintain contact. And so it's a little more structured. These modular brigades are designed to operate in a non- linear fashion.

CLINTON: It sounds, too, that you've pushed a lot of authority down to the combatant commander.

CASEY: Down to the colonel; that's exactly right.

CLINTON: Which I think makes a lot of sense. And, you know, when we visit with a lot of the commanders -- when I was there with Senator Reed, you know, giving them maximum authority to be able to operate was one of the best things that we did. It was, kind of, by default in a way, because there was so much unexpected that people ran into.

Do you think, General, it would be possible to give us some sort of a visual display of this, you know, with, sort of, the terms and the interconnections? I mean, I just think it would be helpful to really lay it out, because it's an incredibly creative concept, which I'm very intrigued by. I don't pretend to understand it, but you did the best you could to explain to me, for which I'm grateful.

CASEY (?): A picture is definitely worth a thousand words.

CLINTON: A picture is worth a lot. Thank you very much.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS
HEARING ON THE FY 2005 DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

DEFENSE-RELATED ACTIVITIES BUDGET REQUEST, 3/23/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And, thank you, Mr. Secretary. I had a series of questions on a variety of issues. And I wanted to follow-up on the line of questioning concerning our efforts on non-proliferation. And as I understand it, the department's National Nuclear Security Administration has a real expertise in non-proliferation verification research and is responsible for the development of remote and ground-based sensing and detection technologies that are capable of detecting nuclear weapons and materials at borders, airports and elsewhere.

In fact, I think it's fair to say that the technology work that the NNSA does represents the bulk of the research in our government on nuclear detection technology development. That's why I was concerned to see that the budget for this work in fiscal '05 is $111.5 million which represents an 11.6 percent reduction from fiscal year '04.

I can't imagine any more important work than our efforts to understand how to detect weapons grade materials. And to me, this reduction seems short-sighted. So if I could ask you to explain. In your opinion, is the NNSA doing everything possible to address this problem? And what are the unfunded requirements for detection technologies?

ABRAHAM: It's first of all, I think, fair to say that they do excellent work. And I think you're exactly right. It's my understanding that some of these program responsibilities were moved out of our department, which is what accounts for the reduction in funding as part of the Homeland Security Department's emergence. And so, some of that responsibility for the research has moved over there, which is what accounts for the change in funding.

Now I've got a lot of experts sitting here who probably know the numbers better than I do, but that's my understanding of the reason that that's changed.

CLINTON: Well, I would appreciate having some written response to this because I am, frankly, concerned about moving high-level technology research into the Department of Homeland Security. And I don't know that they are up to speed or have the capacity, have the interaction and synergy that goes on in DOE.

And, you know, I think we really need to take a hard look at this, Mr. Chairman, because there isn't anything more important than having the very best that we can have doing this research and developing this technology.

So I'd appreciate some written response and maybe a trail that can lead us to find out who we can ask at the Department of Homeland Security because, you know, they're having trouble getting up and going on a range of issues that are under their umbrella. And this is one that I don't think belongs there, if indeed that's where it's been moved.

ABRAHAM: We'll be happy to provide that.

CLINTON: Thank you. Mr. Secretary, I'm also impressed by the recently announced task force that you have compiled to work with the International Atomic Energy Agency to locate, identify and assess the risk of radiological devices. I think you referred to it earlier in responding to a question.

From our information, it's having considerable success. It's creating a kind of global commitment to this. And we're making some progress.

But not being addressed is the highly enriched uranium and weapons grade plutonium that exists outside of Russia and the former Soviet Union. Would you support an effort similar to the radiological dispersal devices task force to locate, identify, assess the risk and secure as appropriate highly enriched uranium and plutonium worldwide?

I certainly congratulate you on what's been accomplished in Libya. I was a little bit concerned that we're sending some of the material back to Russia. That doesn't give me a lot of confidence at this moment because I'm not yet sure that we are doing everything we need to do there.

But what about this idea of setting up a comparable task force?

ABRAHAM: Well, I think a global clean-out of this kind of material is very wise and I think should be a very high priority.

I kind of referenced earlier this effort we've been doing on an ad hoc basis, Mr. Chairman. There is U.S. origin fuel that's out in the world that needs to be returned. We now are going to be consolidating that effort which had been under the Environmental Management Division of the Department of Energy. We're going to consolidate that and integrate that into this program that's ongoing in the Non-Proliferation Division of the NNSA because these should all be housed in one place.

But there is a lot of U.S. source fuel. The Russian source fuel I mentioned -- the reason it goes back, it's the Russian's fuel, so we -- obviously their ownership rights dictate the return. But there is also fuel that has origin that's neither Russian nor American.

CLINTON: Right.

ABRAHAM: This past week, I had an opportunity to talk at some length about this with Director General ElBaradei of the IAEA because this is a priority that he, I think, likewise shares. And we, in fact, talked about how we might put together a multi-lateral effort to do this.

I think it's a serious threat, and I -- whether it's a Department of Energy task force or Department of Energy led task force or it's an IAEA program, I would think that it would be very timely.

CLINTON: Do you need legislative authority or any additional appropriated authority to do this?

ABRAHAM: I don't think we do. I'm kind of looking over at our folks here. I don't think we would need that to get it started. But I think it's a fair question for the record that we might want to get back to the committee on.

CLINTON: Well, it might very well be something we consider in the authorizing process because I really applaud you for what you've done on radiological devices. I think this is exactly the direction we need to be moving. And I would like to support you in this other area.

On a more provincial basis, but one that I think of as very important, last summer, Mr. Secretary, you wrote to Congress asking for support for legislation to reclassify certain high-level radioactive waste incidental to reprocessing. I opposed that legislation because I believed that it would result in more high-level waste being left at the West Valley site in New York. I think it would also have the similar impact in Washington, South Carolina, Idaho, elsewhere.

The language was ultimately not included in any appropriation bill. But I understand that the department may be pressing for this legislation again. Is that correct?

ABRAHAM: Well, just to step back a moment, the issue that we have is this. Throughout our complex, of course, the results, the remainder of the work that was done during the Cold War on the weapons programs. And one of the issues that we have been wrestling with is the disposition of materials within tanks that are the result of reprocessing.

That material is not of one composition. The material in these tanks is of multiple types of composition, some of it obviously of critical, urgent need for remediation, high-level waste. And other waste whose radioactivity level does not meet the same standard.

We believe and have felt that the department had the authority to differentiate the classification of the composition of these tanks. But a district court ruling in Idaho has, as you know, raised questions about whether that authority exists or the extent to which it exists.

And so, in this year's budget, just to put it in perspective, we have fenced about $350 million of money that was going to be spent on the remediation of what is probably over time about a $50 billion program. The $350 million we were going to spend this year on that program is kind of on hold until we can resolve whether or not there is such authority.

ABRAHAM: But we need to clarify the legal authority.

We believe that the department does have the ability to safely and accurately differentiate between the kind of materials that are -- the radioactivity level and, therefore, the disposition of the materials in these tanks. We are talking with the various states, and we hope that maybe we can come to a resolution because the longer we put this off, if we don't spend that money, if we don't start down this road, the more the risk, you know, grows in these communities.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Secretary, could I have your commitment that you would consult with New York state and also with my office as you proceed on this? Because it's my understanding that New York at least has not been brought into these conversations.

ABRAHAM: Well, we'll make sure we keep New York informed. At this point, I'm not sure whether there'll be a legislative solution that works. But obviously for us to proceed, there's going to need to be legislative action. And obviously all the members will be, you know, involved at some point. And we'll keep you apprised of where that's at.

CLINTON: And also the state, too.

ABRAHAM: OK.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WARNER: Thank you, Senator.

Senator Bill Nelson?

BILL NELSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

You've got the little BB there right by you.

ABRAHAM: Right.

BILL NELSON: So why don't you tell us is DOE committed to support the National Ignition Facility so that the goal of ignition can be once again no later than 2010?

ABRAHAM: Yes, we are committed to that goal. We recognize how important achieving it is to Congress. And it is important to us.

Mr. Chairman, I did bring this today. I mentioned it to you yesterday. But in this case is a target, what would effectively be -- what will be the target of the National Ignition Facility. Maybe somebody could get it up to the head table if you all wanted to look. And let me try to explain quickly, and then I know you had other questions.

But one of the challenges which this whole process presents to us. Of course, like many of the things the Department of Energy is forced to work on, is doing things that were unthinkable, never before attempted, scientific achievements. What we will be doing when this National Ignition Facility is completed and all the 192 lasers are functioning is to shoot effectively 192 laser beams at the small, red BB in the middle of that glass container and hit it simultaneously.

To give a sense of this, I was informed yesterday that the power that would be involved in that moment of contact would exceed all the power production all United States electricity generation facilities at one time. We have to hit that BB. And the challenge which caused us to pause in terms of the timeframe was that not only do we have to hit that tiny, tiny target, but we actually have to also inject inside of that target deuterium and tritium so that we can measure the impact of this process when this laser shot takes place.

Now how to get those gases into that target has been a real challenge for us. And we had decided or believed that a diffusion approach -- that is, to freeze the substances and to try to effectively through diffusion inject them into the BB was the preferred course. The problem is that would take a lot longer time. And that's where the 2014 timeframe emerged for discussion.

We have concluded, however, that the use of a fill tube approach will, in fact -- although it's a little riskier -- will be, in fact, an approach that can succeed. And so, it is our belief that that approach can be successful. We have conducted other forms of experimentation that indicates we can do that without disrupting the physics that are involved. And so, that allows us to move back to a timetable that I think we and the Congress are focused on and believes needs to be met.

BILL NELSON: So that's the plan for bringing it back to 2010?

ABRAHAM: Right.

BILL NELSON: OK. In the National Nuclear Security Administration non-proliferation verification R&D account, the budget for this work in '05 is $111 million, which represents an 11 percent reduction from '04. Given the importance of this work and the technical challenges of detection, particularly the technical challenges of detection of weapons grade materials, I want to question this reduction in funding.

We have some of this detection stuff in my state. So what I need to know is the NNSA going to do everything possible to address this problem? And what unfunded requirements for detection technologies?

ABRAHAM: As I indicated, Senator, earlier, the reason that this reduction appears is because some of the programs which had been in our department in terms of this R&D have been moved to the Department of Homeland Security. And that accounts for the difference.

We would be happy to provide the committee, as I mentioned a little earlier, with some specific information that would allow the committee to monitor how that phases, those parts of the program are being handled or where they're being handled, which office at DHS is responsible for your consideration.

BILL NELSON: Well, am I the chairman or you, Mr. Sessions, the chairman?

SESSIONS: I'll act as one. Are you finished? Thank you, Senator Nelson.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, would you yield for just a second?

SESSIONS: Yes.

CLINTON: Because Senator Nelson is concerned about this same issue I'm concerned about, what has happened to the NNSA budget. It's our information, Mr. Secretary, that the chem-bio detectors were moved to DHS, but not the nuclear detectors and that the money for the nuclear detection program has been cut. So we really need to clarify this because obviously this is a matter of some concern to a number of us.

And I appreciate the courtesy, Mr. Chairman.

SESSIONS: Well, thank you, Senator Clinton.

ABRAHAM: I'll take it for the record. I think we do have a comment to add, but I think probably the details are beyond what I can give you right now.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON HOMELAND DEFENSE, 3/25/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you, gentlemen.

Secretary McHale, during your confirmation hearings last year, I raised concerns about the number of firefighters, police officers, emergency personnel who were being called up. And of course we've seen an increased tempo even since your confirmation hearings.

And in February of last year, I wrote to Secretary Rumsfeld about this issue. And I appreciated your pledge and that of the secretary to find answers as to what the impact of the call-up of these first responders are. Because it connects with what you're doing on homeland security, these new civilian support teams. It's a very critical question to much of what we're discussing today.

Now, I've been trying, on my own, to gather some of this information. For example, the latest information I could get is that in 2002 the NYPD spent more than $200,000 a week to cover their reservists and firefighters. Well, they covered their reservists who were in the police department. The fire department spent more than $100,000 a week. So we've got $300,000 a week coming out of the New York City budget.

We have, in smaller communities like Niagara Falls, the Niagara Falls police department spent more than $350,000 last year to cover their officers away on military leave. They expect to spend the same now. And I've gotten information from a variety of other states, from Utah to North Carolina to Texas to Georgia.

And we are still concerned about this, because it is a deployment of personnel and resources. And just as the special operation forces take a lot of time to learn their job, to get ready to carry it out, you know, we found tragically, you know, on September 11th that, you know, a lot of our firefighters and police officers, also, it takes a while for them to understand exactly what they need to do. And we're losing a lot of those people to their Reserve and Guard duty.

Have you been able to conduct a study that I requested last year? And you planned to publicly release the results of that. And are there any policy changes that you might consider because of the impact?

MCHALE: Senator, the issue that you raise is very challenging, not only in the public sector but for private sector employers as well. When you had asked me the question during the confirmation hearing, I didn't have the information. The issue that you raise is one that falls within the jurisdiction of the assistant secretary of defense for reserve affairs.

We, in ASD Homeland Defense, operationally, we provide the policy guidance. General Eberhart operationally commands those reserve forces that are actually dedicated to the homeland defense mission. But issues of mobilization, recruitment and retention fall under the authority of the assistant secretary of defense for reserve affairs.

So in response to your inquiry, I went back to Mr. Hall, and he told me at that point that we did not have in our database of information the ability to identify which of our reservists were simultaneously employed as first responders.

And it was challenging, not so much in the case of professionally employed first responders, but because so many of our communities, particularly in your state, in the rural areas, are served by volunteers. And so we knew that an individual reservist was employed, working for, let's say, a manufacturing company. What we didn't know was that, in her or her part-time hours, he or she might have been a volunteer for a paramedic unit.

And so, you and I had met on the subject, and I had given you, at that point, the latest information that I had.

I also brought to your attention that there is, what I will call, a delayed-entry program. And that is, if a first responder is notified that he or she is being brought to active duty, the community in which that first responder works can request and will be granted by the Department of Defense a brief delay to bridge the gap, so that we don't have an abrupt departure of that first responder.

Lastly, I will now get back to Secretary Hall, find out what progress has been made on the database to see if we can identify how many professionally employed and volunteer first responders are also reservists, so that we can quantify, not just for the public sector, but for the private sector as well, the dual obligation.

CLINTON: I appreciate that very much, Mr. Secretary.

I'm also concerned about the continuing coordination between DOD and the Department of Homeland Security. And I'd like to ask you, Mr. Secretary, and you, General, as well, that last year we were told that the Department of Defense did not coordinate their heightened threat levels with the Department of Homeland Security's color code.

Now, can you tell me whether there has been any changes to code orange or code red with respect to DOD and NorthCom?

And in the event of a decision to increase the threat level, who makes the call on whether we increase defensive measures for New York? You know, I'm very focused on our continuing vulnerability and the fact that we remain such a high target.

And suppose the Department of Homeland Security initiated a higher code level of alert, but DOD and NorthCom decided not to. I mean, where are we supposed to end up there in New York, particularly New York City? You know, the police and firefighters and the mayor's office, you know, they have their own intelligence because we're so big and we feel the threat so intimately, but obviously the coordination with all of you is equally critical.

So, can you kind of explain where we are in all of that thinking now, and what the sequence would be?

MCHALE: Senator, I'd be happy to. And I think General Eberhart would probably want to comment then, perhaps, on air threat levels and some of the operational matters that fall within his purview.

At the highest level, I can give you a complete assurance that we have made dramatic progress, dramatic progress in the last year, in terms of coordinating DHS and DOD activity. I'd mentioned briefly, a little bit earlier, that members of my staff now work full-time in the Homeland Security Operation Center out on Nebraska Avenue, completely engaged, 24/7/365...

CLINTON: Mr. Secretary, if I could just...

MCHALE: Surely.

CLINTON: ... stop you a second. Does that mean, then, if we see Secretary Ridge on television raising the threat level, that there's been an agreement and a sign-off in DOD on that increased threat level?

MCHALE: There certainly is coordination. There's not a sign-off, in that the statute does not give the -- the statute that sets the level, as I recall, the system of level, is the Homeland Security Act of 2002. And the secretary of defense doesn't have a veto; he doesn't have to sign off.

But I can tell you from my own experience and participation, there is robust communication and coordination before the secretary of DHS, and in consultation with the attorney general, raises it, let's say, from yellow to orange. The secretary of defense has full situational awareness of what's going on. And ordinarily, he or a designated representative -- at times it's been me in the past -- can participate in that discussion, as Secretary Ridge makes his statutorily assigned decision.

Now, the secretary of defense, within the NorthCom area of responsibility, decides our force protection condition. But he confers directly with his combatant commander. He discusses that issue, ordinarily, with General Eberhart. General Eberhart may make a recommendation. But the actual decision for force protection of DOD facilities is made personally and directly by the secretary of defense within the United States.

CLINTON: Well, of course, though, I'm concerned about DOD facilities; I'm also concerned about civilian facilities. And obviously, the assets to provide whatever additional support -- overflights, whatever kind of resources are needed -- are more likely to come from DOD than from DHS.

And so, at what point, General, do you get into that conversation? And do you then make the decision, or is that not yours to make?

EBERHART: I think what's important to note here why we're going to change the color code or the threat level. What is the threat? What do we perceive that would make us change?

And to give you an example, maybe it's a threat to a subway system. That may not be a reason to increase the air patrols.

So that's what Mr. McHale's referring to. As we talk about, what is the threat, and why are we changing the color code? Or why are we changing the force protection, or the anti-terrorism measures that we're taking?

If it is a threat that we think that we can deter, defeat, prevent by using a combination of things, then you'll see those two things running side by side, just like we saw over the holiday season. When you change the color code -- when we change the color code, we also change our force protection measures, our air patrols, the number of aircraft we have on alert, et cetera.

So I think what's important to note is, why are we changing it, and what is the relevance to what the Department of Defense could provide, and the Department of Homeland Security, and other law enforcement agencies can provide?

But now we're talking. Frankly, at the beginning, we were not. And so, we might read about a change in a color code. We might read about a change in the force protection. Now it's very well-linked. We know why, and we can take the appropriate measures.

CLINTON: Thank you.

SENATORS KENNEDY, LAUTENBERG AND CLINTON HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON MEDICARE, 3/30/2004

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Senator Lautenberg. And thank you for this report which details and provides a time line of these actions by the administration and their allies in Congress.

Now, I voted against the Medicare bill for a number of reasons, the primary one being that I didn't think it provided an adequate prescription drug benefit, in spite of the claims of the administration and the bill's sponsors, and that the system that was being hobbled together would actually increase the cost of prescription drugs for seniors and everyone else, thereby leading to the undermining of Medicare and its eventual withering on the vine, as some of my memories of some of the former Republican leaders in this Congress suggest is their real motive.

So I think it's still a bad bill, and I applaud Senator Kennedy for his efforts, along with a number of us, to try to fix the shortcomings.

But there is a very important set of issues around how this bill was sold and passed that cannot be ignored. And I don't know what it will take to get answers to these questions, but I feel, along with my colleagues, a duty to pursue them, because this is a process that was fraught with misdirection, misinformation and outright dishonesty.

CLINTON: Today, I have sent a letter to President Bush asking him to respond specifically to the issues raised by the chief Medicare actuary, Richard Foster.

Now, as many of you know, Mr. Foster testified last week before the House Ways and Means Committee. In that testimony, he reported that he had informed the White House, as early as June of last year, that he estimated the Medicare bill would cost taxpayers $535 billion -- $135 billion more than the estimate that was generally accepted at the time.

In spite of the fact that the administration knew in June that the executive branch's chief actuary had pegged the real cost at $135 billion more than what was being touted as the cost to fit into the amount that had been set aside by the administration and the Republican majorities to somehow craft a prescription drug benefit, the president persisted in using the $400 billion figure, time and time again. There was no nuance. There was no range of estimates. It was $400 billion. And he used that estimate as late as mid- November.

We also know that Mr. Foster was threatened with termination if he shared his $535 billion estimate with members of Congress.

So the question I think President Bush should answer is, Did he know there was a higher cost estimate, or did his staff fail to inform him?

This is becoming a pattern in this White House. What did the president know, and when did he know it? And has he taken any disciplinary action against members of his staff who kept the facts from him -- if, indeed, he was not informed.

Now, if the president knew of the higher estimate, why did he choose to make it a secret and continue to mislead the American public?

This Medicare bill is one of the most sweeping pieces of legislation that Congress has voted on in a number of years, and it will affect the lives of millions of Americans. No matter what side of the fence you fall on -- whether you are for it or against it -- every member of Congress and every member of the public relied on the best possible information to reach a conclusion about whether or not this drug benefit would be available and affordable for our seniors.

CLINTON: You know, one of the great losses that has occurred in this administration, on top of squandering the budget surplus and squandering the goodwill our country had after 9/11, is squandering the trust of the American people. The more we learn about how they do business on the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, the more we realize how they breach the trust that should exist between the president and the American people for partisan, political and ideological advantage.

So I believe the president owes the Congress and the American people, particularly our seniors, an honest and immediate explanation as to what he knew and what he will do about the fact that he was misled and that the actuary was threatened with dismissal for sharing the information with the Congress.

I think this is as serious an issue as we have seen come before us in quite some time. It goes to the real heart of our democratic progress. It is not a marginal issue. It is not a side issue. It is right at the heart of the trust that has to exist to keep our system going, and the checks and balances and accountability that are necessary for open, transparent government.

LAUTENBERG: Thank you.

Senator Kennedy?

KENNEDY: I congratulate Senator Clinton for this letter and join with her to receive the responses by the administration and by the president. And I commend Senator Lautenberg, who's been a tireless advocate for seniors and has been a forceful voice for responsible action and answers on the distortions, misrepresentations and basic manipulations of these figures over the Medicare bill.

KENNEDY: The Medicare bill was a sweetheart bill for the drug industry and the insurance industry, and a raw deal for the Medicare recipients. It's a Republican attack on Medicare pretending to be reform, and its enactment was tainted by deception and by contempt for congressional procedure.

The White House is using the public funds to run ads touting it as part of the president's reelection campaign, and the ads themselves are deviously designed to look like legitimate news report.

The Medigate report we are releasing today is a list of legal and ethical violations that would be more appropriate in a police blotter than a policy debate. The devious tactics used to pass the Republican Medicare bill and sell it to the public should have no place in our democracy.

Investigations have been requested or are already under way by the FBI, the House Ethics Committee, the General Accounting Office, the inspector general's office in HHS, and the Federal Communications Commission. What we don't have is an apology from the president for the shameful tactics the administration used -- and is still using -- to get its way.

The administration is spending millions of taxpayers' dollars to try to turn this lemon into lemonade, but it won't work. The more senior citizens find out what is actually in the Medicare bill, the angrier they become. The more the American people learn about what's in this defective bill, and how it was passed and promoted, the more disgusted that they will be.

Again and again, on issue after issue, the Bush administration has broken the basic bonds of trust that any administration must have to retain the confidence of the American people.

This administration did not tell the truth about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. It did not tell the truth about the No Child Left Behind Act. It did not tell the truth about jobs in the economy, and it has not told the truth about Medicare.

It's time to restore credibility and honesty to the office of the president. The American people deserve it, and in November, they will demand it.

LAUTENBERG: Thank you, Senator Kennedy.

I hope, Senator Clinton, that a question in the letter will be whether or not the president is also going to come through and tell us what the cost. Let him repeat it again and at the same time tell us what Mr. Foster's role was in concocting this story.

Questions?

QUESTION: Do you believe that Republicans on the Hill had access to this information?

LAUTENBERG: Well, I don't know that, but certainly after the House fiasco, they had to be asking some questions. I mean, there were arms twisted, arms broken, and seductive offers made to try to get people to vote for this rogue bill, we'll call it. And so, it's hard to imagine that people on our side -- we are left out, as you know, of conferencing and discussions between the two houses. So, well, I don't know.

Anybody want to conjecture on that?

KENNEDY: I think it's, myself, it's conceivable that the Republican conferees didn't have this information, and Foster himself has indicated that they gave that information to the White House. It's absolutely inconceivable.

KENNEDY: If anybody knows about the conferences, and having been involved conferences for some 40 years, knows that any administration, Republican and Democrat, that they have the best of the information, they always have the information, and they make that information available to the members of their party in these conferences.

That's the way it works up here. Everybody understands it. It's inconceivable to me that they didn't have that information. And Foster himself has indicated that he related that to the White House.

KENNEDY: Beyond that, the president has, within his power, he has the Council of Economic Advisers and he has the Office of Management and Budget. They both make assessments and evaluation of the cost of these, and they work with other institutions, the CBO as well, in the evaluation of various pieces of legislation. It's absolutely unthinkable, remote, inconceivable that they didn't all know exactly what was going on.

QUESTION: We've heard from you all on this issue a few times now. Where is the rest of the Democratic Caucus on this issue? How outraged are other members?

CLINTON: I think there is general outrage, and as with many issues that cause us to be concerned and even outraged, there's too much ground to cover with this administration, so we kind of, you know, divide up the labor.

It is hard to keep up with them and what they do. It's like an outrage a day. But there's a deeply felt sense of mistrust and disappointment, at the very least, and outrage, as I think many of us feel, that the administration seems oblivious to their obligations to deal in an open and transparent way with the members of Congress on both sides of the aisle.

LAUTENBERG: The Democrats all knew that there was something amiss here as soon as they laid down the date for implementation. It wasn't necessary, remembering that the whole -- the Medicare program was prepared in 11 months, starting from less available, convenient record keeping, computerized records at that time, than they have now. So this was the beginning of the hoodwinking of the American public.

So Democrats knew and they're all discouraged by what we've learned. Everybody talks about the fact that this bill has been increased in cost by more than 30 percent and that Foster was threatened and other conspiratorial actions take place on a routine basis.

QUESTION: You mentioned a number of investigations going on (inaudible) the FBI. When do you expect all those investigations to be complete? Do you expect them to be complete in this election cycle?

LAUTENBERG: Well, it be appropriate for the American public to note what is happening.

We know that a favorite activity of this White House is not to let the public know what's going on, whether it's letting contracts for work in Iraq or other places -- or, finally, I understand that Condoleezza Rice agreed this morning that she's going to testify. There are some conditions that have to be met. But they're always playing hide and seek and if you can find the information, it's over their corpses.

KENNEDY: Let me just add one other -- this Medicare bill was hijacked, hijacked by the Republican leadership and by this administration and by this president behind closed doors. And it is basically a program that is a sweetheart deal for the drug companies and the insurance companies, and a raw deal for every senior. And every senior in this country that finds out more and more about it, understands it. And that is something they are going to find out more about.

We are committed -- strongly committed to changing it and altering it. And we are going to bring those to the floor of the United States Senate. There's been introduction of legislation to alter and change it by our leader, Senator Daschle, which we are all in the support. And there's also been proposals by Congresswoman Pelosi, the Democratic leader in the House. And there have been a variety of other different amendments that have been advanced by Senator Clinton and Lautenberg.

But we are strongly committed to altering and changing it. We're looking for opportunities over the remainder. We're not just making these statements; we are strongly committed toward the changes.

LAUTENBERG: We've also sent a letter to the attorney general to look at things. I mean, there are several instances the provoke inquiry, whether it's the attempt to bribe the votes in the House, or to shut Mr. Foster down -- to threaten him; to continue to pretend that this bill is only $400 billion, when there isn't anyone who believes that anymore.

And then to use taxpayer money to promote their campaign; the GAO, who we inquired of, didn't say there was a law broken, but it did raise questions about the propriety of these messages that were sent to the printers, to the TV stations and to the community at large.

LAUTENBERG: The mailing 36 million circulars printed at a cost of some $9 million or $10 million. It's profligate use of taxpayer money to promote what really, if you look behind the curtain, is an attempt to propagandize the election.

With all of the money that this president has raised -- shameful sums of money, realistically -- and then pretend to represent the public at large and try then to pass the bill on to the taxpayers. There's a lot of interest.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) very serious charges, how would you like to see these dealt with? I mean are you...

LAUTENBERG: Quickly.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) criminal charges, an apology from the president? I mean, what would you like to see that could rectify this?

KENNEDY: First of all, there's illegality. If there's not illegality, it is basically bad policy and wrong to be using the Medicare funds, which are scarce funds paid in by seniors, for political purposes.

We have one review that says that the particular sending out of the Medicare documents is not a violation of the law. There still hasn't been a ruling with regards to the video, which is the clearest, I think, example, of the violations of the law.

But irregardless of whether it's a violation it's wrong -- it's wrong to do this kind of a part.

People have said, "Well, really, we have other -- we've had the Clinton administration that used the information sent out on the Medicare." This administration has taken this to new heights and people that are watching this understand it.

So that is the first kind of issue and question.

Secondly, it is illegal -- it's illegal to withhold information from the Congress. That's absolutely illegal to do that. That has to be pursued.

And if, I believe, those not only in the administration but also in the White House did it, you would think that the White House would be investigating it because that's a violation of the law. And as Senator Clinton and Senator Lautenberg have said, that is the whole basis of a relationship between -- trust between the executive and the Congress in terms of our ability to be able to function and to exist.

So these are serious, serious charges. Some are currently in investigations that we would expect. Others we would expect to have at a very early possible time. But there has to be.

We saw this morning where Kofi Annan asked for resignations because of failure of living up to responsibility and security. We want to see responsibility here and accountability, in terms of protecting our seniors on the prescription drug and protecting Medicare. That is a matter of, in many instances, life and death for seniors.

U.S. SENATOR GEORGE V. VOINOVICH (R-OH) HOLDS HEARING ON AIR QUALITY, 4/1/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you so much, Administrator Leavitt, for being here once again. I so appreciate the cooperative relationship that we have developed and look forward to working with you.

Before I arrived, I was told that there was a chart -- I don't know if it's over there in the chart collection -- which showed that the gross domestic product has climbed as emissions have declined. Is that it?

You know, I think that proves the point that economic growth and environmental protection go hand in hand, that to choose one over the other is a false choice.

But I'm concerned that in the testimony today and in some previous administration testimony, the fact that we have made progress at a period of time both economically and environmentally is being used to argue that we can change direction now. And I worry about that.

And I have a specific question because in the work that I've been doing on environmental health, and I know Senator Jeffords made reference to this and we're going to have an excellent witness, Dr. Thurston, on the next panel to talk about the results of very important research, we know that the public health costs of not providing more clean air requirements are going to be severe.

And along with that, I understand you're on the verge through EPA of providing guidance to the states as part of a permitting process that would actually limit the options that states can consider when applying best available control technology to new coal-fired power plants.

If I understand the guidance, it would prevent states from considering fluidized bed combustion or even integrated gasification of coal, both of which are substantially cleaner and more efficient than conventional pulverized coal.

Mr. Administrator, why would the agency limit the states' option since what we're trying to do, as you just eloquently said, was to have neighborhood so-called state responses? Why would you limit the states' options and curb the development of these and other important new technologies?

LEAVITT: I'm going to confer, because I don't know what...

CLINTON: I do that a lot.

(CROSSTALK)

LEAVITT: ... decision on any guidance at this point.

Senator, we've made no decision on that point. Our basic philosophy at the agency is national standards, neighborhood solutions. That is to say we need to optimize the number of tools that are available to people who need our high protective standards.

May I echo what has been said about the link between economic prosperity and environmental progress? Without economic prosperity, environmental progress ceases. There's nothing that fosters pollution like poverty. And we see very clearly at the Environmental Protection Agency that link, and it's for that reason that our purpose in this national strategy is to accelerate the velocity of our progress, but to protect our national competitiveness as we do it.

CLINTON: Well, I'm delighted to hear that no guidance has been formulated. And I would strongly urge that we do everything possible to incentivize new technology. Because in your testimony, and I quote, you state, "Our past experience under the Clean Air Act suggests that development of cleaner technologies, which is continuing on many fronts, will help even the areas with the most difficult pollution progress at a reasonable cost in new ways we cannot identify today."

And I could not agree more, and I am one of those who think that we could have a job explosion in this country with clean energy, with smart technology, with pollution control devices. And anything that EPA can do to try to incentivize that, I think would have tremendously positive effect.

CLINTON: But I know that when we tighten the environmental and public health standards, we drive the private sector to innovate, and we've had some very positive results from that. And the cost of pollution control then comes down in ways that we couldn't have foreseen when the standards were set.

But that leads me to a follow-up question, Administrator Leavitt. Why do you think that this experience applies to the control of ozone and particulate matter emissions, but not to mercury emissions? Why are you backing a mercury rule that will not result in mercury-specific emission controls on power plants until 2018? Because if you follow the thinking that I agree with completely in your testimony about what we can do to force the private sector to innovate, I would argue strongly that just squarely impacts on what we could make happen with respect to mercury control as well.

LEAVITT: Senator, the discussion on mercury has occupied a great deal of my attention. It's something I feel deeply about on a personal basis.

There have been a number of what I will term for the purpose of description, been a number of fictions that have crept into this discussion, and I think it would be valuable for me to clarify them.

One fiction is that the EPA does not view mercury as a toxin. The fact is mercury is a toxin, and it needs to be reduced. Another fiction is that somehow the agency is seeking the administration to roll back standards. The fact, there has never been a standard. This will be the first time that we will have regulated mercury from power plants in our nation's history, and we want to do it and we want to do it right.

The third fiction is that someone previously had indicated that we could do it by as much as 90 percent. Senator, I have searched the records of the agency and I can find no place where a person in the agency, representing the agency indicated that was possible. And if they did, they were misinformed.

The next fiction is that it's possible between now and 2007 to get a 90 percent reduction on mercury from power plants. I've spent an enormous amount of time with the engineers and the scientists who not only understand this but who invented it. And it's become very clear to me that as optimistic as I am about the mercury-specific technology, particularly activated carbon injection, which I think is clearly the way we'll get to large scale reductions, that it will not be adequately tested nor widely deployable until 2010. Now, that is as close to a fact as I can provide you.

Another fiction is that we're somehow putting off the reductions until 2018. The fact, we're considering two mercury rules right now, one that would be in keeping with the mercury MACT, which would have to be by 2007; and the second or what we think is a more aggressive and in our opinion a better way, which would allow us to reduce it by 70 percent using a cap and trade system. We believe it gets more and happens faster, but we're receiving comment on both and trying to learn about both.

But in both cases, in both cases, there are short-term objectives that have to be met on mercury, and we have no interest or intention of putting off our action on this until 2018.

CLINTON: I thank you very much for that answer, Administrator Leavitt, and I look forward to, you know, further engagement with you on this issue, because I appreciate the fact that it is a toxin that I worry about the cap and trade system creating hotspots that will have very damaging effects on the people who are directly impacted by those particular emission forces.

And so I look forward to having an ongoing discussion about this, and I just would hope though that we would keep in mind the fact that we've been quite successful in not only reducing emissions but creating technologies that have had spin-offs and very positive economic effects.

And I'll just conclude by saying that, you know, if you look around the world right now, the Japanese, the European Union, they intend to corner the market on clean technology and pollution control devices. They are going to have a tremendous economic comparative advantage over us in this technology. I think that's unfortunate. And of course, it's being driven by government policy, just not by the market because with any new venture, often times you need some support for investments and the like.

And so I just think we're missing the boat by not being really aggressive in creating incentives and regulations that will both lower pollution and also trigger the development of technology.

Thank you.

VOINOVICH: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

Mr. Administrator, I'd like to say that I believe that the new rules that you're going promulgate are ambitious in terms of cleaning up the environment and its impact on public health, would you say that?

LEAVITT: Senator...

VOINOVICH: Yes or no.

LEAVITT: Yes.

VOINOVICH: OK.

LEAVITT: Absolutely.

VOINOVICH: All right. And Clear Skies, the legislation that I've introduced on behalf of the president and Senator Inhofe is ambitious in terms of reducing emissions and also the impact of emissions on public health.

LEAVITT: It would be the most aggressive this nation's ever had.

VOINOVICH: OK.

LEAVITT: I would like to say that this gross domestic product, picking up on what Senator Clinton had to say, is very robust. But the world has changed in the last four or five years. The world has changed. Competition from China and from other countries around the world have impacted on us.

The litigation tornado that's cutting through the economy of the United States of America is having a negative impact on jobs in this state, in this country, and particular in my state.

Health care costs are soaring and making our businesses a lot less competitive than they were before.

Natural gas, we had a hearing last week on natural gas. We're having people move out of this country because of the fact that we've limited the supply of natural gas and exacerbated the demand for it, and it's devastating my state.

And I'd like to say that I think the economy has changed in America today. And I'd love to have that kind of growth, but we're not by ourselves anymore. We're competing now in a global marketplace.

And now the mercury issue, President Clinton and the EPA administrator, and I don't want to get partisan here, but I'd like to get the record clear, did nothing on the mercury issue for eight years. Two days after the Supreme Court ruling on the election, they issued a regulation that said mercury should be regulated and left office.

OK. Eight years, the day after the election said mercury shall be regulated. But if it was such a big problem, why didn't we deal with it two years before, or three years before, or four years before?

And President Bush came into office and he didn't shy away from the issue. He developed the first-ever proposal to reduce mercury emissions since being picked at by a lot of people in this country.

Now, Mr. Administrator, you and I have talked and my concerns about the mercury rule is it could disproportionately affect one region of the country over another and further exacerbate the natural gas crisis by causing us to fuel switch. And that gets into the issue of lignite coal and bituminous and sub-bituminous. And I went through this when I was governor in terms of the acid rain provisions of the Clean Air Act where they set up the rules so that it would advantage one area of the country over another.

And I'd like you to just talk about those mercury rules and what are we doing about this problem?

LEAVITT: It is not our intention nor will we be issuing regulations that will affect the coal distribution or the sale and purchase coal on a regional basis. One of the criteria for me is that we do this in a way that will allow us to protect our economic competitiveness.

Very clearly, I think what that graph shows is that without economic vibrance, environmental progress does not occur. And we have to accelerate the velocity of environmental progress, but it has to be done in a way that protects our economic competitiveness. And the key to that is new technology, collaborative work, focusing on results and the use of markets.

One of the criteria is that we've got to assure that when we move into these in the regulating mercury, that we do it in a way that does not require fuel switching, because ultimately that would not work to our advantage as a country.

VOINOVICH: I'd like to emphasize one other thing. And that is, in your testimony, you talked about tremendous progress is possible because we're putting forward a number of air quality improvements that are about to become effective and will soon be adopted. The proposed Interstate Air Quality Rule that you talked about, which should be even more dramatic, cuts in power plant pollution, you get a lot more with legislation, I think. The NOX SIP Call with states we're implementing to reduce power plant emissions, that's under way right now. Our power plants are dealing with reducing NOX.

Standards for new cars and light duty trucks in the fields that they use, and that's one of the questions that I think that you're going to have to answer is, how effective is emission testing? We have a big debate in our state again. Are we going to continue emissions testing and how good is it?

We have new automobiles out today that they're so much more cleaner than before, so we're interested in that. And if we don't have emissions testing, what other things should we have to do in order to meet the standards?

Standards for heavy duty onroad diesel engines and the fuels they use, that's coming on board right now. And you're also starting this new program in terms of buses, which is another issue, and we really need to move on that -- construction, agricultural, mining, airport and the fuels they use, voluntary diesel retrofit (inaudible) programs, which are thought to reduce emissions from the existing fleet.

So you are moving forward with some pretty significant things. And a lot of these things, in all fairness, started out before you came onboard. But there's some significant stuff going on out there and I just, I think, it's really important that we make it clear. And what we're trying to do is clean up the air, reduce its impact on public health and, at the same time, have an economy that provides jobs for our people so that they can take care of themselves and their families and we have vibrant communities. That's what we're trying to do here.

Senator Carper? Senator Jeffords?

JEFFORDS: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I have two additional questions I would like to ask.

Clear Skies or this proposed Interstate Air Quality Rule won't really start getting serious reductions for a decade or more from now, perhaps 2015 at the best. Most PM 2.5 and most ozone attainment areas will need those emissions reductions to take place by 2010 or sooner to achieve attainment by the deadline.

The Ozone Transport Commission has proposed much lower SOX and NOX caps in earlier deadlines that would help the region to attain on time. If the goal of the administration's proposal is to provide maximum reductions from the most cost-effective sources, that is power plant, to help states in areas reach attainment, then why are the deadlines so late and the reductions so minimal?

I know this isn't a labor shortage issue, because there will be plenty of boilermakers available after 2007 or even earlier, assuming EPA keeps the NOX SIP Call on track.

LEAVITT: Senator, I have very good news for you.

The vast majority, a very high percentage of the benefit of the Interstate Air Quality Rule, happens in the early years. A very high percentage of it coming before 2010 on the ozone and the fine particle rules, very high percentage of our communities will come into complete attainment prior to 2010. So we have front-loaded these. There's serious progress that's going to occur, and it'll happen soon. There will be more pollution taken out of the air faster than any time in our nation's history.

We have a national strategy that increases the velocity of our environmental progress. But it does it in a way that will protect our economic competitiveness. This is a solid national strategy. It's not one that I don't take responsibility or rather when I say, "I don't take responsibility," I don't take credit. This is something we've worked on as a country. The progress that we're continuing over the last 30 years is historic.

There's been a new environmental maturity that's come across this country that we'll now build on because we've picked the low-hanging fruit and it's going to require that we use technology and collaboration, neighborhood strategies, that we focus on results not just processing through these programs, that we're using markets that will incent people to do more. There's a great link between the incentives that are being created by cap and trade system and the development of technology.

I agree with Senator Clinton, this is a huge opportunity for us economically in the world and the best way for us to create incentives is to give people a reward when they achieve a technology that gets results that can be exported to the world. On many of these pollutants, we benefit when others in the world deploy the technology. Mercury is a great example.

We produce a very small percentage of the mercury in the world. We need to be an example and a leader and aggressive in doing it. But if we have technology, if we have ACI technology that's fully implemented, let's get it to the world. It puts Americans to work, it will clean up the air, it'll clean up our waters. Women who buy tuna fish for their children will have the safety of knowing that not only are we doing it in America, but American technology is being exported to other countries where the mass majority of it is produced.

JEFFORDS: I appreciate that enthusiastic answer.

Under the Clear Skies, like cap and trade scenario, EPA predicts that approximately 200 power plants will not have applied advance pollution controls for NOX, SOX, or mercury by the year 2020, largely because of emissions, banking and trading.

Yet MACT requires that each and every unit at every power plant reduce emissions. How could the cap and trade proposal for the mercury possibly be more protective of public health than MACT at every unit?

LEAVITT: This is actually a matter we're taking comment on right now and trying to learn about. The concern you're expressing is whether there's a localized effect on mercury from a power plant, and we want to learn about that. A lot of that concern was expressed in the acid rain debate. It didn't turn out to be the same kind of a problem. But if there are health effects, we need to study them. We need to understand it to learn about this, and that's part of what we're receiving comment on right now from tens of thousands of Americans at public hearings across the country because we want to be responsive to that.

JEFFORDS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

VOINOVICH: Senator Carper.

CARPER: Thanks. A month or two ago, I mentioned to you in a conversation we had that near the end of the Clinton Administration, an energy efficiency standard was adopted for air conditioners called SEER 13, and I think it was adopted in the year 2000. It called for air conditioners to become 30 percent more efficient in their use of energy by the year 2006.

During I want to say maybe the second year of the Bush Administration, maybe it was 2002, a less rigorous standard was adopted called SEER 12 -- the Clinton administration's was SEER 13. The SEER 12 standard calls for more energy efficient air conditioners, 20 percent more efficient by 2006. It ended up, as I think I've mentioned to you, a court battle. It ended up in the 2nd District Court, federal court. And the court ruled a month or two ago that the more rigorous standard, the SEER 13 standard, should stand.

A number of us here in the Senate had signed a letter to the president last month urging the administration not to appeal the 2nd District Court decision. We have consulted with some of the air conditioning manufacturers in this country. And late last month, their trade association went on record as saying that they felt they could live with a more rigorous SEER 13 standard by 2006.

A majority of us have called on the administration, Democrats and Republicans in the Senate, to simply say, we're not going to appeal the 2nd District Court decision. Let's get on with adhering to a more rigorous efficiency standard.

I'm told if a more rigorous standard stands, that come 2020, we will have to build 48 fewer new electric power plants. Most are going to be built with natural gas. But by having a more rigorous conservation standard in place, we'll reduce by as many as 48 fewer power plants our need.

In addition, I'm told by 2020 that CO2 emissions will be reduced bi-annually by 2020, 2.5 million tons simply by putting in place this more rigorous standard. In our conversation earlier, I've urged to you in your position to work within the administration to try to convince your colleagues and the president not to appeal the decision.

I have no idea if you can give us an update today on where the administration is taking it, but if you could, I'd welcome it.

LEAVITT: As I think you're probably aware, this is a rule-making that's being conducted at the Department of Energy. And therefore, it's one of the few controversies the Environmental Protection Agency doesn't seem to be in the middle of right now.

May I just add that during the time I was governor, we lived through a couple of western energy crisis where the primary focus of our attention became energy conservation. We began to run campaigns probably asking people not just to use more energy efficient devices, but to reduce their energy. And we accomplished it in one particular summer by as much as 20 percent; huge impact economically, a huge impact in terms of environmentally.

I'm not able to comment on the specific standard. I don't have information, but may I just say that in terms of national strategy, that learning to conserve energy is a very powerful tool in being able to meet our national, economic and cultural goals.

CARPER: I've asked you privately, I ask you publicly to use your influence within the administration and had a similar conversation with our Secretary of Energy. I'd ask you to use your very considerable influence within the administration to convince our president to simply say, the decision's been made, the courts have ruled, and we're going to live with that.

To go back, if I could, with to something raised by Senator Clinton. I've heard rumblings as well that our government, our federal government, presumably EPA, may not be interested in moving the utility industry toward greater utilization of clean coal technology, fluidized beds, coal gasification efforts.

The technology has been around for a long time. My understanding is its been implemented in a rather limited way. I think there may be one or two operating coal gasification plants. I'm told there were a couple of others that were actually formally proposed or are really actively being planned.

We exist as the Saudi Arabia of coal, as you know. We've got more coal than probably the rest of any other country in the world. We have the technology that allows us to use it in ways that are environmentally friendly. But yet, I don't sense a sense of urgency or priority from the administration or really from the Congress, that by golly, why don't rather than just continue new natural gas plants and jacking up the price of natural gas, why don't we find ways to implement the technology -- commercialize it?

I think and you said in response to Senator Clinton's question that there's no decision made. I think one of your colleagues handed you note. And now he's handing you another note.

(LAUGHTER)

But I'll tell you, it would be very encouraging to hear you say -- that makes a lot of sense, it certainly passes the common sense test for me -- to hear what you plan to do to move us down that road.

LEAVITT: I'll read you the note and then comment.

(LAUGHTER)

This is the guidance on the News Source Review for new plants, and we require them to consider new technologies, I have not received recommendation yet, but let me comment philosophically.

I can (ph) break into song over this matter. I don't think we would find any disagreement at either of our tables today about the fact that if we can produce zero emission coal in this country in a generation of electricity, it is a powerful driver of our economy. And it ought to be and it is a priority. The administration is committed to a billion dollars for a project called Future Gen. It's a collaboration between the industry and the Department of Energy. EPA is involved in it, our labs are involved in it, another reason I'm anxious to have you at our labs in North Carolina.

CARPER: Maybe Senator Voinovich will come with us.

LEAVITT: This would be a powerful driver...

VOINOVICH: I'll do it.

CARPER: Call the travel agent.

LEAVITT: This would be a powerful driver of the American economy. We have rich resources of fuel of coal. Without using them, we put upward pressure on natural gas, which is having a substantial impact on larger areas of our economy and keeping us competitive.

It is a priority. It needs to be a priority. We can, in fact, I believe, in the course of the early part of this century, produce the capacity to generate electricity with zero emissions from coal. And if we do it, it'll be a driver not just in our country but in the world economy, and we'll be the leader.

VOINOVICH: Thank you. I'd just like to say that Ohio University, my alma mater, is the leader in the country in Clean Coal Technology. And they are so excited, and so is the Ohio Air Quality Authority on Future Gen, with its potential. Thank you for the initiative.

I would like to just editorialize and say it will also help if we could get an energy bill passed because there's lots of stuff in the energy bill that deals with clean coal technology and moving us in that direction.

We're going to have a cloture vote at 11:30. Senator Clinton, you still have some questions that I'm sure you would like to ask. And we will try to wrap it up after Senator Clinton so we could get the other witnesses on before we have to go down and vote on the cloture and then come back and ask questions to the next panel of witnesses.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit for the record a letter that is going out today to Administrator Leavitt from 45 senators, including three Republicans, asking that EPA, with respect with the mercury rule, withdraw the entire proposed rule package, and re-propose a rule for adequate public comment that meets the terms of the 1998 settlement agreement.

I agree with the chairman that this has been going on a long time, but the sequence of events are such that the 1990 Clean Air Act legislation mandated the study. It took longer to do than it was anticipated. Originally it was thought to be a three-year study. It turned into a five-year study. Shortly after the study was completed, the NRDC sued the EPA to force action and then proceeded to have a long drawn-out negotiation.

There was a settlement reached in 1998. And under the terms of the settlement, the final rule was, not the final rule, but the rule were to be promulgated by December 2000. And of course, that was shortly before the end of the Clinton Administration and it's to the Bush Administration's credit, although it is under a court order, to proceed with mercury rule-making, and that is what we all want. We want good mercury rule making that makes a difference in the atmosphere. And I think however we got here, whatever the sequence happened to be, we need to proceed as expeditiously as possible. And there is considerable concern, on the part of 45 of us, about the proposed rule.

In addition, I know that there was a recent white paper issued by the EPA's Office of Research and Development on mercury control technologies last week. And the paper cast doubt on most of the agency's arguments regarding the availability of technology for mercury control and potential emission reductions.

I would also, Mr. Chairman, like to submit "The Control of Mercury Emissions from Coal Fire to Electric Utility Boilers," a report done by the Office of Research and development from the EPA -- from the Research Triangle Park, North Carolina, for the record. Because this...

VOINOVICH: No objection.

CLINTON: Thank you.

This report says that existing widely use technology, such as fabric filters, could achieve a 90 percent reduction of mercury at bituminous coal plants and 72 percent removal at sub-bituminous. And if you added a wet scrubber, the reduction is 98 percent.

It further says that activated carbon injection technology, which can be added in one year's time, can achieve 70 percent reduction in mercury from all coal types by 2010; adding a fabric filter to that, which can be done in two years, achieves a 90 percent reduction.

This is without new technology. This is, you know, not even going as far as Senator Carper and I would like to see, but using existing technology.

And I hope, Administrator Leavitt, as you do study this important rule, you'll take a look at this report. I don't understand a lot of it, it's very technical, but I know you have lots of people around you who do, and really calculate the cost of this.

Now I'm one of those who have long advocated, you know, doing whatever we could to incentivize the utility industry to take these actions. This is a public health issue. This effects all of us. The numbers of people who are going to be impacted by the continuing level of emissions is such that we're paying on one hand for health care costs when we could be trying to find a way of acting much more efficaciously and cost effectively to deal with this problem at the source.

CLINTON: So again, this letter from 45 senators, including three Republicans, will be on the way to you. But the bottom line is, we just all need to work together to get this under way.

And I think that there is a perception that you are very thoughtfully trying to go through all of this. And I don't in any way doubt that, because I trust you to really take a hard look at all of this. But there are other factors at work. There are other concerns and special interests at work.

And it's just so important that we go as far as we possibly can technologically. If there are costs associated with it, let's honestly look at those costs. Let's not end the rule-making at a point less than where we should just because there are costs attached to it. Let's figure out whether there's a way we can, you know, help to defray them or deal with them.

But it's so critically important, so I thank you for your consideration.

LEAVITT: Senator, quick responses on both of those.

As you indicated, I am under a consent decree to act by December 15, 2004. Given the nature and complexity of this, we're moving forward with all rigor to assure that we get there, and it's my intention to do it in a way that will serve the best interest of the American people and those who have, as we all have, concern.

This turns in large measure around the technology.

That paper you have, I've read. And I have been doing all I can to understand it, and I've had a chance to spend enough time crawling around the blueprints of power plants to begin to know more about than I expected I would.

But I would just make this conclusion. There are places and ways that you can use other technologies to get high percentages, but they're unique. In the Northeast, for example, New England, there are a couple of power plants that achieved high level. And they do it by bringing in coal from the Philippines and they've been able to use particular combinations of circumstances that allow them uniquely to do it. But you can't deploy that over 1,200 power plants.

ACI technology is what we have every reason to be optimistic about. And so far, we have used ACI technology on medical waste incinerators. And we've used them very effectively, and we've been able to achieve almost 90 percent on medical, or rather on municipal waste incinerators.

We haven't had that experience yet on coal-fired power plants. In fact, we've never put ACI technology on a coal-powered power plant and had used over a period of time sufficient to know that it'll work with all kinds of coal with all kinds of circumstances.

And if we're going to be asking the American people to invest billions into this technology, and we are, we ought to make certain that it works.

And so the reason that we're at the 2010 conclusion isn't because it doesn't exist. It's because we have to have it adequately tested and widely deployable. And there's lots of, as you said, lots of considerations.

My purpose is to do this by the time the court has ordered me to do it, and to do it in a way that will clearly make the biggest gains we can, but do it in a way that it'll also keep the economy -- protect our competitiveness. And I believe we can do that.

And as you've suggested, technology's the key, but we ought not to move until we have the technology. Because once we do, it'll take care of the problem.

VOINOVICH: Thank you, Administrator.

I'm delighted to know that you're getting into the issue of mercury, because there is a big debate out there about where the technology is, and there are some that argue that co-benefits from NOX reduction of emissions would do a great deal to reduce mercury. But then how do you go to the next step?

And with a letter coming from many of my colleagues, you're going to be in the eye of the storm on this one. And again, it's good science that will make that will make the difference here.

Thank you very much for being here. We appreciate the new leadership that you're bringing to the environmental protection agency. Thank you for your conscientiousness and your commitment to making our air cleaner and minimizing the impact on public health, and also understanding that we've got to do that within the framework of the economy of this country. And right now, jobs, jobs, jobs. Thank you.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, if I could correct the record, it's seven Republicans, not three.

(LAUGHTER)

VOINOVICH: I'll bet they're from the northeast.

CLINTON: That's right, not all of them, though. John McCain is on there.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: I'd like that to continue. Maybe we can reach a deal here, because clearly, as is evident, there are strongly held opinions on all sides of this. And the bottom line for me as I keep saying over and over again, is that I think we are spending money in other areas that we don't need to spend because we have not figured out how to incentivize those who are responsible for the emissions, to move more rapidly to clean them up.

I mean, I just don't understand why this is so complicated. I just believe that there are solutions out there that for whatever reason we seem to be dug in on different points of view.

My bottom line, too, is that I'm deeply concerned about the health effects. And the more studies that are done, the more we know how much we are paying in health care costs because of the effects of particulate matter and ozone -- one of the other studies that has been done, also published in the Journal of the American Medical Association last October, looked at 271 children under the age of 12 with active asthma in Connecticut and Massachusetts and measured their response of two air pollutants, ozone and very small particulate matter.

And what they found, the key finding is that a one-hour exposure to air containing 50 parts per billion of ozone caused a significant increase in wheezing and chest tightness in those children and increased their use of symptom-relieving drugs.

So, in other words, ozone exacerbates asthma in children at concentrations below the current one-hour level of 120 parts per billion, and even the new eight-hour exposure standard of 80 parts per billion.

Now, it's absolutely true that New York City metropolitan area is a non-attainment area under the one-hour ozone standard. It will be a non-attainment area under the eight-hour standard, and we have an epidemic of asthma. The highest concentration of asthmatic children in our country are in Harlem and parts of the Bronx.

And as Dr. Thurston said, if we could eliminate every source of pollution that we had any control over, if we were the given tools to do that right now, if we could wave a magic wand in every taxi cab and truck, and move to clean fuel or clean diesel, whatever it might be, if we could control every emission that we had within the boundaries of New York City and New York state, we would still not meet the attainment standards.

So this is a national problem, and Dr. Thurston, the one chart you showed about ozone air quality, I think that's a chart that shows ambient concentration.

THURSTON: That's correct.

CLINTON: That's right. And so yes we can see national standards of decreasing NOX and SOX, but if you look at the map of the country, if you take those national standards, yes, we are doing a good job in seeing it fall in many parts of the west because they don't have the wind currents, they don't have the industrial sources.

But if you look at southern California and you look at east of the Mississippi and you go to places like Cincinnati or New York City, you see concentrations of particulate matter and ozone -- and here, the ozone air quality is what this chart is - and that the concentration has not decreased.

In fact, from '83 through '92, it decreased 18 percent. But from '93 to '02, it increased four percent.

So I think that we have a problem in the eastern part of the United States, and we're not acting in an expeditious manner to deal with that. And I respect totally the chairman's commitment to jobs, and he knows a lot about this. He was a very successful mayor and governor, and the state he represents is one of the, you know, economic engines of our country.

I just honestly believe that it is not an either/or issue, that we can do both. And I understand Mr. Fisher's point about, you know, places that you're trying to recruit jobs that are from other parts of the country saying well, you know, maybe instead of going to Cincinnati because you're a non-attainment area, we'll go to Austin, Texas, or we'll go to Las Vegas, Nevada, because if you look at the figures, they're doing better.

Well, they're not doing better because of solely actions they've taken on themselves. They're doing better because of national conditions that you have very little control over in Cincinnati or that we have little control over in New York.

So I know that this remains a point of contention and disagreement about the best way to proceed. I think everybody shares the same goal, but we are gridlocked. And it's unfortunate because, you know, we are seeing increases in concentrations of ozone and we're seeing impacts on health that are costing us money.

And I would like to, if I could, ask the panelists perhaps to, you know, clarify in writing, because we've got to go vote, any other suggestions you have.

I've read your testimony, but it's quite a general testimony. And that's the way it is, you know, I understand. But perhaps on behalf of not just yourself, Judge Eckels, but, you know, the National Association of Counties; and perhaps, Mr. Fisher, on behalf of, you know, the chamber and others; and certainly, Dr. Thurston, because, you know, we are too smart a country not to figure this out.

And, you know, with respect to some of our competitors like China and India, we have no leverage over them, and I think we've got to develop some other means of trying to...

THURSTON: Couldn't we get U.S. companies that are building plants abroad to behave responsibly and build plants that meet the standards that we meet here?

CLINTON: Well, I think that's...

THURSTON: Is there any way to do that?

CLINTON: No. But, I think there are ways through trade agreements and through perhaps invigorating some kind of international effort. We've obviously put Kyoto aside, and there were good reasons in many minds to do that because there was no real standard imposed upon the developing countries. But now I understand China has moved to impose some standards of its own with respect to emissions.

So we should encourage that. We should provide incentives and assistance for that.

THURSTON: Or we should provide the technology that they can use and that's where we can get jobs out of the environment, that we can gain jobs by being first with the technology that others will use.

CLINTON: Well, I agree with that, and I'm very fortunate to represent some companies in New York that have a lot of this technology are hoping to have a national market some day, and are looking for an international market. But right now, there's not very many incentives to really do that.

But Mr. Chairman, we'll keep working on this and we'll hopefully come up with, you know, some consensus at some point, I hope in our lifetime.

Thank you.

VOINOVICH: Thank you.

I'd just like to say, Mr. Thurston, in terms of the Future Gen Project, I think you heard mentioned earlier, that that is, I think, a very good initiative. My feeling is that we should develop our clean coal technology, we should use it, we should take advantage of it, we should sell it or give it away to other nations so that we help reduce their emissions and deal with the problem of global warming.

THURSTON: I agree with you on that.

VOINOVICH: OK, good.

I just want to thank you all for coming. I'd like to mention that the National Association of Manufacturers wanted to be here to testify and weren't able to. And I'm going to insert this in the record without objection.

I would hope that the three of you, if you get other questions from the panel, would be willing to answer those questions in writing and get back to us.

And last but not least, Judge Eckels, really, as former chairman of the National Governors Association, president of National League of Cities, as you know, there are a lot of good things that we did together as a team. We were able to get the TANIF of legislation passed, the unfunded mandates and a lot of other things.

And I think it's really incumbent on the national organizations for you to get together and come back here with your thoughts on where we're going and how we ought to get there.

ECKELS: We will have that for you, sir. Thank you.

VOINOVICH: Thanks very much.

END

U.S. SENATOR MICHAEL D. CRAPO (R-ID) HOLDS HEARING ON D.C. DRINKING WATER, 4/7/2004

CLINTON: Thank you very much, and I want to thank you and Chairman Inhofe for this hearing. And I particularly want to thank Senator Jeffords for his strong interest and leadership on this issue.

I'll submit, with your consent, the entire statement for the record, but I want to make a few additional points.

There is no safe level of lead. And recent studies, one concluded last April, published in the New England Journal of Medicine followed 172 children in Rochester, New York, and measured blood-lead levels at six, 12, 18, 24, 36, 48 and 60 months and tested their I.Q.s at 36 and 60 months.

The study found that most of the reduction in I.Q. attributable to lead occurred at blood levels below 10 micrograms per deciliter, which is the level that the Centers for Disease Control considers to be the threshold level for health effects. Researchers found that I.Q. scores of children who had blood-lead levels of 10 micrograms per deciliter were about seven points lower than for children with levels of one microgram per deciliter.

An increase in blood-lead levels from 10 to 30 micrograms per deciliter was associated with a small additional decline in I.Q.

While this is only one study, there are a number of other research findings that suggest what we currently consider to be a safe level for lead is, in fact, too high. And that underscores the seriousness of the issue we're here to talk about today.

Lead exposure comes from a variety of sources, and lead in drinking water accounts for only about 20 percent of lead exposures. But if no level of lead is safe, then any source of lead needs to be taken very seriously.

And to the D.C. residents who are here, that includes many of us who serve in this body who live part time, at least, inside the District boundaries, I think you have a right to be disturbed and have an absolute right to have your questions answered.

I don't think it's productive in this hearing to try to assess blame, but at some point, we need to get specific questions answered.

Why did WASA not notify residents about elevated lead levels as soon as it had the test results? Why did the D.C. Health Department not engage in this issue when notified of the problem? Why did EPA take so long to get involved?

How is it possible that WASA, or no agency, has accurate records about who has lead service lines? And in the absence of such records, why is WASA refusing to provide water filters to homes for which it does not have information one way or the other?

These are just some of the questions that I have. I look forward to this hearing.

But I just have to conclude by saying that one of the great benefits of living in our country over many, many decades has been we could count on the water we drank and the food we ate to be safe, much more so than in other countries in the world. And for the capital of our nation to have this problem is deeply concerning.

And I'm grateful we're having this hearing. And I also look forward to working with Senator Jeffords on his legislation.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'd like to ask each one of you to answer two questions briefly for me.

Number one, looking backward, what mistake did you or your agency make in handling this matter? Looking forward, what is the one thing that you believe should be done in order to remedy the situation we find ourselves in?

Why don't we start with Mr. Jacobus?

JACOBUS: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

We have a wholesale retail relationship with our customers. Every day we have great visibility over the bacteriological content of the water throughout all three distribution systems: Arlington, Falls Church service area and the District of Columbia.

We test the water in our laboratory from samples at the plant, samples from the distribution system, either that we take ourselves or are brought to us for 35,000 or 40,000 tests a year. We have great visibility on the bacteriological and the chemical contaminants in the water leaving the treatment plants, disinfection, byproduct, rule compliance, all of that.

The mistake, to answer your question, is that we did not have the same visibility for the lead and copper samples. The samples are taken at a different way. They're taken throughout a period of the year; it's not a go, no-go on each individual sample.

And so, we did not have all of the samples collected at our organization. They were at the different locations in two different jurisdictions under the state of Virginia's Health Department and EPA's regulatory responsibilities for the District of Columbia Water and Sewer Authority.

So we had the ability, and we will take the initiative to bring that data together so that we can help all of our customers and give them the benefit of our system-wide look.

So, even though every day we paid attention to the optimal corrosion control treatment, and that the water leaving the plant was at the specification for what we had agreed in our scientific-based study with EPA of how to treat the water and we were getting anecdotal evidence occasionally of a high reading, it wasn't until really in the spring of 2003 when EPA, reacting to WASA's results in 2001, 2002, said, "Look, we need to open this and start looking," so we started down that road.

So we did not have perfect knowledge of the big picture. We can get that knowledge even though it's regulatorily not required because we think it's a responsible thing to do.

So I hope that answers your question.

CLINTON: It certainly does. And I appreciate that. And perhaps it would help if it were regulatorily required, so that at least all the players, all the stakeholders are at the table.

But I appreciate that very much.

Dr. Lucey?

LUCEY: Yes, Senator Clinton.

Your two questions, first looking back. Again, I've been here since February 10th, but nevertheless I think that, looking back, what we might have done differently was to have the type of face-to-face and verbal and phone interactions within the Department of Health and with EPA and with WASA and with Washington Aqueduct to discuss the issue about the action level has been exceeded.

LUCEY: What does that mean? Is that a health-based risk or is it not? OK, it's not, but could there be health implications? Yes, there could be. How are we going to answer that question? For me, it's a clinical or medical approach, and I think that the folks that initially heard about the elevated water (inaudible) concentrations within the Department of Health were not the clinical or medical folks.

As you know, there's new leadership now in the D.C. Department of Health, the top two people are no longer in the Department of Health, as of two Fridays ago. And I think that the new interim leadership is very, very strong.

And so that's one recommendation that I've made to the new leadership, to have more involvement within the Department of Health of the clinical and the non-clinical individuals.

As far as looking forward, I think that there are many things that could be done to try to remedy this situation and any others that are similarly developed in the future. I think again, a major one is to have the types of interactions that we have been having for the past couple months within the Department of Health, but outside the Department of Health, with EPA, with WASA, with Washington Aqueduct, in terms of discussion of, what is the best advice that we can do and how can we best communicate that to the public.

For example, just very briefly, how to prioritize lead service line replacements, if in fact that's what's going to happen, as we've heard that it is, on an accelerated basis.

In my opinion, it's very important not only for the Department of Health to be involved in that decision making, but to work with the new clinical team that's coming onboard with WASA from George Washington University, to work directly with the EPA in the formulation of these prioritization of lead service line replacements, as well as with the Department of Transportation, and everyone else who needs to be involved, do that right now from the beginning. And we are doing that.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Mr. Johnson?

JOHNSON: Thank you, Senator Clinton.

I think that obviously hindsight is 20/20, and as I look back over this issue and consider mistakes that were made, I think that probably the one that's shown up as most resounding was our focus on trying to comply with federal regulations, as opposed to looking at a broader picture, in terms of where our customers were, where they were thinking, and the need to get information to them, perhaps sooner.

Early on in this process, we were only working with a small sample base of 50 homes in the District and did not have a clear fix on what that meant for the broader District. And I felt, and it was my decision, I assume full responsibility for it, that at that point it was not appropriate to raise a flag and begin to alarm people in the District about a problem that we were having.

As you know, we went forward and did sampling, broader base of sampling than has ever been done in the United States of America for sampling. And that showed us some results that was concerning to us.

But we didn't know what that result meant, we're not the medical experts, we're not the regulatory experts. We think that we got that information to them in a timely fashion. And we believe, with all sincerity, that we did make all of the efforts that were required -- and I won't go through this list of things that I have in front of me -- to comply with federal regulations.

An audit subsequently conducted by EPA suggests that there was some technical issues that we may not have met the requirements on, and we'll certainly go back and respond to those over the next 21 days.

But I think that that would be the mistake, I think. We should have been focused more on this community in the District of Columbia than we were on the regulators. But obviously, if you're regulated, you have to meet certain other requirements.

As we go forward, I think that the two points made by both Dr. Lucey and Mr. Jacobus are very valid. I think that there needs to be probably a more formalized, if you would, relationship established between the District of Columbia Water and Sewer Authority, the District's Health Department in order for us to grab these issues early on in the process and be able to have a stronger collaborative relationship.

We had focused on the relationship between the aqueduct and their customers in Virginia, who are also partners of ours in that business relationship. We began when this issue first came up to start looking at the water. I think we probably could have pursued -- as another mistake -- we probably could have pursued that more aggressively when that first 50 samples came back, to take a look at the production side of it and the chemistry of the water.

But as we go forward, I think that that kind of collaborative relationship is very important, and I really think that the District ought to look at the possibility of having primacy in this area. The U.S. EPA has primacy in two jurisdictions for water distribution system: in the District of Columbia and I believe, in Wyoming, if I'm not mistaken.

And so there are different relationships that get established with the regulatory bodies when you're working with a local entity that has a better sense of what's happening in that community and how that community needs to respond.

And I'm sorry for being so long-winded. That's a very important question, however.

WELSH: I believe that when there's an exceedance of the action level, the spirit of the Lead and Copper Rule is to make sure that any of the citizens who might be exposed to a higher level of lead understand that fully, know that they might be exposed, and have good information in their hands about how to reduce their exposure to lead.

That goal is clearly what was not met in this instance. As Jerry mentioned, WASA took actions to get information into people's hands. And in our review, we've determined that some of the specific requirements weren't met fully.

But the larger issue is that the information that was put out wasn't really getting home to the folks who needed to have that information so that they fully understood that it was important to them; they should pay attention to it; and they should follow the directions that were put in there so that they would know what they were exposed to and understand how to limit their exposure.

Looking backwards, what we didn't do effectively is we weren't aggressive enough, we weren't thorough enough and we didn't find those deficiencies soon enough, both in the letter of what was required under the rule, but also in that larger question of, even if the language is put out there and made available in documents, is it a message that's getting home to folks and are they really understanding it.

What we want to do going forward is change our review procedures in the region so that we do, not only a thorough job of checking the letter of compliance with the Lead and Copper Rule, but that we also take the time to make the judgment about whether that message is being received, much in the way marketing folks do when their commercials and advertisements go out, they can measure in the public whether that message is being received.

So we have changed our operating procedure so that it's not just the technical person in the drinking water branch who reviews the reports or whether they've complied with the rule, but that we also call in the communications expertise that we have available in the region, as well as if necessary, to do contracts for folks on the outside who are experts in the area of communications to make sure not only in the future that the rule is fulfilled but also the message is being effective and that we measure out in the public, "Do you folks who need to know this, know?"

That's what we'd like to do going forward.

GRUMBLES: I couldn't have said it better. From a national perspective, the EPA does want to also acknowledge it's not just following the letter of the rule, it's the spirit of the rule. And that's partly our responsibility, too, to be proactive and to help oversee that not just the letter, but the spirit of the public education and the other aspects of the Lead and Copper Rule are followed. And that's certainly one of our objectives acting prospectively, proactively.

The other one is this whole issue of simultaneous compliance. Providing drinking water to the public can be a tricky balancing act, given various regulations and requirements. And we plan to have a workshop in May with national experts -- you've got the Disinfection Byproduct Rule, the Lead and Copper Rule. How do you ensure that it is all working together and there are not unintended consequences?

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

CRAPO: Thank you.

Let me proceed a little further. As many of you probably know, yesterday Senator Jeffords and I and Mayor Williams and several others joined some of the constituents here in Washington D.C. and discussed with them their concerns.

And one of the concerns that they raised was that under the testing procedures that went forward, it was very difficult for them as individuals in individual homes to find out the results of the tests on their own homes, and that until certain statistical levels had been reached, individual findings for individual homes did not trigger a response.

First of all, is that true? Is that the way that the system works that an individual or a family can have a test on their home and then not be able to find out the results of those tests, or not be able to get effective action on the basis of one home getting a negative, or a test that exceeds the limits?

JOHNSON: I assume that that question is for me, Senator. And I would respond in this manner.

When we started doing the testing we had what we thought was an effective approach for getting test kits out to people, getting them back. And it was sort of a Cadillac service where we delivered them by FedEx, we went by and picked them up physically and took them to the lab and had them sampled.

When we started into tens of thousands of tests, as opposed to a couple hundred, we simply did not change the system rapidly enough and there were some delays in getting tests back to people. I would concede that. I think that we have a very effective approach for doing that now and we've corrected that.

But as this problem has evolved, because there is no road map, there is no blueprint, we've had to change things and learn as we've gone along. I think that there are very effective measures for getting those test results back. And we generally guarantee them within in about 30 days. Usually it's about a three week, three and a half week turnaround time on them in reality.

With respect to explaining what they meant, we at the Water and Sewer Authority simply did not have the capacity to explain what they meant. I was around when the Lead and Copper Rule was done and working in water utility back in the late '80s and early '90s when that rule was put in place.

And I knew that there was not a health-based standard for that, and so we were not capable of explaining what the health impacts are, what this elevated level meant. All we could do was get something back to the person and explain to them that you are over the action level, which is in the 90th percentile of that 15 parts per billion.

And we would rely on health experts to provide that kind of follow-up and information to the customer.

CRAPO: So if I understand you correctly, you'd have a system in place where within 30 days an individual who has their home tested can get the results back for that home. Is that true about not only the response testing, but also the standard routine samples of 50 homes that are done on an ongoing basis?

JOHNSON: Because we have exceeded the trigger level, we have one group of homes that are regulatory samples. And we treat those separately from the ones that we're doing upon demand and request. The regulatory sample set is 100 in the spring and a 100 in the fall and they're being managed in a totally different process than the ones that we're doing as random tests, or tests upon demand.

CRAPO: Are the people in the regulatory sample notified about how their homes qualify?

JOHNSON: Yes, sir, they are.

CRAPO: So everybody, whether they're in the demand test or the regulatory test, is getting the notice as to what the results are for their home within the 30 days?

JOHNSON: Yes, sir, that's correct.

CRAPO: All right. Thank you.

Another issue that came up yesterday, Mr. Johnson, you indicated that you've already distributed about 27,000 filters. Those filters, if I understand it, are distributed on the basis of those who are identified as having a lead pipe delivery system to their home.

Is that correct?

JOHNSON: That's correct, sir.

CRAPO: One concern that was raised yesterday is that there are something like -- and I think you mentioned this as well -- something like 37,000 homes for which there are no records as to what the delivery pipes consist of, and that people in that category are not able to get a filter.

They don't know whether they have a lead pipe distribution system and they're not able to get a filter or a support from WASA, in terms of dealing with what they perceive to be a lead problem. What is in place to help those who fall in that category of the 37,000 homes for which we don't have information?

JOHNSON: Yes, sir. We have been working for a couple of months in an effort to try to clean up some historical records, where information has just never been compiled before in the District of Columbia, with respect to service pipes.

We have a period of time where everything was recorded. We know that the plumber paid a dollar to make the tap connection and what the material was and who the plumber was. We have some records that only show a date that it was done. And we had to go through what existed manually. And after going through those, we found about 21,000, as opposed to the 37,000. I really would like to correct that number.

CRAPO: OK.

JOHNSON: I'm not sure how 37,000 ever got created some time ago; it's bout 21,000. And we are notifying those people by a letter that's already been translated into the standard six languages I believe, Dr. Lucey. And those letters will be going out to those residents either late this week or early next week, along with a postage paid return card asking them to send that into us. And then we'll get a water test kit out to them on a priority basis so that they can test the water and determine if they have had high lead levels.

There are a number of those addresses that have been compiled in those historical records and some of them don't exist anymore. If you've been living in Washington for a while, you know there's been a great deal of redevelopment.

JOHNSON: These records go back a good ways in time. Some of them have changed their use. There are a number of different circumstances. And we're unable to go out on the street and identify, so we think that this is the most efficient way. And anybody that comes back with a test that shows an elevated level in the second draw of that test will automatically be mailed a filter with all of the instructions and those things.

But we think that having a two-part process is the most efficient and effective way of pursuing that.

CRAPO: OK. Just one last quick follow-up before we move on.

And that is, is it possible under the system that you now have in place for any resident of the District who may feel perhaps your records aren't accurate, or they fall in the category of the homes where there is no information or they just are really concerned about this issue, for them to request a test kit, have the test conducted and then if the test shows that their specific home has high levels, get a filter?

JOHNSON: Yes, sir.

CRAPO: So any resident of the District has that right?

JOHNSON: Yes, sir. We've set aside resources to do a number of tests, something in excess of a couple million dollars, and are prepared to handle it. Obviously, if we get an onslaught and a heavy volume, we can't do it, but we would urge those persons with lead service lines to be the first priority.

We do know that many of our records are very, very accurate. Anything that was built after 1950 is not likely to have a lead service line because those lead service lines were outlawed after that time. So we feel very comfortable with anything that came during that period.

There's also, if there is something other than a two-inch line going into a house, we're 99 percent certain that that would not be a lead service line because they just didn't make them much larger than two-inch. We're not aware that they made service lines larger than two inches, so we think that it is a single family residential phenomena that we're working with.

In the cases of apartment buildings, anything that's a fourplex or better is going to have something larger than a two-inch line. So, there are a number of things that we can do to eliminate certain numbers.

If you notice, we have 130,000 customers in the District. And the numbers that we've been talking about, in terms of lead, are somewhere around 23,000 that we feel fairly comfortable with and then we have this other group. The others we're fairly certain are not lead service lines.

CRAPO: Thank you.

Senator Jeffords?

JEFFORDS: Mr. Grumbles, your answer to Senator Crapo's question about the 15 parts-per-billion standard you described the evolution of that standard. Can you describe any reasons why the EPA set the maximum contaminant level goal, which is a health-based standard at zero?

GRUMBLES: Senator, I can.

When we regulate contaminants, such as lead, under the Safe Drinking Water Act, we start with a process of a maximum contaminant level goal. And for lead, there is no safe level, certainly no safe level we can point to to say with a margin of safety that there would not be some adverse health effect.

And so we did establish zero as the NLCG for lead.

JEFFORDS: As I mentioned in my opening statement, I've asked the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, on which you serve, which I formerly chaired, to hold a hearing on childhood lead poisoning. I know we are not spending an extended time today discussing children's blood-lead levels, but I have one question for you on this.

The Centers for Disease Control Advisory Committee on Childhood Lead Poisoning Prevention is currently undertaking a review of its blood-lead level standard to 10 micrograms per deciliter.

Recent findings published in the April 17th, 2003, edition of the New England Journal of Medicine show that blood-lead levels below the standard of 10 are linked with declines in I.Q. The study also shows that relative reduction of I.Q. is greater at lower concentrations of lead than at higher concentrations.

These findings suggest that even low levels of lead can have a devastating effect on children. I ask this edition to be included in the record, if I may.

CRAPO: Without objection.

JEFFORDS: New research also shows that there may be an identifiable link between childhood lead exposure and educational achievement and social behavior. I ask unanimous consent to include several articles on this subject by Dr. Herbert Needleman.

OK?

CRAPO: All right.

JEFFORDS: I ask unanimous consent that a report on CDC Advisory Committee itself to be included in the record.

CRAPO: Without objection.

JEFFORDS: The Healthy People 2010 Initiative of CDC calls for the elimination of childhood lead poisoning for 2010, yet the CDC Web site provides three reasons why blood level should not be reduced. It states that it is difficult to measure blood-lead level concentration below 10.

And I ask unanimous consent to include the record, a paper by Herbert Needleman, which refutes this claim; describes the technology advances that have lowered the least observable effect level unit it approaches zero.

CRAPO: Without objection.

JEFFORDS: The CDC Web site also states that no clinical inventions can reduce blood-lead levels below 10 and that there is no evidence of a threshold below which adverse health effects are not experienced. Then the CDC draws a conclusion that any effort to reduce the standard would provide uncertain benefits, even though there appears to be ample evidence that no levels of lead in the blood is safe.

This Web site appears to completely ignore the fact that blood-lead poisoning is preventable, and that in places like Washington D.C. the standard is used as determining factor for which families receive assistance for the D.C. Department of Health.

The CDC identifies two focus areas to combat lead poisoning: lead paint and lead end products. There is no mention of drinking water. Given the apparent consensus that there is no level of lead exposure that is safe, this situation is quite understandable. I can't understand it.

The EPA's own Web site indicates that the agency estimates at 20 percent of childhood lead poisoning is due to exposure through drinking water. The agency sets a maximum containment level goal for lead in drinking water at zero, because that was the only level where no adverse effects will be experienced.

I ask unanimous consent that the relevant CDC and EPA Web sites be included in the record also.

CRAPO: Without objection.

JEFFORDS: Finally, what has EPA done to coordinate with CDC on its elevation of the blood-lead levels standard to ensure that it is reflective of the science consensus on this issue? On the CDC's plan to combat lead poisoning and on the Healthy Peoples 2010 goal of eliminating lead poisoning by 2010? Do you believe that the lead exposure in children can be eliminated in this country without addressing lead in the drinking water problem and the plumbing factors?

GRUMBLES: Senator, I appreciate your interest and your leadership on this issue, in terms of reducing exposure to lead in the drinking water, particularly to children. I would say on the first question, the first part of it, the relationship with CDC: We have been working with CDC. We certainly have established very close working relationships with them in the context of responding to this situation here in the District.

With respect to the overall question of the number 10 as measuring blood-lead levels and the safety of that, that is certainly one of the items that we intend to discuss and explore and review the scientific literature you have as we go about looking at what is the existing guidance and what is the existing regulation, because we do share your interest in the most important bottom line, and that is, what is the impact on human health. How much lead in the drinking water is too much?

So, we welcome that and look forward to working with you on that.

JEFFORDS: I look forward to working with you and communicating with you.

WELSH: Senator, may I mention something that we're doing locally, not in the national scale, but in Philadelphia in Region III we piloted a program called "Lead-Safe Babies" where we worked with the National Nursing Centers Consortium, to actually have health professionals who go out into homes to talk to mothers and families about the possible sources of exposure to lead that exist in their homes.

We thought that was very successful in Philadelphia and we are expanding that funding and it will be called "Lead Safety C" to work with the D.C. Department of Health, but not to supplant, but augment efforts that they're doing to get better information actually into the hands of people in their homes about what their exposures to lead might be, so that we can take a look at the holistic issue of lead exposure: paint, dust, soil, as well as drinking water.

So, we felt that that was very successful in Philadelphia and we're happy to expand that to D.C. to try to help improve the public's knowledge about those risks.

JEFFORDS: Thank you.

CRAPO: Thank you.

Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Johnson, I just want to make sure I understood your comment at the end of the previous question from the chairman.

This is, in your view, primarily a single family home problem? Not a multiple unit problem?

JOHNSON: That's correct, senator.

CLINTON: But one thing I think might be worth considering on the part of the D.C. government, since there is some confusion about the numbers of service lines that are of unknown composition and I think the historical record problem is such that we may never get to the bottom of that. It might be worth considering some action that would provide filters for families in these categories of uncertainty or even go to the extent of permitting a family to purchase this filter and attach the receipt to their property tax return and deduct it from their costs.

I think that something needs to be done to take action more quickly and to restore confidence. And the confusion that now exists over how many lead service lines there are and how many unknown composition lines there are and whether people are going to get tested and then after they get tested, how soon they can get a filter.

There might be a way to short-circuit that and go ahead and absorb the cost now, we can argue later about whether the EPA and the federal government should help to reimburse since we have primary responsibility, but at least move to get as many as filters installed as quickly as possible.

I live in the District; my house was built in 1950, so I'm right on the cusp. And I've had an ongoing dispute about whether we do or do not have lead service lines, but we have discovered that we lead lines in the house. So, even if I have an unknown composition line coming from the street, once it gets into the house, I have lead lines.

So, I think that there are several ways that perhaps, you could short-circuit and also restore some confidence and provide some reassurance.

Finally, with respect to the overall review that I understand the EPA may be engaged in, Mr. Grumbles and Mr. Welsh, I would appreciate your looking at the level of testing that's required. In New York City, it falls into a system serving more than 100,000 households and we have eight million people living in New York City. In order to meet that standard, we test 100 households and that's sufficient.

But there are more than 100 neighborhoods. Some are single family neighborhoods, some are duplex neighborhoods, some are apartment neighborhoods, some are public housing neighborhoods. We have as many different kinds of housing as you can find anywhere in the country.

So, I want you to, as you're going through this review, look at the level of testing that is adequate for large systems, particularly a system as large as New York. And then in light of this problem that we've had in D.C., you think that the regulations which allow systems to test for every three years for lead are adequately protected.

We only test 100 sites; we only do that every three years. Given what we're finding out, given the fact that we're changing the make up of the chemicals put into the water, we need to be checking on this more frequently and I appreciate Mr. Jacobus' comment: We need to make it more transparent so that people know what's going on so we can immediately bring people together to respond.

And I think this is a matter of such great concern to all of us. The quality of our drinking water -- I share Senator Jeffords' concern about bottled water, based on my review of the FDA, there's not very much testing and there's not very much regulation and a lot of people are going out spending hundreds of dollars a year to buy bottled water, which may or may not be better or safer than what comes out of their taps.

We need to find out. People need information to make their own judgment and we need some kind of transparency that provides this information so that a concerned mother, a concerned pregnant woman, a concerned anybody can go somewhere, a Web site, a hotline and find out what he or she needs to find out.

And finally, Mr. Chairman, unfortunately, I can't stay for the next panel, but I want to thank Gloria Borland and Jody Lanard and Dr. Best. I've read their testimony. I highly recommend that WASA and everyone else read Dr. Lanard's testimony about risk communication. In fact, I think everybody in any position of public responsibility should read this testimony. It provides a very useful guideline about how to deal with crisis situations, some of which is counterintuitive.

CLINTON: The immediate response is we don't want to panic people. We want to give people reassurance.

I ran into this with the World Trade Center. We got into a big problem because EPA and the White House didn't tell people that we had more particulates and problems in the air around Ground Zero than they wanted us to know. So, we didn't have the urgency that would have convinced a lot of the workers and volunteers at Ground Zero to wear that protective equipment.

So, I think given the high level of risk that we live in the world today, risk communication is central and it is counterintuitive, because I think the natural human feeling, when you're in a position of responsibility and you take it so seriously, is, "I don't want people to panic." Given the world today, it may be better to error on the side of more rather than less information.

We have a lot of very mature, very active people who then can draw their own judgments. One of the things that I face all the time at Ground Zero now is construction workers, firefighters and others who say, "You know if they'd told me I would have left the mask on."

Well, they were kind of told it was dangerous, they could smell it was dangerous, but the EPA was saying that it's OK.

So, this is the conflict and I appreciate the conflict. But I think we need to get to a point where we level with people, we provide information transparently and that I think we have to look at the laws and the regulations because if we can't provide safe drinking water in our nation's capital, that's a terrible indictment of all of us. And particularly given the fact that the federal government oversees D.C., for better or worse, it's our responsibility.

Thank you so much for holding this hearing, Mr. Chairman.

"Weekend Edition Saturday," NPR, 4/17/2004

It's been more than a decade since Hillary Rodham Clinton and the US Congress went to the mat over universal health care and came up bruised and empty-handed. Mrs. Clinton has since written in her memoir that the experience made her, quote, "focus on discreet undertakings that were more achievable." Now Senator Clinton, Democrat of New York, has some new thoughts on health care and ideas on how to expand coverage to include more Americans more effectively. She's written the cover story for Sunday's New York Times Magazine. It's titled Now Can We Talk About Health Care. Yes, right now, as a matter of fact. Senator Clinton joins us on the line from her home in Washington, DC.

Thanks so much for being with us.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Thank you so much for having me.

SIMON: Without going back to the whole history 10 years ago, and with so many people who made health care an urgent priority, why did no plan result?

Sen. CLINTON: Oh, I think there were so many reasons. Obviously, we in the Clinton administration made some miscalculations and mistakes, and I think in the 10 years since, many of the concerns about what would happen if the Clinton health plan were successful, that you would be denied your choice of doctor, that costs would explode, that bureaucrats would be making decisions instead of physicians, have actually come to pass, but not because we made any progress, but because the system itself is under so much stress, and the way we finance health care is so dysfunctional.

SIMON: You point to a number of factors which cause you concern about the future of health care, and one of the first, you talk about the extraordinary reach and range of genetic research.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Scott, I think this is one of the great advances that will help transform health care, and many people's lives will be enhanced. But if we stop and think about it, it could very well lead to the undermining of insurance as we know it. Within 10 years, we're going to have tests that can tell us whether we are possibly susceptible to all kinds of conditions, and because we don't have good legislation to protect against discrimination if you take those tests and find out that, you know, maybe you carry the gene for breast cancer or maybe you have a precursor for Parkinson's, that you may not be insurable. But I argue that with the advances in genomics, we're all going to find out we're uninsurable because we're all going to be susceptible to something. And we not only need strong laws to protect against discrimination, we need to start rethinking how you insure for risks that we now will know we're susceptible to because, after all, insurance pricing is based on risk.

SIMON: Mm-hmm. You make the argument in this article, Senator Clinton, that the world we're living in after September 11th, 2001, makes the case for universal coverage, which you and some other people believe in, even more urgent.

Sen. CLINTON: I think that's right. You know, I was struck when we had the anthrax attacks shortly after 9/11, that some of the people who did jobs in postal service facilities that were contaminated weren't quite sure that they would be covered under their insurance policy for prophylactic antibiotic treatment with Cipro. And I thought, 'This is nuts.' And if you think about the dangers posed by biological, chemical and radiological terrorism, we can't possibly be at the door keeping score about who is or isn't going to be given what treatment in the event that there's, like, a sarin attack in the subway. It also argues strongly for investing in our hospital and public health structure.

SIMON: Mm-hmm. Senator Clinton, how would you expand health care to include millions of Americans that aren't covered, either because they're unemployed or some, in fact, are working jobs that do not include health care?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, we have 43 million uninsured Americans, and, Scott, most of the uninsured are working and they just can't afford individual coverage and they don't work for someone who offers it. I think we have some good ideas from Senator Kerry, which I include at the end of my article. I've been a long advocate for opening up the Federal Employee Health Benefit Program to letting citizens buy into that system. It's a subsidized system. It's how I get my health-care coverage.

I also think Senator Kerry is right in arguing that the government be a re-insurer for catastrophic high-cost claims that would then relieve these financial burdens from both private employers and state and local government. I think it's crazy for us to have passed a Medicare bill for drug coverage and basically tell the United States government and the Medicare program that it can't bargain with pharmaceutical companies for lower prices. You know, that's just an invitation to taking the lid further off an explosion of prescription drug prices. You know, we do negotiate to the Veterans Administration, and we have been able to make drugs affordable for our veterans. So we could go a long way toward fixing, you know, some of the problems that are plaguing our system.

SIMON: Well, one of the things I think I've noticed over the past 10 years, journalists in, let's say, the French, British and Canadian press where they have something that more resembles universal health-care coverage, have written articles over the past few years talking about the drawbacks in that system, that there are advanced medical procedures that simply are often not available under their health-care system, or they are so tightly rationed there are long waiting lists, and inevitably there are stories that appear about people who die waiting for a certain procedure. How would you address some of the concerns that a more universal coverage system might create that circumstance?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think we have to start from the obvious premise there is no perfect system. Other systems do a better job with longevity, with infant mortality, with public health than we do, but when it comes to high-end, high-cost procedures, you know, we're the crown jewel. So how do we keep the best of our health-care system and do a better job in creating a private and public health-care system that treats chronic disease more effectively, that provides more incentives for prevention and the like? Well, obviously, I think we need a public-private partnership.

SIMON: For some people, the idea of Senator Clinton getting involved in health care again is a little bit like Michael Jordan trying to play baseball again.

(Soundbite of laughter)

SIMON: How are you thinking now you might do a better job of selling your ideas now than perhaps occurred 10 years ago?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, what I'm really trying to do with this article is respond to the intense concern that I see all over New York. You know, we're bankrupting so many of our counties in New York because of Medicaid costs. We have employers dropping retiree coverage and making employee coverage so expensive that people are dropping their spouses or their children or themselves. We're on an unsustainable course, and I am more than willing to say, 'Look, when we tried in '93 and '94, we made a bunch of mistakes,' and I guess it's like a lot of complicated problems that you have to deal with. You know, Medicare and Medicaid took nearly 20 years from Truman to Johnson. Complicated problems that we have to address as a nation that are politically difficult, that have special interests don't get addressed overnight, and now I think 10 years after our failed effort, it's time to start the conversation again.

SIMON: If Senator Kerry were to call you and say, 'Senator Clinton, I'd like you to be my vice presidential candidate,' what would you say, do you know?

Sen. CLINTON: No, and I've said no to everyone who's even raised that possibility with me. I love being a senator, and I will do everything possible to get him elected because I just can't imagine four more years of the current administration on any issue that I care about at home or abroad.

SIMON: Have you contemplated the fact that according to experts there is a real chance of a Cubs-Yankees World Series? That would put you in a difficult position, wouldn't it, Senator?

Sen. CLINTON: But, you know, I think it is less likely than an asteroid hitting our planet, Scott. And I know you're a longtime Cubs fan, and you understand maybe better than most why a Cubs fan would want to also be a fan of a winning team. If it ever comes to pass...

SIMON: That's cruel.

Sen. CLINTON: ...that there is that World Series, that may be the end of the world. It may be the precursor, but who knows. I don't think it'll happen. The Cubs have never disappointed me.

SIMON: Also never given you great pleasure, it sounds like.

Sen. CLINTON: That's right exactly. But, you know, my hopes no longer soar as high as they used to.

SIMON: Senator Clinton, thanks very much.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you. Great to talk to you.

SIMON: Senator from New York, Hillary Rodham Clinton. Senator Clinton's article, Now Can We Talk About Health Care, is the cover story in tomorrow's New York Times Sunday Magazine. There's also a sports section in there. And for an extended version of our interview, you can visit our Web site, npr.org.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 4/8/2004

LARRY KING, HOST: Tonight, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, her first live prime-time interview since her best seller, "Living History," came out in paperback with a new update. The former first lady will cover it all -- Iraq, the November elections, Bob Woodward's explosive new book, "Plan of Attack," her own future and more. Senator Clinton is next on LARRY KING LIVE.

(LAUGHTER)

We're all laughing. What's left to cover? That's it. Thanks for coming, and good night.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: It's great being here, Larry.

KING: A lot of things to talk about. "Living History" was the number one best seller last year.

CLINTON: I thought it was terrific. I was...

KING: Were you shocked by that?

CLINTON: I was surprised. You know, when you write a book, you have no idea if anybody is going to read it. You hope maybe your family will. But it had a great response, in part because I think people are always interested in first lady memoirs, and because some of the stories about my life and experiences struck chords with people.

And it was amazing, as I went around the country doing book signings or literally just walking through airports, people would come up and say, gee, you know, I had a father just like yours, or, you know, I really related to what you said about growing up.

KING: A heck of a good read.

CLINTON: Well, thank you.

KING: It's now out in excellent -- in trade paperback. Did a nice job for you.

CLINTON: It looks so nice. Doesn't it? I was very impressed by the quality of it.

KING: (UNINTELLIGIBLE), looks great.

And let's get into some things.

CLINTON: Sure.

KING: OK. Did you -- what do you make of this whole Woodward book thing? Have you read?

CLINTON: I'm fascinated -- no, I have not read it, but I'm fascinated by it. I have followed the coverage, obviously. I know you had a great interview with him last night.

KING: Thank you.

CLINTON: And it confirms a lot of what we'd already learned about the administration.

KING: Which is?

CLINTON: That it's a very close knit, quite insular team that basically talks to itself, and has very strong convictions, which is admirable, that are not shaken by evidence or any factual differences in what they intend to do. And I think his accounting of how Iraq was on the agenda for the administration so shortly after 9/11, and in fact it corresponds what we learned from Paul O'Neill's book, from Dick Clarke's book, that they were intent upon dealing with what they saw as the dangers in Iraq.

KING: You voted for it, though, didn't you?

CLINTON: I voted for the authorization, and obviously I've thought about that a lot in the months since.

KING: Sorry you did?

CLINTON: No, I don't regret giving the president authority, because at the time it was in the context of weapons of mass destruction, grave threats to the United States, and clearly, Saddam Hussein had been a real problem for the international community for more than a decade.

What I regret is the way the president used the authority. I think that the short-circuiting of the inspections process, after going to the United Nations, and then basically not permitting the inspectors to finish whatever task they could have accomplished to demonstrate one way or the other what was there. The failure to plan is the most hard -- of all the things is the hardest for me to understand. I mean, how could they have been so poorly prepared for the aftermath of the toppling of Saddam Hussein? And there's just a number of questions that, you know, we still don't really have answers for.

KING: Do you think you were fooled, or you think they had bad information? I mean, is your feeling that they were going to go hell or high water, or do you think they just got bad information?

CLINTON: I think it's important that we figure out the answers to those questions, which is why I am supporting the 9/11 commission, why I think that the Congress and their joint committees did a great public service trying to sort this out, why the other commission that the president appointed is important.

You know, the consensus was the same, from the Clinton administration to the Bush administration. It was the same intelligence belief that our allies and friends around the world shared about the weapons of mass destruction.

KING: Had the same CIA director.

CLINTON: Same CIA director, absolutely. But I think that in the case of the administration, they really believed it. They really thought they were right, but they didn't let enough sunlight into their thinking process to really have the kind of debate that needs to take place when a serious decision occurs like that.

KING: So when you say you give it second thoughts, does this mean you're frustrated, you're rethinking?

CLINTON: No, I mean, I say -- I believe strongly that after 9/11, we have to be prepared to take action to protect our country, to protect our friends and allies, American assets around the world.

KING: So you favor us -- favor us being there?

CLINTON: Well, I favor the fact that now that we're there, we're going to have to make the best of it. I think it could have been handled differently. That's why I say I regret the way the president decided to use the authority.

And it's been bewildering to me, you know, the idea that they would reject out of hand all the planning that was done in the State Department, that they would, you know, basically ignore the warnings that so many people gave them about what would happen when the oppressive, you know, heavy hand of Saddam Hussein was lifted off. For the life of me, I don't understand how they had such an unrealistic view about what was going to happen.

KING: What do you make of the Colin Powell thing?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I have the same questions everybody does. You read that book, and you know clearly, from what I hear, Secretary Powell has been, you know, kind of arguing for a different perspective, a different strategy inside the administration. He seems to have been pretty isolated, because the decision makers -- Cheney, Rumsfeld, the president -- were intent upon a different course.

KING: Being in that spot, though, ain't the easiest walk on the block, is it?

CLINTON: That's correct.

KING: You were there.

CLINTON: That's right. It is. It's very tough.

KING: And you can only go sometimes on what you're given, right? And if the people around you tell you, this is it...

CLINTON: Well, that's one of the reasons why I think it's important to have a president who asks a lot of questions, who is intellectually curious, who seeks out contrary points of view, who doesn't just surround himself with people who see the world the same way he does.

You know, there is no one world view that encompasses every reality that exists on this planet, and you have to have a decision-making process that pushes a lot of information up, and asks a lot of hard questions. You don't get that sense from this White House.

KING: But in this book, he does ask questions, of Rumsfeld, of Cheney, are you sure?

CLINTON: He -- very -- yeah, but in very formal settings, you know, meetings where information's been portrayed, and it's the same people he's asking over and over again. You know, if you're going to ask Cheney the same question over and over again, you're going to get the same answer, because it's the answer that he wants you to have.

KING: Lyndon Johnson had George Ball, who was totally opposed to the war in Vietnam and made that clear. Did your administration have someone whom your husband or you liked hearing, no?

CLINTON: Well, you know, it was just a totally different approach to decision-making. You know, the Bush team came in and said, we're going to, you know, have a very disciplined, corporate-like approach to solving these problems, so information has to come up through the hierarchy. We're not going to let somebody like Dick Clarke, who is in charge of counterterrorism in the NSC actually brief the president.

Well, that's not at all what my husband did. You know, he wanted people to argue in front of him. He wanted people to present different points of view. Because he at the end of the day knew he had to make the decision. I mean, the buck does stop. The president has to make a decision.

KING: On that end, how is his book coming?

CLINTON: He's working very hard on it. It's moving toward completion.

KING: Have you read it?

CLINTON: I have read a lot of it, yes. I mean, it's...

KING: What do you think?

CLINTON: I think it's going to be a terrific...

KING: You can give us an early review.

CLINTON: Well, no, I can't do that, I can't let anything out of the bag. He has -- he has taken the time to write in a very detailed way about what it was like growing up in the South during the 1950s, what it was like coming of age with Elvis and all the new music that started to sweep our country. So it's not only a story of his life. It's really a story of a life that has a real cultural context at a certain point in America.

I think it's going to be a terrific read, and obviously, it will be, I think, popular, but it will also be educational and informative for people.

KING: Coming out when?

CLINTON: I don't know, the next couple of months sometime.

KING: Is he going to examine the frailties, too?

CLINTON: I think he's, you know, a very thorough job.

KING: Is it going to be rough for you to relive those parts when they come out?

CLINTON: You know, I -- I did that with my book, and I feel very comfortable about it.

KING: You've put it away, right?

CLINTON: You know, life goes on, and you know, my perspective on the eight years that I had in the White House and to try to serve my country was -- it overall was a tremendous privilege and honor, and I'm grateful for that.

KING: If they told you you'd be senator for life, would you take it?

CLINTON: Well, the great thing about our system is nobody is anything for life. You have to earn it every single day.

KING: If they said that's your job and that will be your job, senator from New York, you'll be reelected, let's say, with the gods...

CLINTON: Let's hope so.

KING: Would you say, "that's fine by me?"

CLINTON: I love being senator from New York. I mean, you know what New York is like. I mean, it is the most fascinating, dynamic place in the world, and I get to represent nearly 19 million people who come from everywhere, with every kind of experience you can imagine. It's a tremendous honor and it's also a lot of fun.

KING: We'll be right back with Hillary Rodham Clinton. The book, "Living History," the number one worldwide best seller. It's got a new afterword and it's published in trade paperback by Scribner. Don't go away.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: She has an approval rating of 62 percent, by the way, in New York state. The book, "Living History: Hillary Rodham Clinton." A new afterword is published in trade paperback by Scribner. It's great to have her with us live tonight in Washington. This is a hypothetical, but hypotheticals are fair and of course, they're good.

CLINTON: Just between us, OK.

KING: Senator Kerry says to you, run with me. Because I need you to run with me, because the party needs you, and the country needs you. What do you say?

CLINTON: You know, John, I'm going to do everything I can to get you elected because I think you'd be a terrific president but I'm not going to run.

KING: You'd turn him down. If he asked, you would turn him down?

CLINTON: Yes, because I think that I can be very helpful in, as I did last week, spending time with him, appearing with him, trying to bring people to him in every way possible, and that I think is my appropriate role right now.

KING: Why wouldn't you want to be?

CLINTON: You know, Larry, I'm so happy being senator from New York right now. I love my life. I love my job. I want to see it through, you know? The people of New York took a chance on me, and I'm well aware of that, and I said I wouldn't run and I really mean it. I'm not going to run.

KING: Do you have thoughts as to who would be a good selection?

CLINTON: I think there are a number of people who would be, but that is such a personal choice, and you know, I have a lot of confidence in John's judgment. I think he'll make the choice based on what the important criteria are. Would this person be a good president if something happened to me? That's got to be the number one reason. Secondly, is it somebody that, you know, I want to work with? I get along with? Who can compliment me, and thirdly, what can this person bring to the ticket? I think he's got some very good choices.

KING: How do you see the election?

CLINTON: I really believe that it will remain close, but at the end of the campaign, after the conventions, after the debates, I believe that Americans are going to want a new direction, they're going to want different leadership. You know, I said to somebody earlier today, this is like a job interview for President Bush. You know, he's been there for four years, and he's going to have to come to the American people and say, rehire me.

KING: This is his review.

CLINTON: This is his review and we are his employers, as we are with any president, and as we go down the list, there are a lot of problems with this administration with respect to job creation and economic growth that is broadly based amongst the entire country. There are a lot of problems with health care exploding again in costs. There are many issues, whether one looks at the energy policy or the environmental policy or anything else, plus the problems that we face abroad, that I think a majority of Americans who, in my experience, are not only fair-minded but are very savvy about what's in their interest, because they're looking to see where is this going to lead for me and my family are going to vote for John Kerry.

KING: How involved will you be?

CLINTON: Very involved.

KING: Will you stump?

CLINTON: Absolutely, not only for the presidential ticket but for senator candidates. I think we have a very good chance to take back the Senate. We have some fabulous people running. We've got strong incumbents and we've got strong challengers and I think that, you know, you watch those senator races. We've got a very good chance there.

KING: Is Bill going to stump?

CLINTON: He's going to do whatever he can. He is committed to helping the ticket, helping candidates, and he's already been asked to do some things he and I did on e-mail request for campaign funds for Senator Kerry shortly after he secured the nomination. It was very successful. We're going to keep on doing whatever we're asked to do and we can think to do.

KING: We'll be right back with more of Hillary Rodham Clinton. "Living History" is now out in trade paperback. Don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLINTON: He needs your commitment, he needs your dedication to make sure that America makes the right decision in November, and I give you the next president of the United States, Senator John Kerry.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: We're back with Hillary Rodham Clinton. "Living History" is out in trade paperback with a new afterward. Let's go back to some issues staying with Iraq. The continued violence, the continued casualties. Your committee -- Armed Services Committee is holding hearings, et cetera.

What's validity of June 30th?

CLINTON: Well, it's a date that has taken on a life of its own, because the president said that was the date. And there's an argument for sticking with it, because you don't want to have -- put yourself so far out and then have to retreat from a promise of some kind of sovereignty. But for example, today in the Armed Services Committee, we questioned Secretary Wolfowitz about what does the sovereignty mean?

Who is going to be sovereign, and what is the relationship they're going to have with the military.

KING: What did he say?

CLINTON: There were too many answers. It's a staged process. United Nations is now finally involved, and they're attempting to create some kind of an entity consisting of some group of people, not necessarily the governing council or anyone who has served on it, but of course it seems to me they're going to have to have some carryover. And then this group will have responsibility for trying to move toward the selection of a transition government that will then be responsible for elections that will put into place a fully sovereign government.

But when you start asking questions, okay, well, well what is the relationship going to be with respect to the United States military?

Will we have the full right and authority to operate within a now "sovereign" nation or will we be in some ways subject to this entity consisting of whomever, we don't know.

KING: Who runs who?

CLINTON: Who runs who under what circumstances. Very often with this administration it's unclear whether they have answers they don't want to share or they don't have answers. That's what's deeply troubling to me. Just as the Woodward book so compellingly explained, this is an administration that really believes that it's on a mission, and they don't have to answer to anybody, including the United States Congress or the people of the country. That they give as little information as possible, keep it very closely held, and I don't think it's working. I don't think it's -- it's not only not working, it is also not in keeping with our democracy. And they are laying down some very bad precedence that I don't think are in the best interests of our war on terrorism or the kind of accountable balanced government we should have.

KING: Concerning the 9/11 Commission and Mr. Clarke you mentioned.

CLINTON: Yes.

KING: He was critical of both administrations, critical of yours as well, as well as the Bush administration in the area of Osama bin Laden.

Do you buy that criticism?

CLINTON: Well, I've actually read Dick Clarke's book. I've had time to do that. It's a very fair rendering. And he makes a couple of points. First, at least in his experience, the Clinton administration was very focused on bin Laden and al Qaeda. There was not the context that we had after 9/11 to have taken a lot of the actions that were later possible, like invading Afghanistan. The one thing he recommended that was rejected was bombing the training camps in Afghanistan, but there was a very open debate in the administration. The military had real problems with it, another members of the NSC had real problems with it. You remember that my husband did bomb one of the camps where we thought at the time bin Laden would be. But I take the criticism as absolutely legitimate. I think Dick Clarke is a very credible witness to what went on over the last years. He has a different critique that Bush administration, as you know, that they were not as focused as they needed to be. That's why the 9/11 Commission is so important. I think they are doing a very credible not just bipartisan, frankly nonpartisan job.

KING: What did you think of his apology?

CLINTON: I thought it was very moving and very obviously almost heart rending with the response that he had from the families.

KING: What are your thoughts on Mr. Tenet, who served both you and this administration?

CLINTON: I think we have to look at the structural problems. I don't think this comes down to any one person, and therefore, I'm going to wait until the 9/11 Commission comes forth with their analysis and their recommendations. We've given millions of documents to them, I think, pages of documents, and they have done a very professional job from everything I can see in kind of sorting through it, trying to get lines of responsibility straightened out, and figuring out what we're going to do going forward, because this is, yes, about the past. Have you to learn from the past, but it is much more about where we're going to be next year and the years after, and a lot of the problems that we had on 9/11 we still have, to some degree, and I'm hoping that this commission can have a unanimous report that will make recommendations that the administration, whoever they are and the Congress will follow.

KING: Do you expect it to be bipartisan?

CLINTON: I do.

KING: Unanimous maybe?

CLINTON: I'm hoping. I know that former Governor Kean and former Congressman Hamilton are hoping that it can be. It may not be. It may be unanimous in some respects and not in other respects. But they're making such a good faith effort to do that.

KING: How well do you get along with this administrations as individual senator?

CLINTON: As an individual senator, very well. I've worked with a number of members of the administration. I have a very cordial relationship with the president. I've worked on some issues with Mrs. Bush. I have an understanding of, you know, the burdens that they carry. After 9/11, I, personally, told the president that I would support him in every way possible, because we had to have a united country in the face of the attacks that we suffered.

KING: Do you miss -- do you miss the executive end?

CLINTON: No. It was an incredible experience for those eight years. And I wouldn't trade them for anything, but I'm glad that there are term limits. It is an unbelievable -- absolutely. I mean, Larry, just look at the pictures of any of our recent presidents from the day they take office as they progress through their term. The burdens and responsibilities of that office today are just overwhelming. And you know, you think about Franklin Roosevelt or Harry Truman guiding us through World War II and the beginning of the cold war and president Truman's case, they still took long vacations, they had time for their friends, poker games, you know, cocktail hours.

KING: They took walks.

CLINTON: They took walks. They had a human dimension of their lives. And with all due respect, there wasn't a 24-hour news cycle that required a response from the administration, you know, every 10 minutes. People could think about issues. They could digest information. We now expect this one person, the president, to be both head of government and head of state, to deal with all kinds of problems in a rapid-fire manner. It is just an incredible burden.

KING: We're going to take a break and come back with our remaining moments with Hillary Clinton and then talk with Congressman Chris Shays of Connecticut, Congresswoman Jane Harman of Connecticut. Their reaction to what she just said, and thoughts on the Woodward book and Iraq as well.

I said California, didn't? I...

CLINTON: It is California.

KING: I thought I said it. Anyway "Living History" by Hillary Rodham Clinton and it's with a new afterword published in trade paperback. We'll be right back.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: We're back with Hillary Rodham Clinton, these are our remaining moments, and then we'll meet Congressman Shays and Congresswoman Harman.

Egypt's Mubarak said today, "The United States is now the target of unprecedented hate in the Arab world." I guess that has to do with the agreement with Sharon. What did you think of that?

CLINTON: Well, first of all, I regret the statement by President Mubarak, because it is -- it's a problem for us. We've got to figure out how we're going to both communicate more effectively and deal with many countries around the world.

Specifically, with respect to the decision that Prime Minister Sharon made, I think it grows out of frustration on the part of the Israeli government that they don't have a partner to negotiate with in good faith, and it's a unilateral decision that as I understand what the prime minister and both President Bush said is not set in stone with respect to a future negotiation that might finalize all of the issues between the Palestinians and the Israelis.

But I think that it's understandable, and I support, you know, an effort to move forward. Unfortunately, it's not in the context of any larger process, and I think that's going to turn out to be a problem.

KING: Is it solvable?

CLINTON: Oh, you have to believe that it is. The prospects are just too grim for the children of Israel and of the Palestinians, not to believe it's solvable. You know, there have been a lot of terrible problems in our world that we've lived through in the last century that people didn't think were solvable, that yielded to hard work and faith and patience, and I think we have to bring the same to bear in the Middle East.

KING: You think 9/11 was preventable?

CLINTON: Oh, it's hard to know whether it was or not, but certainly clues were missed along the way, actions were not taken that might have made a difference. I'm hoping we can sort that out through the 9/11 commission, and then learn whatever lessons there are and apply them to the future.

KING: Patriot Act?

CLINTON: We're taking a look at it now. There were some necessary changes that it made in how we conduct surveillance, and the tools available to law enforcement, and then there may very well have been some parts of it that were not necessary, and there may be some additional changes that would be merited, but I think that the administration may be asking for, you know, some authority that is troubling. For example, to go ahead and give the opportunity for warrantless searches without a grand jury or a judge signing off on them.

KING: So you're not sure?

CLINTON: I think there are some parts of it that I'll be able to support, and other parts of it I'm not sure I can.

KING: Do you think it will change?

CLINTON: I don't know yet. And there is opposition to different parts of it from all sides of the political spectrum.

KING: Tom Ridge, get along with him? Or what do you think of how he's doing?

CLINTON: You know, he's a very decent person who has been given an overwhelming job. I disagree with their strategy. I don't have any disagreements with Secretary Ridge, whom I found to be quite responsive to my needs.

KING: (UNINTELLIGIBLE).

CLINTON: You know, I don't think that they've sorted out what are national responsibilities, what should the federal government be doing in our ports and our borders, what are the responsibilities at the local level, which means we should get the money directly to our first responders, our police, our firefighters and others at the local level. What, for example, is the responsibility of the private sector. You know, we have a lot of chemical plants in this country that are very vulnerable.

There's just been a lack of a clear, understandable strategy, with lines of authority and responsibility, and appropriate allocations of resources.

KING: A couple of other things. With what happened in Spain close to their election...

KING: ... do you fear something happening here at Boston or in New York?

CLINTON: Well, you know, Larry, I worry about terrorism every day. You know, I represent New York. I -- I go into the city. I go downtown. I meet with survivors, with family...

KING: You think about it a lot?

CLINTON: I think about it...

KING: Every day?

CLINTON: ... every single day. It is never out of my mind. You know, sometimes I try to think like a terrorist, to be honest, you know, say what is it they would do? You know, what are our vulnerabilities? What do we need to do to be more prepared? How do we be more vigilant to take care of ourselves?

And it's not just the responsibility of government. It is the responsibility of all of our citizens to, you know, be more vigilant, and to report suspicious activity.

So yeah, I worry about it, and you know, I don't -- you know, I don't let it interfere with my going about my daily business, I don't change any of my routines. I don't, you know, refuse to go places. You know, obviously.

KING: Do you feel safe?

CLINTON: I feel safe because I refuse to feel unsafe, but intellectually I'm constantly thinking about what more we need to do.

KING: And there is a lot more to do?

CLINTON: There is a lot more to do. That's why I say I've been unsatisfied with the strategy that the administration has followed with respect to homeland security.

KING: Are you optimistic or pessimistic?

CLINTON: I'm optimistic, you know.

KING: Despite all you see?

CLINTON: Absolutely. You know, I think that's one of the great gifts of being an American is that we're fundamentally an optimistic people. We have a lot of hope about the future, we think tomorrow can be better than today and yesterday.

That's the way I was raised. That's how I feel in my own life.

And I'm worried, because I have a sense that there's a little bit of fatalism creeping in to some of the remarks I hear from the president and others. I mean, it seems, you know, like you know, we live in a dangerous world. People have always lived in a dangerous world. Our dangers may be of significantly greater proportion because of nuclear, biological and chemical warfare, but people have always had to live with dangers and risks.

And not only that, we can do things to deal with those. For example, one of the Woodward revelations about the gas prices and Saudi Arabia, I mean, that should be a wake-up call for our leadership and our citizens to say, you know what? We are not going to be dependent on any country and their oil supply. We are going to immediately move as quickly as possible to as much energy independence as we can have.

You know, we are Americans. We can solve problems because we are optimistic, we are smart. We are entrepreneurial, and that's the energy that we need to be unleashing in this country again.

KING: Does Bill miss it?

CLINTON: No, he's having the time of his life, you know, being back in private life.

KING: He is?

CLINTON: He really is, yeah. His foundation is doing fabulous work. You know, they've negotiated these low prices for generic drugs, helped more people...

KING: But he is so political.

CLINTON: Yeah, but he's now -- you know, he's now doing things like getting lower prices for drugs to make sure that people get help with HIV/AIDS around the world.

KING: Would you allow importation from Canada?

CLINTON: Absolutely. Absolutely. I also think it was a big mistake not to let Medicare negotiate drug prices.

KING: As always, thank you.

CLINTON: Thank you, Larry.

KING: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. The book, "Living History," the phenomenal number one worldwide best seller. New afterword is published by Scribner.

And when we come back, two frequent guests. Always good to see them. Finally good to be with them, Congresswoman Jane Harman of California, Congressman Chris Shays of Connecticut. Don't go away.

CLINTON: Good to see you there.

COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS EVENT, 4/20/2004

COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS EVENT AND RELEASE OF RE-PORT: "WHAT WORKS IN GIRLS' EDUCATION: EVIDENCE AND POLI-CIES FROM THE DEVELOPING WORLD" BY BARBARA HERZ AND GENE SPERLING

WITH REMARKS BY SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY)

MODERATOR: NANCY BIRDSALL, PRESIDENT, CENTER FOR GLOBAL DEVELOPMENT

LOCATION: CFR, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you so much. (Applause.)

Well, good morning, and it's wonderful to see so many of you here this morning to talk about this important issue.

And I want to thank Gene for his commitment. Those of you who know Gene Sperling know he never does anything halfway. We used to joke in the White House that he moved in in 1993, never went home, he never ate a decent meal. You could find him, at all times of the day, toiling away on behalf of many of the important issues that he was given responsibility for. And I think it's fitting that he has come to this issue with the same level of passion and analysis that has marked his work in the past, and I am delighted to be working with him.

And I want to thank Nancy for taking the lead on this issue with the U.N. Millennium Task Force on Gender Equality and Education. I am hopeful that, in this very difficult time in which we find ourselves, and particularly with respect to America's leadership, that we can find ways to highlight and deepen our international cooperation, and this certainly is one area where I think that is possible.

I also want to acknowledge Barbara Herz for bringing so much research and experience to the report that Gene has been highlighting, and Rekha Balu, who has done so much to prepare for today.

I want to acknowledge two of my friends who have also worked tirelessly in this area. Elaine Wolfensohn has already been mentioned, and I'm delighted that she, along with Jim, have really raised the banner high on education, particularly girls' education, around the world.

And Melanne Verveer, who as my former chief of staff, was instrumental in the work we did in the White House, particularly with respect to Vital Voices, an initiative to highlight the needs of girls and women around the world, and specifically with respect to doing all we could to make girls' education, universal education a priority. And I thank the council for hosting Gene's project and this discussion today.

This is Global Action Day. Don't you love those kinds of phrases. You know, it has all kinds of wonderful images. And perhaps in some places around the world there is the kind of action going on that Global Action Day suggests, where children and their parents are petitioning and calling for greater commitment to education for all. It is supposed to be a day when children actually lobby policy makers to support universal basic education. And later this afternoon, I will be hosting a reception for about 40 student leaders who are working on this issue in our own country. And I hope that we are able to create more of an incentive to focus on the potential for global education and at the same time help to raise awareness here in our own country about why this is such a win-win strategy for the United States.

You know, for more than 30 years I've been working on behalf of girls' and women's issues, and particularly in the years during the Clinton administration I had the opportunity to travel to so many places representing our country, often alone, many times with my husband, going into schools, going into communities, seeing firsthand how few girls in so many places were given adequate educational opportunities. And yet I also saw the hunger in their faces for that experience and the desire on the part of so many of their families. I remember going into a school in Uganda with Melanne and those who were accompanying me on that visit after President Museveni had made the decision to eliminate school fees, a terrible idea that went into effect in the '60s, '70s, '80s and really put almost a barrier up to universal education, particularly for girls. I mean, it was like a lot of ideas that on paper made sense in some office in Washington or London or somewhere else that, you know, there was such a gap between the resources available and the need that existed that trying to instill some personal responsibility in families and make them committed to education by paying fees would just unleash this incredible outpouring of children going to schools, which would increase the resources, et cetera et cetera.

Well, you know the facts are quite to the contrary.

But when President Museveni decided he was going to try to make it possible for children to attend school, he had an overwhelming response. And we went into a school that was literally packed to the gills. (Chuckles.) I mean, it was filled with boys and girls. There were probably 75 of them in a room by, you know, maybe 15 by 20 feet, and one teacher, no supplies, but an eagerness that was palpable and inspiring.

I remember being in a village outside Lahore, sitting under a tree, talking to the women about the school that they wanted for their girls, because they had finally, after years and years, been able to build a primary school for their daughters, but it ended at what we would roughly think of as sixth grade. And then there was no more opportunity for education, because they were not going to send their girls away, and they couldn't travel safely to the nearest school. So their education ended.

I recall being in a village in Bangladesh where one of the experiments that we tried to support during the Clinton administration was beginning, and that was to provide both cash payments and food commodities to families in return for their sending their girls to school. And talking to the, you know, local village elder, he was amazed at how many more families would send their girls to school in return for, you know, a bag of rice or some other kind of reward. Because then they felt they didn't need the girl's labor, they could actually make a sensible trade to have their girl remain in school.

All over the world, we've had these examples. We have many in Gene's book about what does work.

At the same time, we know that the challenge ahead of us is daunting, and I would just remind all of us of some of the statistics in the book, which really drive this point home.

You know, there are hundreds of rigorous studies, hundreds of them, on the tangible economic, social and political gains that come from giving girls the opportunity to learn. And the reason for that is because the evidence is easy to gather, if we only look for it. Sometimes we don't look for it, and therefore we don't see it and don't draw the right conclusion.

But a single year of primary education, one year, correlates with a 10 to 20 percent increase in women's wages later in life. Academic studies find the return to a year of secondary education even higher, in the 15 to 25 percent range.

An extra year of a woman's education has been shown to reduce the risk that her children will die in infancy by 5 to 10 percent.

Education offers what the World Bank has referred to a window of hope in helping prevent the spread of AIDS among today's children. A recent study of a school-based AIDS education program in Uganda found a 75 percent reduction in the likelihood that children would be sexually active in their last year of primary school.

Girls' education is the best single policy for reducing fertility and therefore achieving sustainable families, according to a recent survey of the academic literature. In Brazil, for example, illiterate mothers have an average of six children, while literate mothers choose to have less than three children and are better able to care for and invest in their children's well-being.

A study of South Asia and sub-Saharan Africa found that from 1960 to 1992, more equal education between men and women could have led to nearly 1 percent higher annual per-capita GDP growth.

This report also documents in extensive detail what I have seen in many of the countries I have visited. The most effective way to reach the goal of getting all girls in school is by encouraging countries to make a firm commitment to universal basic education for all children, boys and girls, but with an understanding of the special obstacles that girls face.

There's an internationally recognized goal to get all children in school by 2015. We will fail to reach this goal unless poor countries themselves make a firm commitment to education and develop credible national education plans.

But the developed world, led by the United States, has to do more to help reach this goal as well. In 2000, when our government and 182 others came to Dakar, Senegal, at the World Education Forum, to affirm this 2015 goal, the well-off countries, including the United States, pledged that poor countries who were willing to go the distance would have the help of those of us who had the means to support them in this effort.

Specifically, the pledge that the World Bank and others articulated was that no poor country with a national plan for universal basic education and a commitment to pay its fair share would fail for lack of resources. That was the grand bargain. That was the social compact reached at Dakar, but we have failed to live up to our side of that bargain.

We've seen progress, to be sure. I take great pride in the special United States initiative we launched in 1995 to enhance girls' and women's education around the world. And I'm also proud of the significant increases in funding we secured to the Department of Labor's prevention of abusive child labor strategy and the debt relief initiative, which helped to increase education spending by as much as 55 percent in many African countries. And I have great admiration for a number of my colleagues, appropriators like Republican Congressman Kolbe and my great friend Democratic Congresswoman Nita Lowey and, in the Senate, Patrick Leahy, who have worked together to increase funding for education through the annual appropriations process.

But we have to be very clear about this. Most credible estimates of the external resources needed to reach universal education by 2015 are between $5 billion and $10 billion a year, and that is just for primary education.

Now, the United States commits over $300 million to education around the world each year, but that is still far short of the $2.5 billion that would be the United States' share of a true, meaningful global education fund. So we're not doing our part, although we have made progress, for which I'm very grateful, and neither are the other major donor countries.

Today I am proposing a major new legislative effort to increase U.S. resources and leadership to try to do our part to reach this goal. I will be introducing legislation in the coming weeks that will bolster our education assistance strategy in several critical ways.

The Education for All legislation calls for the development of a clear global strategy to achieve universal education by 2015. We recognize that no country can do this alone and we have to work together. And we can no longer afford the inefficient overlapping of projects and conflicting donor requirements that serve only to confuse and frustrate developing country representatives and impede long-term development planning.

I really applaud the work of many organizations and individuals who have labored to move us toward a more coordinated global approach: UNICEF for its work on girls' education; UNESCO for its important efforts to monitor countries' progress; and most of all, those who have worked so hard to launch the Education for All fast-track initiative, which provides a framework for the kind of international donor coordination that we so clearly need.

But it's time for the United States to take the lead not only to strengthen the fast-track initiative, but to use it as the foundation for a true global effort on education.

Secondly, we have to get our own house in order. I've seen individuals in various United States government agencies doing heroic work on programs to get more children in school. But so far, these efforts have been scatter-shot and uncoordinated, and the sum is less than the whole of even the very modest parts. While we don't need a new bureaucracy by any means, we certainly need a common purpose and a new commitment to coordination. I think we should have someone in our government designated as a coordinator for Education for All who will help to rationalize and oversee the U.S. education assistance efforts. I think we then could use an interagency task force comprised of representatives from USAID, State, Labor, Treasury, and the new Millennium Challenge Account, as well as the AIDS initiatives, to help us move beyond the pilot efforts and the project-by-project approaches to use the work that Gene and others have done to really begin to not only support best practices, but scale up from them.

Third, we need to make a new commitment of resources tied to strong standards of accountability and performance. My legislation calls for increasing U.S. funds available that support education to $500 million this year, $1 billion by '06, and $2 billion by '09. And I know we're in a terrible budget deficit, and I know that we are in a very difficult time with all the other competing considerations. But I even think with respect to the pressing national security challenges, making a commitment to education for all is the kind of positive statement that the United States needs to be seen making and standing behind right now. And if we did so, we could leverage even more private funds through nongovernmental organizations and private sector organizations. I think there has to be a public-private partnership.

I don't know how many of you saw the wonderful television program about what Oprah Winfrey is doing in Africa. It was a very inspiring and moving story of her personal commitment. There are many Americans who would make a personal commitment to an effort that they thought was coordinated and accountable that would actually result in children going to school. And I believe we can leverage these government resources if we have the right approach and we make it clear that we have accountability and coordination that will assist those who wish, on the private side and the non-profit side, to contribute.

If we do this, then we have to make sure that the countries whom we are working with understand what their obligations are. And some clearly do. They have demonstrated that in the last several years. Others don't, but can be, with the appropriate resources and technical assistance, moved in the right direction. And it's also critical that if we look at education for all, we make a linkage to some of the countries that have failed to provide adequate education and have had that vacuum filled by religious organizations, nationalistic organizations and the like, who in the guise of providing schooling are contributing to instability and violence and terrorism.

The obvious example are the madrassas in Pakistan. When I was in Afghanistan over Thanksgiving, I came out at Islamabad and had a long meeting along with Senator Jack Reed of Rhode Island with President Musharraf. We met, I guess, about midnight on what would be Thanksgiving here. And I pressed him hard on what had been his government's statements regarding primary education as a means of providing an alternative to the madrassas, which are the only alternative for poor families look for any kind of organized schooling for their boys. And he is well aware of the problems that have been caused and seemed very committed to dealing with it, but in the months since the problems of undoing a problem that has been created because a government didn't provide primary education on an ongoing basis is overwhelmingly difficult politically and financially. President Musharraf and Pakistan need help in creating a universal education system that will be not only for girls, but for boys as well. That is just one of the many examples from around the world where it is in our interests, our strategic self-interest, to be the promoter and coordinator of global education for all the children in the world.

Now, I'm hopeful that, as we, you know, launch this effort today and as we look for support that people will understand that this is not only the right thing to do, this is the smart thing to do as well. It is imperative that we provide education that opens up the minds of girls and boys around the world, not subject them either to no education or pseudo-education that closes their minds and focuses their energies on making some kind of statement or even engaging in violence against the outside world as it is defined for them.

Americans are generous and giving, and I think we can make the case for global education. I'm hoping that we can create a means for individual Americans to contribute to a global education fund so that they can match their money to money not just from the United States government, but the other G-8 governments, Oprah Winfrey, foundations, and it can be a real call to action on behalf of the children of the United States and other so-called developed countries to tangibly help children in other places have a chance to educate themselves and have a better future.

So I'm excited by this opportunity. And I thank Gene and Nancy, and many of you as I look at this audience, who have been working on this issue for a very long time, who know far better than I what the challenges are, but also appreciate what the potential for change is. And I am excited because any time Gene Sperling is involved in something, you know that you won't get a lot of sleep, but you'll have a great adventure in trying to reach the goal.

Thank you all very much. (Applause.)

MS. BIRDSALL: The senator has time for some questions. And I want to ask the very first one. That was fantastic. You said everything that I thought I might ask you about.

In particular, though, I want to remind all of us that there is not only the goal of 2015 for universal primary education, but the 2005 goal, which is embedded in those Millennium Development Goals, for gender parity. I have to say that because my co-chair of the U.N. task force, Geeta Rao Gupta, is there. And she would want me to be sure to mention this is urgent, this is an emergency.

So, Senator Clinton, the first question is, how can we as a community help you accomplish what is a tough -- it's a tough agenda you've set out. As Gene said, we need -- what's Colin Powell's point? You know --

MR. : Overwhelming force.

MS. BIRDSALL: -- overwhelming force, how can we help you do that as a community?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think that we need a much better communication strategy to get the information out about the consequences of educating girls and universal education. This report is a summary of so many other studies. We have known this information for a long time.

The best way to stabilize economies, to give democracy a chance to flourish, to provide all of the benefits that we think we need for a safer, more prosperous world in the future is to invest in girls and women, in their education and their health care, and to ensure that they are full participants in their societies and economies. And so I think that for many Americans, that is a message that is very positive and people will resonate with, but they don't know it. And we need to get it out there.

It was really heartwarming to see the reaction that Americans had with respect to Afghanistan when the Taliban was dislodged and women literally took off their burqas. And then through Vital Voices, under Melanne Verveer's leadership and the patronage of Mrs. Bush, we were able to create an opportunity to employ women and help send girls to school by creating little cottage industries of making school uniforms and, you know, begin to try to instill the idea of girls going back to school.

And now, you know, schools are overflowing. Some of them are literally just under trees, they're in tents. There was a backlash, some of those schools were burned, some of the teachers were threatened, some of the families were intimidated, but at least so far, in many parts of Afghanistan, not everywhere, girls are going to school eagerly. And not just little girls. You've got 19- and 20- year-old young women going to their first year of school. And I think Americans get that.

And the more we can educate girls and women, the safer America will be. You know, that's a big leap of faith to say, but I happen to believe it. And so I think that's the first point.

And Nancy, the second point is that I think we need this as part of our strategy in the war on terrorism, to just put it in very blunt terms. You know, we're not doing very well winning the hearts and minds of people around the world. We have managed to alienate just about everybody. Whether one agrees or disagrees with the administration's policies, it has to be said that it would be far better to do it with more support than less, and also if we were standing for other principles and goals in addition to our commitment to the war against terrorism as a military undertaking.

So I think, as I say, it's the right thing to do and it's the smart thing to do. And we have to do a better of making that case to the public and certainly to the Congress.

MS. BIRDSALL: Thank you. Very good.

Q (Off mike.) I just left the (NSE ?), and I also worked for your husband's administration.

I have a two-part question for you. How do you deal with the politics of supporting education abroad at a time when our own schools are in so much trouble? I ask the question because we recently launched a large education initiative in Indonesia when President Bush was there last fall. And we were subjected to substantial criticism from a wide range of groups on the politics of supporting schools abroad when our own schools are in so much trouble.

The second question is in regard to your comments about Pakistan. Of course, we've seen fairly dramatically the problem with their madrassas and what it has led to on a national security basis for us. But, of course, there is significant diversity across the Muslim world, and there are places like Indonesia, where madrassas or such schools are, in fact, a force for good and for moderation. What are your views on us supporting what in essence are religious schools using U.S. money? Thank you.

MS. BIRDSALL: We -- I should have asked people to introduce themselves. You did quasi-introduce --

Q (Off mike.)

MS. BIRDSALL: Thank you, Karen.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you so much, Karen.

As to the first question. You know, I am a strong supporter of education in our own country. And I think that we do have a lot of unfinished business with respect to helping communities with their facility needs. We were doing that at the end of the Clinton administration. That was eliminated under the Bush administration. I thought that was a big mistake. We also don't even fulfill our obligations on federally mandated programs like special education. You know, the federal government's supposed to pay 40 percent of it here in this country; we don't come anywhere near that percentage, imposing tremendous burdens on state and local government, and particularly where there's concentration of impoverished children in many of our big cities and rural areas.

So we have work to do at home. I am absolutely the first to say that. And I think we should be up front about it. And unfortunately, you know, there's a big gap between what the -- this administration said they would do in terms of financial resources for our schools and what they've delivered. So it does put, you know, at least the administration in an awkward position, to be advocating global education or education in Indonesia or Afghanistan, when there are many people in the Congress and out in the states and in school boards who feel like they've been, you know, burdened with all these new mandates under the No Child Left Behind legislation and not given the support they need.

So I acknowledge the problem up front. And I think that it has to be a continuing domestic priority for us to do more to ensure a quality of educational opportunity in our own country. I mean, I represent, you know, a state that had some of the best schools in the world, and schools that you wouldn't send any child you cared about to, because of the paucity of resources, the deteriorating physical facilities. It's outrageous. And we're engaged in a big, you know, political battle inside New York because there's a court case saying you've got to spend more money on the children of New York and Buffalo and Albany, and not just, you know, turn your backs to their legitimate financial needs, because in the United States it is a cultural issue, it is a personal responsibility issue, and yes, it is a resource issue.

And anybody who says, you know, improving education doesn't have anything to do with money is not talking about their own children. So I think that, you know, we should just sort of strip the hypocrisy off of this and, you know, be very blunt about what we need to do here.

Having said that, we are a pretty great and rich country who ought to be able to do two things at once when it comes to education: do a better job for our own children and do more globally; and, if for no other reason, to try to make a world that is going to be safer for the children we love here at home. So I think there's a linkage here, Karen, and it's not easy.

And you know, we still fight the myths that we spend 10 (percent) to 20 percent of the federal budget on foreign aid. I mean, that's a constant, you know, figure that comes in polling. If you open-ended ask people, "How much money do you think we spend on foreign aid?" "Oh, 10 (percent), 15 (percent), 20 percent." "How much do you think we should spend?" "Oh, I don't know, 5 percent." I mean, how many of you would be happy with 5 percent if we ever got to that level, right? (Laughter.)

You know, so I think that we have our work cut out for us, but that doesn't mean we shouldn't try.

Secondly, on religious schools, I am extremely reluctant to provide money for religious schools in the United States or anywhere in the world. And I think it is a -- you know, it is an argument one can make that, in certain places, religious schools are value inculcators, they are, you know, sometimes standing against the tide of fundamentalism, and I acknowledge all of that. But by and large, I think religious schools should not be the recipients of American tax dollars.

And I remember going to Northern Ireland following the -- or in the midst of the process that led to the Good Friday accords and meeting with a large group of students in Belfast. And you know, I didn't know what their answer would be, and I said to them -- I said, well, if there was one thing that could be changed that you believe would help you have a more peaceful future -- because most of them had never been in a room with someone from the opposite religious tradition -- what would it be? To a person they said let us go to school together because, you know, Northern Ireland has Catholic schools and Protestant schools, period. And they just yearned for our comprehensive, you know, public schools that people have to go to and get mixed up in and deal with.

I'm also concerned that it would be difficult to draw lines that made sense. We're going to support madrassas in Indonesia? Well, you know, we've got a really good, you know, mullah here, you know, somewhere outside of Karachi. Don't you think we ought to support him? I mean, I don't know how you would draw the line.

I want to support national programs that create public school systems. And then, just like this country, those who wish to pursue religious or private education can do that on their own. But there has to first be a commitment to a universal public education system that provides a decent at least primary education for both boys and girls.

MS. BIRDSALL: Actually, I think many Americans would agree we could do both if they understood how much light you could put in the eyes of those girls outside Lahore for $20, $30 a year. So I think that's -- that can be part of that.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, that's why, Nancy, I hope -- you know, we're struggling with the legislation -- because my view is, if there were a way to create a kind of, you know, public-private entity that individual Americans could contribute to, you know --

MS. BIRDSALL: With confidence --

SEN. CLINTON: -- with confidence that it was going to end up teaching those girls -- you know, it's like when we used to go collect money for UNICEF, you know, and people had, you know, Halloween trick-or-treat opportunities to go do that. Well, we need something to re-engage American young people in children around the world, some commonality, some sense of identification.

And you're right. I mean, $20, $40, $100 -- it could educate a child for a year.

One last question. Then I, unfortunately, have to leave.

MS. BIRDSALL: Let's go all the way to the back. Right there, on the aisle. Yeah.

Q Senator Clinton, that was fantastic! Just before you led the delegation to Beijing -- oh, my name is Ruth Kagia.

MS. BIRDSALL: Did you remember, Ruth, to introduce -- thank you. (Chuckles.)

Q (Chuckles.) My name is Ruth Kagia. I work with the World Bank.

Just before you led the delegation to Beijing, Senator Clinton, you made a similar address at the World Bank, which in many ways has remained a pillar of our way going forward on girls' education. It was inspiring, it was stimulating, and in many ways it forced us to lift our game on girls' education.

What you've done this morning is similar in some ways, in a more fundamental way, because what you have provided is the bridge that we've been missing on education for all globally. We've been associated with the fast-track initiative, but the best we can do at the bank is to provide the leverage, to provide a framework. But we wait for the governments, both from developing and developed countries, to come forward.

And what you proposed, both in terms of increasing the support from the U.S. as well as in having an internal consistent framework in the country, is exactly what has been lacking in order to lift the game at the international level.

And the timing is perfect, because the U.S. is chairing the fast-track initiative in the context of their chair in the G-8.

So if the challenge you've put on the table were to be taken forward, we then can cross to the next threshold, starting with the 2005 gender goal, but also beginning to create a forum for private sector to come in, which again is the missing link.

So for me is to say that we stand ready to support what has been the missing piece in this game. Thank you.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you so much. And I -- unfortunately, I do have to leave. But I would just add to your assessment that I think we have to be creative in understanding how best to achieve these goals. And the '05 gender goal is a perfect example.

You know, I've thought often, suppose that every American business doing business anywhere in the world took it upon themselves to pay the school fees, in countries that still have school fees, for the boys and girls in their community, or in the region where they worked. It's a pittance for any major American corporation, and it's a life-changing investment for the children. Suppose we did have a sort of request for not only American businesses, but individuals and organizations, institutions of all kinds to just start by paying the school fees for girls, you know? I mean, I just think that we have to do something tangible and achievable within the next year or two to show our commitment. And, you know, where -- there are still many countries which have school fees, I mean, where they're beginning to eliminate them and cut them and try to do without them. But then, of course -- (laughs) -- they don't have any resources, and you end up with 75 eight-year-olds with one teacher and no material. So there are ways of thinking outside the box.

I mean, this legislation I'm proposing is more of a discussion- starter. I mean, I don't expect it to -- I don't expect to see it be signed into law this year, unfortunately. Maybe. You know, who knows?

MS. BIRDSALL: Absolutely!

SEN. CLINTON: Yeah, right. (Laughter.) We'll be very optimistic about that.

MS. BIRDSALL: Two thousand-five is upon us.

SEN. CLINTON: Yes. Well, so is an election. (Laughter.) And maybe, you know -- maybe there is a way to harness that energy and convince people that it's a good thing to do.

But we can't wait for that, either. I mean, we have to do all we can to get the United States government more focused, committed and provide more resources. But we also have to get Americans personally involved. And I think that is one of the ways, to go back to Nancy's original question, that we build momentum for the eventual commitment of resources and leadership that I hope will come from our own government.

So I want to thank Nancy and Gene and all of you for letting me come by and talk with you about this. I look forward to working with you.

They're going to stay because they have a lot more information. And this report, that I commend to you, is filled with very impressive research and statistics that we should be able to make the case with, Gene, if we can just get in front of enough audiences and if you will help us do that.

Thank you very much. (Applause.)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON IRAQ AND AFGHANISTAN OPERATIONS, 4/20/2004

CLINTON: Well, I agree with the chairman and Senator Bayh. I think that this is a serious issue, because it's not only the possibility that the definition will take on a life of its own, causing all kinds of unintended consequences, but that in fact the earlier questions that the chairman raised about the rules of engagement for our military and the authority that they have following this period of sovereignty, however one defines it, I think are going to be very sticky.

And then you throw into the mix all these private contractors running around, heavily armed, I think it becomes even more of a challenge.

So I believe, Mr. Secretary, you've gotten, at least from some of us, a concern about what this means, how it's going to be operationalized. And I just have one suggestion that would be to look for some tangible way to demonstrate the benefits that flow from this interim period to individual Iraqis.

You said in passing that one of the concerns we have to address is the efforts to undermine our legitimacy and our role in Iraq by not only making up stories about actions that never occurred under our military control, but also this whole idea we're there to steal the oil.

When I was in Iraq, I spoke with Ambassador Bremer. I've raised this in other settings. I really urge the administration to look at ways that we could demonstrate clearly that the results from increased production of oil in Iraq are going to benefit individual Iraqis.

I'm not an expert on this, but back in the days when we opened the North Slope in Alaska for oil exploration, the state of Alaska, in conjunction with, I think the federal government, created a trust fund for the Alaskans. Literally, checks were sent out to Alaskans, saying: This is your land. It's being exploited. This oil is going all over the world, but you are given a stake in this future.

And when I raised this with Ambassador Bremer, I said: You know, trust is in short supply as we know. Consent and trust are essential ingredients for success in this undertaking. We need to do something and we need to be in the process of doing it before sovereignty, however it's defined, takes over and all kinds of deals are cut. Because I'm deeply concerned about those in the governing council and those who might be on any expanded transitional entity, who seem to be making out quite well. And that will further undermine legitimacy.

So I raise it again. I hope that something, if not that, can be looked at as a means of demonstrating both our commitment to the Iraq people in a tangible financial way, and also removing some of the sting of this idea that we're there to steal the oil.

General Myers, as you may recall, during several hearings before this committee, I raised the subject of medical tracking and surveillance of our troops.

CLINTON: Both on February 13th and on February 25th, I asked what efforts were being taken regarding medical tracking and surveillance and follow-up care. I also requested and received a briefing from the Department of Defense on the proposed medical tracking plan for troops being deployed to Iraq.

I came at this issue in large measure because of my concerns about the problems that many of our veterans had after the first Gulf War, when they returned home and had a syndrome of undiagnosed illnesses which at first were, you know, frankly, dismissed, chalked up to all kinds of personal stress-related issues and then only gradually taken seriously. And then finally, we were able to secure veteran's benefits for a lot of those troops.

Now, I raise this today because of the troubling treatment of members of 442nd Army National Guard MP unit out of Orangeburg, New York. My staff and I have met with members of this unit, and they have a very disturbing story to tell.

Specifically, 12 of them were medivac'ed out of Iraq for various injuries, fractured feet, problems with Humvees rolling over, all kinds of action-related injuries, but they were also suffering similar symptoms to those that we heard out of the first Gulf War, dizziness, headaches, sleeplessness, cramps, blood in their urine, blood in their stool.

Yet when they went to the Army to ask for testing, they were given the runaround. And they became concerned about possible exposure to radiation because of information they were given by Dutch personnel who were stationed near them during their time in Iraq.

Based on some tests that the Dutch medical personnel did of the place they were assigned to be, including using radioactive detectors and other devices to test the environmental exposures, the Dutch said they were leaving. They would not stay there. And they moved their troops to another location.

Several of the members of the 442nd who were medics were in ongoing discussions with the Dutch who were telling them, you should move too. There's all kinds of problems here. There were bombed out Bradley Fighting Vehicles and other equipment that had been dragged and dumped there after the military actions, and other kinds of issues that at least in the minds of the Dutch, as it's been reported to us, caused them to act.

So when these men returned home and kept trying to get somebody to talk to them and were not given much of an answer, they went to a New York newspaper. They went to the New York Daily News with their concerns. And that newspaper paid for testing. And their blood was tested, being sent to Germany which had some advanced equipment. The results came back saying that several of them had elevated levels of radiation exposure.

And they attributed it to exposure to depleted uranium. Whether or not that is the causation, I'm not here to suggest.

But my bottom line is that I think our troops deserve better. I've already requested another briefing on medical tracking, especially with respect to radiation exposure, which we hope to schedule soon. But I think this raises a red flag for me, because I had hoped that we wouldn't make the mistakes we made before.

I now have, on further investigation, have learned that we have hundreds of troops sitting at Fort Dix who have ongoing medical complaints and ailments.

CLINTON: And they're basically being given two choices: sit there -- some have been sitting there for months, Mr. Chairman -- sit there and wait to be given an appointment at Walter Reed, or appointment at some place else or go ahead and sign this document and leave the military and don't worry about it.

Some leave. But others are saying, "Wait a minute, I want to find out what's wrong with me. I'm not going to leave, I want treatment."

So, General, again, I would ask that you take whatever action is necessary and, Mr. Secretary, as well on the civilian side, to ensure that, first, these members of 442nd get whatever testing is appropriate and necessary, that we take a hard look at these radiation exposure numbers back, that we use the more advanced testing techniques that are available in Germany and Japan, but which our military are not currently using -- the tests that we are using for exposure to uranium or radiation is not as specific as the tests that are being done in Europe and Japan -- and that we try to make sure that the plans for medical surveillance tracking and treatment that I was told about are actually implemented.

And specifically, I would appreciate a report about what is happening at Fort Dix. And I don't know, but I am concerned by the stories.

We had a lot of anecdotes today about how great everybody is feeling about their mission. And I'm glad to hear those anecdotes, but I'm increasingly hearing a lot of anecdotes about how poorly people are being treated when they return home.

So, General, I would like a very specific report, as soon as possible, on the 442nd, on conditions at Fort Dix, what the Army and the rest of the services intend to do about radiation exposure, other kinds of environmental problems that may be contributing to some of these symptoms.

MYERS: Thank you, Senator Clinton. And you're absolutely right. We've got to do a first-class job of taking care of our troops.

And we'll look into the Fort Dix situation. I haven't -- don't believe I've seen those reports, but we'll look into that. That's very important.

In terms of the 442nd, my understanding is we have tested some of their members through urine samples, which is the way, I guess you detect things like depleted uranium and so forth.

We have not found anything. I'll look at the differences between European testing, Japanese testing, our testing. But you're right, we need to monitor and make sure we don't overlook things that could cause them problems later on. And that's a very important part of our responsibility.

MYERS: So I'll get you those two reports.

CLINTON: Well, I would look forward to that and a continuing effort to keep me informed about what we're doing on this medical testing and surveillance.

I don't want to go through what we went through after the first Gulf War.

And finally, Mr. Chairman, if I could. I appreciated Secretary Wolfowitz's response to Senator Cornyn about the many tactics that we should employ with respect to the war on terrorism. And I especially appreciated what he said about education.

I spoke this morning to the Council on Foreign Relations and urged that we place universal education on a much higher priority than we have heretofore. And I will be introducing legislation to try to better position our own country to do just what needs to be done with respect to education.

I share your concern about the madrassas. I spoke with President Musharraf when I was in Islamabad, and I feel strongly that we need a system that can leverage public support and private support. And I also obviously am concerned about investing in girls' education, because it is still the smartest, best investment with respect to promoting democracy and stability. And girls still face enormous obstacles.

So I would welcome the support of the administration in my education-for-all legislation. I would welcome the support of members of this committee on both sides of the aisle. Even if we could not be immediately successful this year, it would send the kind of statement that frankly, I think, we are in some need of sending to the rest of the world, that we are, you know, not only pursuing military action, not only recognizing the need for intelligence and law enforcement, but that education and health are critical components in our leadership in the war against terrorism and on behalf of freedom.

WOLFOWITZ: Senator Clinton, I agree with you. I think women are one of the most important forces for progress in moderation in the Muslim world for fairly obvious reasons. And actually, in Iraq, they are a substantial majority because of the unfortunate killing that took place over the last couple of decades. They're critical allies.

WARNER: Senator Clinton, I'd like very much to work with you on that issue of education. I share that.

CLINTON: Thank you.

"Wolf Blitz Reports," CNN, 5/4/2004

With powerful Senators now calling for hearings on the abuse of some Iraqi prisoners, we'll talk with members of the committee that would hold those hearings, including Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. That's coming up next.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), ARMED SERVICES CMTE.: Leadership has to be responsible and held accountable and that is not just in the prison in Baghdad. That goes all the way up the chain of command.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Also ahead...

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

HAMILL: Glad to be back to an American installation.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Former hostage Thomas Hamill makes his first public statement since escaping his Iraqi captors. His story is coming up.

And, a Saudi Prince says he knows who's behind recent terror attacks in his kingdom. He says it's not necessarily al Qaeda but Zionists. You'll hear his accusation. That's coming up as well.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Why is Congress so upset over the Iraqi prisoner abuse scandal? We'll speak with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton about the bipartisan call for hearings when we continue in 90 seconds.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN (R), ARIZONA: There are so many allegations whirling around this situation that we must have a public hearing with the secretary of defense testifying in order to clear up all of these allegations.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: There is clearly outrage in the U.S. Congress over the images of abuse in Iraq and some U.S. lawmakers are upset with what they say is the slow response by both the Pentagon and the Bush administration.

Just a short while ago, I spoke with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of the Armed Services Committee.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Senator Clinton thanks very much for joining us. I know you're a member of the Armed Services Committee. How surprised were you and your colleagues by word of this prisoner abuse at the Abu Ghraib Prison in Iraq?

CLINTON: We were shocked, Wolf. There had been no notice to anyone on the committee, no briefing, not even an inkling and we've had a number of meetings with Secretary Rumsfeld, Secretary Wolfowitz, other civilian leaders from the Pentagon, as well as military.

And not a person gave us any indication that there was this ongoing problem that there had been a study commissioned and that the study had been completed and that the Pentagon knew the results of the study until the article by Seymour Hirsch was published.

BLITZER: Is it your opinion that people at the highest levels of the Pentagon, the U.S. military knew about this or they were kept in the dark themselves?

CLINTON: Well, that's one of the questions we have to answer. That's why we are demanding public hearings with Secretary Rumsfeld as soon as possible. Unfortunately, the information forthcoming so far has been totally insufficient. They have had a lot of contradictory answers to questions.

There's the story of General Myers calling CBS and talking to Dan Rather and asking that they not go forward with their own report about prison abuse. There's other indications that some people knew, other people didn't. Some people had vague ideas. They hadn't seen the report.

It doesn't matter. I mean the bottom line is that leadership has to be responsible and held accountable and that is not just in the prison in Baghdad. That goes all the way up the chain of command.

BLITZER: You met with top officials from the Pentagon, from the U.S. Army, earlier today, the Senate Armed Services Committee. Did they give you some good explanation of what happened?

CLINTON: Well, of course, that was a closed door hearing, so I'm not at liberty to talk about it, which is why we must have a public hearing as soon as possible and a number of my colleagues left that hearing and demanded that we move forward, that Secretary Rumsfeld appear in public and certainly Chairman Warner and Ranking Member Levin had made it very clear that they intend to hold that hearing as soon as possible.

BLITZER: Are you getting any sense that steps are being taken now in Iraq at prisons, in Afghanistan, at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba to try to do something about this situation?

CLINTON: Well, we've been given assurances that steps are being taken but, again, we need the facts. We need to know the results of the investigation. And, you know Wolf, this is not only a horrible series of events and terrible dereliction of duty and responsibility among some of our military but it also puts all of our soldiers and Marines at risk.

This is not just about doing the right thing on behalf of Iraqi prisoners and righting the wrongs that have been inflicted on them and sending a very clear message to the Iraqi people and to the world that this is an aberration, that this is not the way the United States military is expected to behave and certainly it was a small minority.

But this raises very difficult questions about the future safety of our own soldiers and Marines and it also calls into even higher relief the ongoing concerns many of us have about these private contractors. We can't even get a straight story as to who was in charge.

Were they civilians within the military? Were they civilians outside the military? Was it the military chain of command? This illustrates that there are many, many unanswered questions about the use of private contractors and the apparently confusing and unclear chain of command at work but my...

BLITZER: Let me press you on one point. How specifically does it endanger U.S. military personnel?

CLINTON: Well, from my perspective any time you have a public display like we've now seen not just on our own television stations, such as yours, but literally around the world that undermines the ability of all of our troops to do the job that they are intending to do.

And, you know, I want to make it absolutely clear that we will get to the bottom of this. We will conduct a thorough, public investigation. All people who are in any way responsible will be held accountable and that the vast majority of our young men and women who are serving, whether it's active duty, Guard, or Reserve, are living up to the expectations that we all have for them.

So, I don't want their reputation or their safety undermined by those who might be inflamed who previously weren't because of this incident to join the insurgency, to perhaps take out, you know, personal revenge against any individual American, military or civilian. This is criminal conduct. This is absolutely unacceptable and we will get to the bottom of it.

BLITZER: Senator Clinton, but as you know in wartime, there are proven, there are used methods of interrogation including hooding, putting hoods over the heads of prisoners, prisoner sleep deprivation, food deprivation, humiliation. These have been used for as long as prisoners in wars have been interrogated. Should the U.S. rethink those methods?

CLINTON: Well, first of all, Wolf, there is the Geneva Convention about the treatment of prisoners of war and there is protocol that certainly members of the Intelligence Committee and others have been briefed on as to what is expected with respect to interrogations carried out in the name of the United States.

I don't care whether it's military or civilian. Anyone acting on behalf of our government is supposed to abide by certain rules and regulations. Clearly, there are interrogation methods that are deemed appropriate but what we have seen on our television screens in no way can be considered appropriate or necessary or frankly even effective.

So, I think that there are rules that every soldier is supposed to be briefed on. Obviously, those who are in some role of responsibility with respect to interrogation are expected to know even more about what the lines are and where they can and cannot cross. What we've seen in the last several days and what's been reported in the press is absolutely unacceptable as interrogation techniques in time of war.

BLITZER: Senator Clinton thanks very much for joining us.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Wolf.

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D-NY) DELIVERS REMARKS AT ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE NATIONAL LEADERSHIP CONFERENCE, 5/4/2004

CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you very much, Chris. That was such a warm, wonderful introduction, I don't think I should say anything; I think it should speak for itself. But I thank you for those kind words.

And I'm delighted to be here with you this morning. I'm only sorry that I missed Crystal's speech, because, as Chris said, I am so impressed by and supportive of A World of Difference and Team Harmony, and I'm delighted that Crystal could be here, especially from New York, to address you this morning.

I am so impressed with ADL because its mission has been so clear and consistent over so many years. And Abe Foxman has been a voice against not just anti-Semitism, but discrimination and hate crimes and bias and destruction of the human spirit for so many years. And it's a great pleasure to work with Abe and to support him and his many efforts.

And he couldn't do it without a board like this and supporters and contributors like all of you, because it's really a commitment to an ongoing effort against hatred and discrimination and ignorance wherever we see them.

And fulfilling this mission of promoting tolerance and religious freedom and respect for human dignity has never been more important. You know, there have been many, many incidents that disturb us with respect to anti-Semitism in Europe and the Middle East, here at home, that deserve our close attention and our condemnation.

But it is clear to me that we are facing a very difficult, challenging time for a period of years that none of us necessarily can predict, but all of us must be prepared to endure.

And the work that you're doing is timely as it always is, but it's especially important in today's new environment.

With respect to anti-Semitism, I am not someone who can tell any of you what it feels like, what it means, how distorting of the human spirit it truly is.

CLINTON: But I do know that it remains one of the cancers of humanity that has to be rooted out with not only organized efforts, such as ADL, such as the Berlin statement, but every day, every single day by every individual of good faith and respect for human dignity.

Sometimes anti-Semitism is stoked by leaders who use it for their own purposes, and sometimes it is just a manifestation of the hatred and ignorance that ADL combats every single day.

Whatever the source, wherever it's found, people of all religions, races and ethnic origins have to speak against it, because we know so well it is at root not just anti-Semitism aimed at Jews, aimed at Israel, but it is a manifestation of a deeper and much more virulent form of potential violence against human beings. It's not just words; it leads to actions.

I'm very pleased that I was asked to take on the lead on a stand-alone resolution for the Democrats in the United Nations General Assembly condemning anti-Semitism. This resolution would help create a broader public commitment and raise greater public awareness, and it would give the chance to leaders to publicly condemn such hatred and to begin to take action individually and collectively against it.

I also plan to introduce a bipartisan resolution in the United States Senate condemning anti-Semitism and those who perpetuate it.

CLINTON: It may seem, as some have said, more symbolic than anything else -- and that's true, it is a symbol, it is a resolution -- but I think we have to do more of this to symbolically and practically point out the growing anti-Semitism that we see in our own country and elsewhere.

We need to shine a very bright light on it. We need to pull it into the daylight out of the darkness so that everyone can see it for what it is.

I continue my work to try to ensure that textbooks and official publications, such as national newspapers, are held accountable for anti-Semitism, for hate speech; particularly in the Palestinian textbooks, it has been an ongoing incitement that they've continued their anti-Israeli, anti-Semitic teachings. And I have spoken out against that incitement and I think it's imperative that we continue to do so.

I recently held a hearing with Senator Specter where we played some of the video of Palestinian television that seemed to both highlight and glorify suicide martyrdom and brought that into a Senate hearing room so that people could see the perversion of childhood and the destruction of innocent life through the manipulation, again, of symbols that deeply offend any fair-thinking person of conscience.

I think it's also clear that we face some very difficult challenges here at home. And while we stand against anti-Semitism, while we stand against the continuing terror and violence against Israelis, we also have to be clear that we stand against the horrible pictures coming out of the prisons in Baghdad; that we are rejecting any kind of mistreatment or stripping of human dignity by anyone, including our fellow Americans.

CLINTON: And if we have a consistent message -- which ADL has always had, which is why I respect what you do so much -- that consistent message must be we are against hatred, violence, propaganda, bias, mistreatment, anywhere, anytime.

ADL, obviously because of your history and your incredible level of deep commitment, stands first and foremost as the sentinel against anti-Semitism, but I know from my own experience before the White House years and during, and certainly in the Senate, ADL often is on the front lines when bias and hate crimes anywhere are occurring.

We need to remain vigilant with respect to that possible breach of human rights and human dignity by our own country as well, because it is imperative that the United States continue to be the model of respect for human rights and dignity.

We have a long road ahead of us to defeat those who value death over life, who are nihilistic. And we cannot let them gain any allies anywhere. We cannot let them convince anyone that their way is preferable to what we know is the not just way of freedom and democracy, but the way of humanity and a better future.

With respect to the ongoing efforts to undermine Israel's standing in the world community, most recently by the General Assembly vote to take the issue of the fence to the World Court, I and my colleagues have raised the very strong argument against that, making the case which I think is so obvious to be made that this is an effort by Israel to avoid violence, not to provoke violence.

(APPLAUSE)

You know, what is it Robert Frost who said fences make good neighbors? That the effort to prevent the ongoing violence, such as the murder of the pregnant woman and her children over the weekend, has to be the highest obligation of any government.

CLINTON: I tell people who disagree with the letter that I sent, along with Senators Hatch, Schumer and Smith, to the World Court and to the secretary general of the United Nations protesting the International Court of Justice's decision to hear this case; I ask them what would we do if we have constant incursions from Canada or Mexico, that people were coming over our border on a daily, weekly basis and killing innocent civilians? What would we do?

Well, we would obviously take action, and I think that is the right of self-defense and the responsibility of any government to do.

(APPLAUSE)

Now, let me just close because I mentioned as I came in that the Armed Services Committee, on which I do now serve, is holding a closed-door hearing about the issues in the prisons in Baghdad that I have to, sort of, accelerate my schedule to get to this morning.

So let me just close and then maybe one or two questions if we have time, if that's OK, by thanking you, by encouraging you to not only lobby today, but to make sure your voices are heard every day, because this is a period of time when we need strong voices against hatred and violence, and voices of conscience and morality. Because we are, yes, in a war against terrorism, but we're also in a war for the future, and I cannot stress that enough.

This is a war for the kind of future that we will have for our children, and I hope someday grandchildren, in my case...

(LAUGHTER)

... here at home and the kind of future that we will have in the world. And we therefore, more than ever, need the strong voice and the strong agenda that ADL has represented and championed for so many years.

Thank you very much.

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: It appeared to many of us in the late 1990s that you were sympathetic to the Palestinian cause. I'm curious, is this something that you've changed your mind on? And if so, what has affected that?

CLINTON: Well, what I said in the late 1990s is that I thought there had to be a Palestinian state at some future date in order for there to be any resolution of the ongoing terrible violence and insecurity that afflicted the region and that caused such hardship and harm to the Israelis.

I think that is now a position adopted by everybody, including this administration. How one gets there and how it is structured is, obviously, off the table right now because you cannot have any kind of negotiations or any process until and unless the Palestinians have leadership that will not only end the violence and control those who are intent upon violence, but willing to deal with the Israeli government and people in good faith.

(APPLAUSE)

QUESTION: As you know, ADL is a civil rights organization and we are vitally concerned about the balance between, on the one hand, the need for security and, on the other hand, the need for the preservation of civil rights. Could you talk a little bit about your concerns about the Patriot Act and how you see that evolving?

CLINTON: I think that's a very important question and I'm glad you raised it, and I'm glad that ADL is looking into this.

It is a new kind of balancing act for us; that's obvious. And I voted for the Patriot Act originally because it included a number of changes that had to be made.

Just one quick example: It was very difficult under pre-Patriot Act law to deal with the surveillance of cell phones. You know, the laws really focused on hard lines.

CLINTON: You know, you got a warrant, you pinpointed a telephone in a place, and we know that technology had outpaced those laws basically from the '60s and they had to be changed.

There were some -- I had some concerns about some of the other provisions, but on balance I thought it was appropriate to support the Patriot Act because it was sunsetted. You know, I did not agree to support it until it had a sunset, because in the wake of 9/11 we had no idea what was going to happen next. And as a senator from New York, I may have taken the challenges we faced even more personally, so my perspective was, "Let's try to get what we need, like the surveillance changes. I'm a little bit worried about some of these other provisions, but let's be honest about evaluating them when it comes up for reauthorization," which is where we are as of next year.

That's what I think we need to be engaged in. We need an honest evaluation. We don't need demagoguery on either side of this issue. We don't need people who are trying to scare everybody to death and we don't need people who act as though we're in the same environment we were in the past. You know, that is not useful.

We need a thoughtful public debate where we carefully look at what provisions are working, which provisions are not, and then we try to balance the necessary contradiction between security and liberty.

You know, our founders really got it right that we have to always try to balance the scales, if necessary, a little bit more in the liberty direction than the security direction. How we do that in a 21st century environment with all of these new threats is what I'm interested in. I'm not interested in anybody in the administration going around basically having cheerleading camps about the Patriot Act, and I'm not interested in people who act as though we're still living in the days of Al Capone and that's how we should go about our surveillance and law enforcement.

So this is going to be a debate where ADL's voice could be very important in helping us to weigh and balance correctly these scales that we are going to be confronted with.

I don't know that we will get to this debate before the election, which actually is probably just as well, because it doesn't expire until next year.

CLINTON: But I think even those of us who are absolutely committed, as I am, to doing everything I can to make sure that we are as well-equipped and well-resourced and as vigilant as possible in the war on terror, are concerned about some of the extensive interpretation under the Patriot Act and some of the decisions made by the administration which I think are hard to justify.

But that's what we should have a debate for. You know, I've said several times in the last three and a half years that I worry that there are those in Washington now who want to turn Washington into an evidence-free zone, that facts don't matter, evidence doesn't matter, all that matters is ideology and passion.

That is not the way we became a great country. We became a great country by...

(APPLAUSE)

... reason and thinking.

So I will look to ADL as one of those groups that I think can help us get that right balance. And I appreciate your question and I appreciate your commitment.

I think since there are so many on the right and so many on the left who are worried about the Patriot Act, that's a good sign, and we ought to be able to figure out how to end up in that mushy middle, you know, that center ground that basically has marked the best place for America to stand over the length of our very long history.

So let me thank you. And I'm sorry I have to run off to finish all my other obligations before I go to this hearing, but I really think I need to be there when we hold this closed-door hearing and hear from our civilian and military leadership.

But again thank you so much for what you do every single day.

(APPLAUSE)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON TREATMENT OF IRAQI PRISONERS, 5/7/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

CLINTON: I think, Mr. Secretary, that you can discern from the questions that there are still many issues that we need further clarification on. I particularly look forward to the answer that you will provide to Senator Reed's last question -- following up on his line of questioning concerning the enabling of interrogation by M.P.s, something which, based on Army regulations, was not to be either done or condoned.

But, Mr. Secretary, in January 2002, when you publicly declared that hundreds of people detained by U.S. and allied forces in Afghanistan do not have any rights under the Geneva Convention, that was taken as a signal.

And it is clear in looking through the number of investigations that are currently ongoing, that it wasn't just this particular battalion but others that did not receive appropriate training and information about their responsibilities with respect to detention or the Geneva Convention.

The atrocities that have been depicted in photographs were very graphically, verbally, described in the Taguba report. It doesn't take a lot of imagination to read those descriptions and have one's stomach just turn in disgust.

The focus on the pictures being released is, with all due respect, missing the point. The report was well known, and apparently discussed on numerous occasions. And obviously, the release of the pictures to the entire world was devastating.

But the underlying conduct, and the failure of the command, both at the site and further up the chain, to act with the appropriate quick response, is really at the heart of what the most serious problems we face here today are.

CLINTON: The information in the Taguba report links the atrocities at Abu Ghraib to Camp Buka. In fact, some of the same people, some of the same command, some of the same M.P.s were involved apparently.

And with respect to the recommendations at the end of General Taguba's report, they call for establishing the conditions with the resources and personnel required to prevent future occurrences of detainee abuse.

I would appreciate, since we don't have time in this round of questioning, to receive for the committee a report about exactly how that is being handled. What changes have been made? Are the Geneva Convention training going on now? Are the appropriate rules being posted in both English and Arabic?

And certainly an explanation as to the adequacy of the punishment that was meted out because, with respect to who was being punished for what, there is a clear distinction -- at least as reported by General Taguba -- between enlisted personnel and those up the command.

But I'm also concerned by a related matter. And let me just quickly reference the case of Chaplain Yee, the Muslim Army chaplain from Guantanamo Bay who was arrested and placed in solitary confinement. Ultimately all of the charges were dropped after his reputation was sullied.

CLINTON: It's obvious that the information about this particular case came from government sources. It was pushed out and it was widely disseminated.

So, Mr. Secretary, how is it that a case with no basis in fact gets such widespread publicity, based on information from government sources, while egregious conduct like that at the Abu Ghraib prison is cloaked in a classified report, and is only made available when the investigation is leaked to the press?

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON IRAQI PRISONER ABUSE, MORNING SESSION, 5/11/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I want to join in thanking you, General Taguba, for your service and for this report.

You know, I don't think anyone disagrees with the last comment by my colleague that our objective is to prosecute this war on terrorism successfully and also to ensure the safety and security of our own people from future attacks. The question is whether behavior and conduct and decisions with respect to the treatment of these detainees undermines the potential success that we all agree is essential to our national security.

I am still confused, and my confusion is this: With respect to the actions that are described in your report, General Taguba, you also included a number of other problems at other detention facilities. But is it your best information that no detention facility that was in any way connected with the 800th M.P. Brigade had the level of problems that you reported in this unit at Abu Ghraib?

TAGUBA: Yes, ma'am. The scope again was within the context of those facilities that the 800th M.P. operated.

CLINTON: And the 800th M.P. Brigade was under the command of General Karpinski. Is that correct?

TAGUBA: Yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: Now, if the problems were severe and located principally in this one unit, then I think it is appropriate to follow the chain of command up to the decision to send General Miller to that prison where, as I understand the testimony thus far, he set up a specific joint interrogation unit. He did, however one wants to describe it, either coordinate or direct the M.P.s' involvement in the conditioning of the detainees.

CLINTON: Is that a correct statement, General?

TAGUBA: Yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: All right.

So it seems to me that if, indeed, General Miller was sent from Guantanamo to Iraq for the purpose of acquiring more actionable intelligence from detainees, then it is fair to conclude that the actions that are at point here in your report are in some way connected to General Miller's arrival and his specific orders, however they were interpreted, by those M.P.s and the military intelligence that were involved.

And, therefore, I for one don't believe I yet have adequate information from Mr. Cambone and the Defense Department as to exactly what General Miller's orders were, what kind of reports came back up the chain of command as to how he carried out those orders, and the connection between his arrival in the fall of '03 and the intensity of the abuses that occurred afterward.

Now, we know that General Karpinski has been rightly singled out for appropriate concern about her behavior and her failure of command.

But I just want to read to you a comment she made in an interview which I find extraordinary, and I quote, "But when I looked at those pictures and when I continued to see those pictures, I don't think that there was anything that was improperly done because this wasn't something that was a violation of a procedure. This was something they were instructed to do as a completely new procedure. I'm not sure that those M.P.s had ever been confronted with any instructions like this before."

CLINTON: General Taguba, can you explain for us the disparity between holding this brigade commander completely accountable and the comments that I just read to you in light of the fact that certainly the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade was given tactical control over that prison? Can you explain General Karpinski's comment?

TAGUBA: Yes, ma'am.

During the course of our investigation, there was clear evidence based on my interview of General Karpinski and Colonel Pappas that there was friction between those two commanders in the operation of Abu Ghraib.

The distinction was that who was in charge of when and at what time. They could not explain, so that's the context of the ambiguity of the order that was given to Colonel Pappas. It was clear that he was directed to be the forward operating base commander there for security detainees and force protection. However, General Karpinski challenged that and she noted that in her recorded testimony, point one.

I held her accountable and responsible, not exclusively and solely for the abuse cases there at Abu Ghraib, but the context of her leadership, the lack of leadership on her part overall in terms of her training, the standards, supervisory omission, the command climate in her brigade.

TAGUBA: Those are all in totality why I held her accountable and responsible now.

CLINTON: And just one last follow up, General. Did Colonel Pappas report directly to General Miller?

TAGUBA: That I did not know because General Miller was not there. He reported, I believe, to CJTF-7.

CLINTON: General Smith, do you know who Colonel Pappas reported directly to?

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON IRAQI PRISONER ABUSE, AFTERNOON SESSION, 5/11/2004

CLINTON: Well, I thank my friend and colleague. I don't think that's the right order, but I won't argue about it.

Mr. Chairman, I first want to thank you for your leadership of this committee. The last two days have been extremely challenging. And in every way, you have given tremendous leadership.

And of course I thank our ranking member, who's been by your side the whole time. This is not anything any of us would wish on our Army or on our Senate or on anyone in any administration. But it comes to us to try to deal with this and to understand it as best we can.

And I thank each of you for the time you've spent with us this afternoon.

WARNER: Well, I thank you, Senator. To the extent that Senator Levin and I have given this particular series of hearings leadership has been highly dependent on the total cooperation of every single member. We've had 100 percent attendance of our committee for two days.

CLINTON: Gentlemen, I am still trying to understand exactly what some of the testimony we've already heard actually means.

When General Sanchez, on November 19th, 2003, issued what has been referred to as a fragmentary order, effectively placing Abu Ghraib under tactical control of the 205th Military Intelligence Brigade, is that the only instance in which General Sanchez placed any other facility under military intelligence command?

ALEXANDER: Yes, ma'am, because I think that's the only place where there is an intel unit of that capability under him. So that's the only place. There is only one. It is the 205th.

CLINTON: When you say intel unit, you're talking about the 205th, right?

ALEXANDER: In my brigade, yes, ma'am.

CLINTON: "In my brigade." And they were solely assigned to Abu Ghraib?

ALEXANDER: No, they were not solely assigned. They were subordinate to General Sanchez as the theater -- the corps-level brigade that they have for the theater of Iraq.

Their headquarters was about 20 miles south of Abu Ghraib. And he was the closest senior tactical leader that General Sanchez had to go in and fix what he saw as severe force protection issues at Abu Ghraib.

And, ma'am, I would have done the same. I think the force protection issues that he had, the fixing of the facility for both our soldiers and the detainee were things that he saw were languishing.

CLINTON: General Alexander, may I just clarify that for my own understanding?

When Secretary Cambone testified this morning, he said that the 205th Military Intelligence under Colonel Pappas, as I recall, was given control of the facility but not of the M.P.s. That struck me as a distinction without any meaning.

Was Colonel Pappas put in charge of the facility under General Sanchez's order?

ALEXANDER: As I understand it -- and this is one that I said early on we need to take for the record to get General Sanchez's language on here exact. As I understand it in my discussions with General Sanchez is that what Colonel Pappas was put in charge of was this facility of Abu Ghraib, which had the prison. It had the living area for the soldiers. It had the feeding area. It had the perimeter security. It had the M.P. detention area. It had an Iraqi criminal area. It had a joint intel and debriefing center.

And so this whole base, very much like Fort Drum but smaller, this base, the garrison commander -- and that's the distinguish that I think Dr. Cambone tried to make. The one responsible for fixing the garrison of Abu Ghraib was removed from the M.P. to the M.I. battalion commander.

I do not believe that it was General Sanchez's intent to take the security detainee of those other detainees and say to Colonel Pappas you also tell the M.P.s how to do detainee operations. I believe that was not -- in his comments to me said that.

But we need to get his statement for you on that because I think he was the -- he was the commander on the ground that made that decision.

CLINTON: That would be very helpful. Also, as I am piecing together the chronology, the order by General Sanchez apparently flowed from a set of recommendations from General Miller. Is that correct?

ALEXANDER: No, ma'am, it did not. Although your chronology is correct in terms of General Miller was their in August 31st to roughly 9 September. There were a series of incidents of force protection. And I think it's important to note that Abu Ghraib was totally almost demolished in many areas before the 1st of August so the engineers had to go in and build it.

That part of building it up is some of the stuff was General Miller got to there.

ALEXANDER: The actual compound for detaining these folks was at what was called Old Camp Cropper -- the old Camp Cropper area. And then that was moved -- those folks were moved as they opened this up from the mid-August to mid-September time period up to Abu Ghraib which became the theater holding and became the joint intel and debriefing center.

When General Miller went there, the concerns that he had, as General Burgess brought out, was intel fusion, synchronization, the flow of information and how you worked together as a team to accomplish the mission.

Nowhere in my military experience have I ever seen it where an intel person goes down and tells a M.P. that we soften the units up and that's good behavior. That is totally wrong. We ought to find out if anyone did say that, hold them accountable.

Now, in October there were a series of International Community of the Red Cross visits throughout Iraq. And two times, they visited Abu Ghraib. And it was those statements that came out in that document that you've seen that was given to General Karpinski in a draft form for her to respond on the 24th of December. So that was 6 November.

And so as you look at the sequence of events, there were a series of mortar attacks and persons injured that went on through early November that I think led General Sanchez to say I have a responsibility to protect my forces. You're not moving out fast enough. Colonel Pappas, I want you to move your unit up there and take charge there for that force protection mission and for getting these initiatives, the quality of living for those soldiers fixed.

And ma'am, you're familiar with that quality of living because it's the same thing we would say for our soldiers at Fort Drum. If we put them in -- the didn't have heat up there, being promoted was in New York state, if you don't give them heat and they are living in barracks without heat and the garrison commander went two months without having heat, he'd be out of there and you'd put a new one in charge.

And I think that's what General Sanchez did. And I think that was clearly -- I think it is being read into the events that General Miller said these nefarious things that causes this to happen. Ma'am, I do not see that and I do not believe that is correct.

CLINTON: Thank you.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 5/19/2004

KING: Welcome back to LARRY KING LIVE. We now turn our attention to the two high elected representatives, the two Senators from the state of New York, the senior senator, Charles Schumer and the junior senator, Hillary Rodham Clinton. They are both Democrats.

Senator Schumer, what's your follow-up to what we just heard tonight from Governor Ridge and Mayor Giuliani, and the whole hearing this morning?

SEN. CHARLES SCHUMER, (D) NEW YORK: Well, the bottom line is I think the commission's doing a very good job. They're getting to the bottom of this. And we have to learn what went wrong, not to point fingers of blame, but rather to figure it out in the future and make it much less likely to happen.

Both Kean and Hamilton, particularly, are leaders. I know them both well. They're nonpartisan. They're not interested in being nasty or finger-pointing or political. They just want the truth so we can move forward. So, overall, I give the commission very high marks.

KING: Senator Clinton, what did you make of the emotional reaction of some of the people in the audience there this morning?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, (D) NEW YORK: Oh Larry, I think we all understand the emotion. Chuck and I have been together on this so many times meeting with so many people who lost loved ones, who were injured. And there's a lot of grief and anger and distress, which is totally understandable.

I think the commission has taken exactly the right tone. They're going at this, not only in a nonpartisan independent way, but in a very calm way, that I think builds a lot of confidence. So that when they come out with their report, they will be able to give us some insight into what happened. But I hope, even more than that, they can give us some suggestions from their investigation, about what we all should be doing to get better prepared for the future.

KING: Senator Schumer, do you agree with both Ridge and Giuliani, that when and if it happens again, reaction will be better?

SCHUMER: Yes. I think -- look, I think we're considerably better prepared than we were before 9/11 on two fronts. On offense, I think we know more about al Qaeda and other terrorist groups. We're able to thwart some of the things they are doing. We have a ways to go there. And on defense, we're better, too. That's not to say we're where we want to be, but we're better off.

One caveat though that I would give here is, the terrorists are smart. And when they hit us again, if they do, God forbid, they'll probably do it in a different way than they did it before. And so to just say, well, how are we going to prevent planes from flying into buildings and evacuate buildings is not going to be good enough.

Tom Ridge, I think, said it well earlier tonight. You have to look at every front, because they look for our weak pressure point, the place we're doing the least -- and they can learn that from the Internet -- and then they strike.

KING: Senator Clinton, is there something you're more fearful of?

CLINTON: Larry, I spend a lot of time on the Armed Services Committee, with respect to homeland security, trying to think of every way that we remain vulnerable. We have made a lot of progress. But I agree with Chuck, we can't ever let our guard down. We have to keep asking, what more do we need to do? We've got to have the right strategies, both on offense and defense to protect ourselves.

I think we've learned a lot since September 11. I'm not sure we've implemented, yet, everything we've learned, or that we have thought creatively enough, unfortunately, like the terrorists. I mean, we have to sort of get inside their minds to predict what they might do to us, in order to prevent that from happening.

KING: Senator Schumer, Mayor Bloomberg says that New York received only $5.47 per capita in homeland security grants this year, second lowest in the nation. He said the grant distribution is pork barrel politics at its worst. Do you agree?

SCHUMER: Yes, I think the mayor has a point here. We should not, sort of, take the homeland security dollars in an airplane and just spread them randomly in the country on a per capita basis, or even worse. And that's because certain areas have higher vulnerability. We have to focus on the highest need areas.

In the first year, the formula was pretty good. Hillary and I worked on that and we were able to get the high needs areas to get the dollars they need. But I guess as you go forward from 9/11, and it is true, each area thinks they have their own needs, it sort of got spread out more now. Something good may have happened. I was with Tom Ridge right in the anteroom here, as he came out, and I was ready to come on, and we had a five minute conversation about getting that formula back to the way it was two years ago.

KING: What did he say?

SCHUMER: He said he would do it. And he's -- I believe he wants to do it. I just hope others in the White House don't overrule him. Last year, I think he also wanted to do it, but we didn't -- we didn't get the kind of cooperation we needed. But it should be done on need, not simply on per capita.

KING: Senator Clinton, what's your input?

CLINTON: Oh, I agree with that completely. You know, Chuck and I have been beating this drum for three years now. We have said over and over again we that don't have enough money and we haven't allocated the money in a way that reflects what the real threat is.

Every piece of intelligence I see, with respect to threats always mentioned two cities, New York and Washington. There are other places mentioned, but it's a continuous drumbeat of intelligence with respect to both of these cities. So, we have to do a better job.

I have spoken with Secretary Ridge numerous times. I saw him also as he was leaving the set. And he does want to do the right thing, but the president and the Office of Management and Budget all have to weigh in with our colleagues. It's just the nature of legislating that people feel like they've to get their piece of the pie.

The problem is that the most important areas to protect need more help. And I hope that this year, we get the kind of results that we've been promised in the past.

You know, I spoke at the Conference on Mayors back in February. Before I spoke, the president came. And he said, I know that the homeland security aid, has been stuck, we're going to get it unstuck. Because we have a second problem, it's not only that we don't get enough money targeted where it's most needed, lots of times it gets stuck in the pipeline, it doesn't get out of Washington fast enough, it doesn't get out of a state capitol fast enough. It doesn't get into the hands of the first responders, the police and the fire departments that are really the people on the front line.

So, Chuck and I have been sort of sounding this alarm now. I hope that finally, we're going to be able to get the kind of reaction that will give us the money we need in New York, Washington and in the high threat areas.

KING: Senator Schumer, how do you assess the security for New York City this summer, the Republican Convention?

SCHUMER: You know, New York City has been doing a great job. Our police, our fire, our emergency people -- people learned on 9/11 how phenomenal they are. Hillary and I knew how good they were long before that, and we see it now. And they're doing a great job.

New York City is going to spend, you know, over these few years, probably close to a billion dollars on its own security. It is really not fair for the taxpayers of New York City, this is a national and international problem. We're a national city in so many ways, to do it.

But given that constraint, New York City, both under Mayor Giuliani and Mayor Bloomberg, I give them both credit, said, look, even if we're not getting the federal dollars we need, we're going to spend them.

I think the convention is going to go really well. I think that New York has a great robust tradition of protest. And we're going to see a lot of protest, but it's going to be safe, it's going to be secure. And I have a lot of confidence. I've told people. A lot of people have asked me, they say, "Well, should I go away? Should I close my business down?" I said, "Nope, you watch, New York is going to do a very fine job."

KING: But Senator Clinton, are you worried?

CLINTON: Well, I think you always have to be worried. We live in very difficult, dangerous times with respect to global terrorism. But just because you're worried, doesn't mean that you can't go about your ordinary, daily life. You have to keep things in the back of your mind. We need every New Yorker, every American to be more vigilant. If you see an unaccompanied bag, or backpack, you need to report it. So, we do need people to be, you know, a little more alert, but not alarmed.

And I agree with Chuck, I think the convention is a great event for New York. I want the Republicans to have terrific time. I want everybody to appreciate the greatest city in the world. And we have the finest police and fire department and emergency response team that you could find anywhere in the world. Everything that can humanly be done, will be done.

But I just want to underscore what Chuck said. We're reaching really deep into the pocket of the New York citizen in order to pay for the extra security and everything that goes along with protecting and preparing for New York. And we need some more help from the federal government in order to be able to do everything we know needs to be done, and to be able to afford to do it.

KING: We'll take a break. We'll be back with some more moments with our 2 Senators. And we'll close it out with Governor Kean and Lee Hamilton, the chairman and vice-chairman of the 9/11 Commission. Don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: You know, I said, that's going to go down, like the first one. And it came down, and it was just this sound, this rumble and this mass cloud coming at us. It's intense.

(SCREAMING)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

KING: We start with Senator Clinton this go around. The 9/11 Commission report is due July 26, Senator Clinton. Do you expect the White House to vet it right away and let it out?

CLINTON: I hope so. I don't want this to be part of the political process. And I think the sooner that it's out, the better for everybody. As I say from my observation of the commission, I think they have conducted themselves admirably, really above politics. Obviously, they have strong-willed opinionated commissioners. That's the American way, they have opinions about things. As a group, I really believe they've tried to just focus on the issues that they could address to try to come up with some facts about what happened and some recommendations about where we go here. So I hope it gets out as soon as possible.

KING: What do you think, Chuck?

SCHUMER: I agree with Hillary completely. One point here. You know, the White House has gotten the ability to look at the report and redact certain items. I hope those redactions, you know, where they block things out are as few as possible. I think one thing I hope they learned is, in a sense, the truth will set you free, you can't win on something as cosmic, as important as this, hide things, hold things back. That's been the history, when they tried not to cooperate in the early days, they basically had to, and it was frankly the will of the families, the families you heard earlier, you had earlier on your show and we heard today, who just pushed this, and they are sort of the beacon of this report. They've had such passion to get the truth for the right motivations completely. Instead of just cursing the darkness with a hole in their hearts because of the loved ones they lost. They're trying to do some good here. So the White House ought to just put it out quickly and redact anything that has a national security purpose but nothing else.

KING: And off track just a minute for a moment. We have about three minutes left. Senator Clinton, do you think New York City should get the Olympics?

CLINTON: Of course. It's not even a close call.

KING: As busy as that city is, you need that?

CLINTON: You know what, if you want something done, give it to a busy person. If you want something done really well, give it to New York. I just feel like it would be such a great tribute to the courage and resilience of New Yorkers, to bring the Olympics to a city that deserves it and can really give the world a great time.

SCHUMER: If we have the Olympics here, Larry, the Olympiads and the people performing and the people who come, they've not seen nothing like this yet. It will be just the greatest. There's a little bit of anti-American sentiment on the IOC, from what we've been told, especially among the European nations. We hope they can overcome that. New York is not only a national city, we are a universal city. Everyone abhorred what happened on 9/11. There would be no better way to repudiate the terrorists and back up New York than choose New York to be the center for the Olympics.

KING: But Senator Clinton, look at how much money -- you've talked about money already, how much you're laying out in security, what you would have to lay out for this would be enormous. Of course, you would get a lot back.

CLINTON: Well, part of the plan for attracting the Olympics is to make some very important investments in our infrastructure. There are so many people excited about bringing the Olympics to New York that there will be so much private money that will go into developing the infrastructure that we need. I'm just confident that New York can pull it off in a world-class way and I hope that the world will give us this opportunity to do just that.

KING: You think you got a shot, Senator Schumer?

SCHUMER: I do. I think that we have an indomitable fellow there, Dan Doctoroff, who's had this idea. He's sort of -- you know, you say one person can't make a difference. He went to a soccer game -- there was an international soccer game in New York City. He's a native of Michigan like so many people, came from somewhere else and he loved it and it hit him as he was at the soccer game, why don't we try to get the Olympics here. He's pushing and pushing. He will be lobbying every one of those IOC commissioners. I think he's going to win them over. It's the right decision to come to New York. I have hope, maybe faith, but certainly hope that the IOC, the commission will do the right thing and bring it here. And again, we'll have the greatest -- it will be the greatest time for the world, a unifying factor for a world that's now so divided.

KING: And finally, for both of you. Senator Clinton, do you have a favorite for John Kerry to select as a running mate?

CLINTON: Larry, it's such a personal decision. I'm going to support whoever John picks, I have a lot of confidence in his judgment. I think he's doing a terrific job on the campaign trail, he's gaining ground every single day. This is a big and important decision for him but he's going to make one that he feels good about. I think it will be a terrific ticket and a winning ticket in November.

KING: Senator Schumer, do you have anyone you particularly would favor?

SCHUMER: I have my own thoughts. I think we're best to leave this to the presidential nominee. The chemistry is important. He's got to feel right about it. And, if he feels right about it, I think everyone will feel right about it. So I'm not going to impose my -- if he asks me privately, I'll tell him my view. I'm not going to shout it out to tens of millions of Americans here. Let him decide and we'll back who he chooses.

KING: Both of you will campaign extensively?

CLINTON: Absolutely.

SCHUMER: No question about it.

KING: Thank you both very much for sharing this time with us. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and Senator Chuck Schumer. Before that Governor Tom Ridge, secretary of national security and Mayor Rudy Giuliani, the former mayor of city of New York. We'll take a break and when we come back, we'll close out the program with Thomas Kean and Lee Hamilton, the chairman and vice-chairman respectively of the 9/11 Commission. Don't go away.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON IRAQ PRISONER ABUSE, 5/19/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And I thank our witnesses for their service and for their appearance today. I know it's not an easy assignment to be here, given especially all your other responsibilities.

But it is in line with this committee's constitutional and institutional responsibilities, and I believe all of us are trying to discharge them to the best of our ability.

CLINTON: General Miller, I would like to return for a moment to this document that's been much discussed on interrogation rules of engagement.

General Sanchez characterized this document as having been developed at a relatively low level, at the company level, and indicated that he had not seen it before it became public at our hearings. But in an annex to the Taguba report, it's revealed that this document was briefed to you as part of a situation report when you visited Iraq in August 2003.

What was your reaction to that document at that time? And did you have any concern that the techniques described would violate the Geneva Convention?

MILLER: Senator, that report is incorrect. At no time was that document briefed to me during my visit in the August-September time frame.

CLINTON: Was it briefed to you at any time prior to that or following that period?

MILLER: Senator, that document was never briefed to me at any time.

CLINTON: Were the contents of the document briefed to you, General?

MILLER: The contents of that document were not briefed to me.

CLINTON: So it's not only that you never saw the document, the slide. You were never briefed, orally or in writing, about the contents of that document. Is that correct?

MILLER: Senator, that is absolutely correct.

CLINTON: General Sanchez, at a hearing last week, General Alexander, the head of Army Military Intelligence, distributed that slide to the committee. He stated at that time that the slide was prepared by CJTF staff, your staff.

Do you know where General Alexander obtained the slide or why he believed that this came from your staff?

SANCHEZ: No, ma'am, I do not.

CLINTON: Colonel Warren, do you have any information that would lend us some additional enlightenment about why General Alexander told us in sworn testimony that this slide came from General Sanchez's staff?

WARREN: I absolutely do, ma'am.

The reason that the general made the statement that he did is because the slide, as we now know, contained a Combined Joint Task Force-7 logo and was posted on the wall of the joint interrogation and debriefing center at Abu Ghraib.

WARREN: It was styled the Interrogation Rules of Engagement, an unfortunate use of the term "rules of engagement." What it should have said is Interrogation Policy Extract. And that's the context that's so vital that you have to understand, ma'am.

When that slide was created -- and I talked to the person who created it -- it was the commander of Alpha Company 519th military intelligence battalion...

CLINTON: And what was that person's name, Colonel?

WARREN: Captain Woods, ma'am.

It was intended to be a profilaxis (ph). There's really nothing insidious about that particular slide.

In fact, if you'll go back, ma'am, to the counter-resistance and interrogation policies, which General Sanchez has said we will make available to the committee, you will see that they lay out specific measures that are approved.

The 12 October memorandum, in fact, approves only those measures which are contained within the Army Field Manual on interrogations. That applies to prisoners of war and segregation in access of 30 days.

The intent of the slide, however, was to ensure that interrogators understood that those measures on the left hand column, the ones that were approved, the ones I mentioned, were authorized, but that any other measures were not without commanding general approval.

Now, why is it that some of those, again, that seemed to be the so-called harsh methods appear on the right, ones such as sensory deprivation, that were never in any authorized policy?

The reason is because within the drafts that we prepared in the headquarters in the September and October time frame, we, collectively -- the legal community and the military intelligence community -- took every doctrinal approach that was authorized, we took every approach that had been used by interrogators in other places, we took every approach that was contained in any document that we could find, and we put that in a policy so as to regulate it, to ensure that it complied with the Geneva Conventions, that there was command oversight, there was a specific safeguards document that was published that referenced the conventions, and required that in no time could any interrogator in any approach violate the floor of the Geneva Convention: that is the basic requirements, the food, shelter, water, medical care, clothing and protection, could never be violated.

It required an interrogation plan. It required that any exception to policy go through the senior intelligence officer and the staff judge advocate, me, before going to the commanding general.

WARREN: So the intent of that slide was to remind interrogators that anything that was not authorized had to go to the commanding general.

And by the way, given that list, prepared by a captain with all good intention, had items on it that could never be approved; that, frankly, could never reasonably be requested.

But note, ma'am, what's on the bottom. That is something that often is overlooked because that captain did not do a bad job. That captain paraphrased the safeguards that are in enclosure II of our counter-resistance and interrogation policy.

And you'll note, they talk about the requirement to treat everyone with humanity, to follow the Geneva Conventions, to never unlawfully touch a person who is under interrogation.

CLINTON: Colonel, may I just quickly follow up in one of the follow-up question. Are you aware of any requests for approval submitted in writing for any exceptions to the list on the right-hand side?

WARREN: Yes, ma'am, I am aware of approximately 25 for segregation in excess of 30 days, which went through the process of approval that I described. I'm also aware that there were three requests for stress positions which were submitted and were declined, that is denied, at the brigade commander level. So they never would have arisen to the CJTF-7 level for review or approval.

CLINTON: Is it also your understanding that non-military agents of our government and private contractors were similarly bound by the rules that you have just described?

U.S. SENATOR JUDD GREGG (R-NH) HOLDS HEARING ON PRESCRIPTION DRUG REIMPORTATION, 5/20/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm just trying to make sure I understand what our witnesses are telling us, along with my colleague and friend, Senator Mikulski. Am I hearing that if you had the resources and the authority that you think you need to conduct this kind of function, you would not have any objection to trying to do it?

HUBBARD: The administration has taken no position. But FDA has said that if we had the resources and authority, we could presumably set up a system in which you could allow safe imported drugs or at least ameliorate the safety concerns in a very substantial way.

CLINTON: Right. So you made an analogy earlier to what FDA does in inspecting food. And I think the FDA has, you know, claimed over the years, with good cause, that we do have the safest food supply in the world. Would you agree with that statement?

TAYLOR: I think we have a very safe one. I mean, I'm not sure we're the strongest, but I do think we do a very good job in light of the increasing number of imports coming over. And I think our ability to do that job was enhanced by both the provisions in the Bioterrorism Act, in conjunction with the resources that were appropriated that allowed us to bring those provisions to life, and we're currently implementing those now.

CLINTON: Yet my understanding is that we still only inspect 2 to 3 percent of the food that's imported into the country.

TAYLOR: That is correct.

CLINTON: And we also have, according to Centers for Disease Control, every year, 76 million people get sick, more than 300,000 are hospitalized, and 5,000 die from diseases caused by food. So even if you have an enhanced system that you think is doing a good job, there are still going to be problems. And you keep working to try to improve that system to try to get the, you know, problems out of it so that you can even make the food system safer. Is that right?

TAYLOR: Correct.

CLINTON: So from my perspective, you know, part of what we are trying to do here, the legislation that's been introduced, and other legislation that's coming, is to begin that process with respect to importing or reimporting drugs. Because it's also the case, isn't it, that we have a large problem of counterfeiting right here in the United States? We have counterfeit drugs made in the United States and sold in the United States, isn't that right?

TAYLOR: That is right, Senator. But the difference is that our ability to address and investigate and identify and prosecute those counterfeiters is strengthened here in the United States because we have jurisdictional ability to do so.

I'm not suggesting that counterfeit only exists overseas, but what I am saying is that when we identify a counterfeiter domestically, we have additional tools that enhance our ability to identify the counterfeiter and bring that counterfeiter to justice.

And we just simply now, when we discover that counterfeiting is occurring overseas, we often have to work with the regulatory authorities overseas or work with the Customs post or embassies overseas, and it just presents a greater challenge.

CLINTON: Well, I think that one of the areas we need to explore as we begin to open this up is how we enhance cooperation. I know that the European Union has already adopted a technology to secure pharmaceutical packages. And it costs very little per package, and it is state of the art anti-counterfeiting.

So I think there are things we can learn from other places in the world as we try to figure out how to exist in this global market. Because as my colleagues have said, we're going to have a flood of drugs and supplements and all kinds of things coming into our country because people can get on the Internet. And you're not going to look at every package that's delivered everywhere in the world.

Now, let me also ask, with respect to Mr. Hubbard's question -- you claim that drugs imported under the proposal might not be bioequivalent. And that's the calcium pill that doesn't dissolve. Isn't it true that any drug that is different than the U.S. drug must be approved by the FDA under section 506-A?

HUBBARD: Yes, Senator. I believe, if you're speaking of the bill that's before -- one of the bills before the committee, that that is anticipated, that there would be a review. I think our concern would be that there would be a huge resource cost, and any questions about our ability to deal with all of those, all that data.

CLINTON: I understand that. But of course, the FDA came into being in response to the problems at the beginning of the last century. And we created it because we had adulterated foods, we had adulterated drugs. We had to do what needed to be done in the 20th century to deal with those problems.

Well, now, we're in the 21st century. We have new problems. We are going to have to give you new resources, new authorities in order to deal with what is a problem. Whether we pass this legislation or not, it's not going to go away. You're still going to be dealing with a flood of imported and counterfeited drugs, and other kinds of supplements that are coming in.

And you know, I think what we're looking for is as positive an attitude from the FDA as we can get. You are the experts, you know. You are the ones trying to keep our food supply and our pharmaceuticals safe. But we have to think for the future. We can't continue to keep doing business the way we've done. It's not going to work. People are going to get those drugs whether they go by their car or they get it in the mail. So we need a new system, and we need your help to develop that new system.

TAYLOR: Senator, as you know, the secretary has been asked to look at and consider many of these issues in response to the conference report that was attached to the Medicare prescription drug plan. To help him do so, he has convened a task force that has held listening sessions in public meetings. And these are some of the very issues that that group is looking at and considering.

CLINTON: But I think, Mr. Taylor, look, we might as well just sort of put it on the table. We know that the pharmaceutical industry does not want this done. And we know how much influence they have within our government, whatever administration, whoever is at the FDA. It's a constant battle. We're well aware of that.

What we're looking for is to try to at least even the playing field a little bit, as difficult as that might be, and to try to provide some of the additional authorities and resources so that the FDA can get into the 21st century. I mean, I don't think that the pharmaceutical industry can withstand the onslaught of counterfeiting that's going to occur because people are desperate. I don't think they can stand the onslaught of reimportation because people are desperate.

And finally, you know, we have no evidence of anyone being hurt by drugs obtained from Canada. And yet, we have 30 percent of our seniors who have not filled a prescription because they can't afford it. So I mean, we need to look at this in the broader context. And I would wish that the drug industry and the FDA would be partners in our trying to do our job, which is to protect people, but also provide affordable, safe pharmaceuticals to take care of the needs of the American people.

It is not fair any longer for the American taxpayer, consumer, and patient to be at the bottom of an inverted triangle, supporting the drug research and development for the entire world. That's not fair.

So we're looking for some kind of solution here. And we understand the problems. We think we can solve them.

REMARKS BY PRESIDENT GEORGE W. BUSH AT THE UNVEILING OF PORTRAITS OF FORMER PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON AND FORMER FIRST LADY HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, 6/14/2004

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY): Thank you so much, President and Mrs. Bush, for not only arranging this wonderful unveiling, and in effect a reunion for many of the people who served in this house and in the Old and New Executive Office Buildings and in the Cabinets and in so many other capacities, but for your very warm and generous words of welcome and tribute.

I also want to thank Simmie Knox for not only his wonderful work, but his extraordinarily calm and gentle manner. One thing that has never been said about either my husband or I -- nearly everything else has been, but -- (chuckles, laughter) -- one thing that hasn't is that we are patient people. (Laughter.) Those of you who know us know that's not at all descriptive. And to sit for a portrait and to be available to the artist as he tries to get it just right is a very time-taking enterprise. And Simmie was more than understanding as he worked with us over the last several years, and I'm very grateful to him not only for his artistry, but for his humanity.

I also wish to thank Cathy Fenton, the social secretary, and her staff. I know a little bit about how difficult it is to put these events together, and I'm very grateful to her for just a wonderful occasion for all of us.

Finally, it is a somewhat daunting experience to have your portrait hung in the White House. It is something that really does, more than any other act, sort of put your place in history in this building for all the ages and all the people who come through here to see and reflect upon.

You know, as with Bill and his description of the portraits that meant so much to him, I took also great solace from many of the portraits of the former first ladies, because it is a very difficult role. And it is one that you do not seek, but you support the person you love who is seeking the presidency. So I would go and I'd look at that fabulous portrait of Mrs. Roosevelt that just shows her intent and purpose-driven life. I'd look at the lovely portrait of Mrs. Johnson, the elegant portraits of both Mrs. Kennedy and Mrs. Reagan, all of the women who have lived in and tried to make this house a home over the past centuries.

And so I'm very honored to join them as part of that history. It is an extraordinary experience. And I thank the White House Historical Association, Mr. Dudley and Neil (sp), of course, for making it possible.

Being part of history in our nation is, I think, a heavy responsibility that we carry with us and we care deeply about. But it's also a challenge, for those of us still around, to think about what more we can do for our country and for what this extraordinary house stands for.

So I thank you for helping us during those eight years, those of you who were our friends and our supporters, our colleagues. And I thank you, Mr. President, for welcoming us here and for your place in history as well. Thank you very much. (Applause.)

LAURA WELCH BUSH (first lady): President Clinton and Senator Clinton, these portraits are lovely. President Bush and I are proud to share them with the many visitors that come to the White House.

Your portraits, like you said, are in very good company. They join a collection of portraits of extraordinary men and women who have defined America and shaped our history.

And your portraits, like Simmie Knox, convey warmth and vitality. All who see them will be reminded of your dedication and all that you've done to strengthen our nation. Congratulations, and we're so thrilled to install these beautiful portraits here.

Now I want to invite everyone to lunch in the State Dining Room. (Applause.)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON THE NOMINATION OF THE NEW MULTINATIONAL FORCE-IRAQ COM-MANDER, 6/24/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

General Casey, over the past year, I have enjoyed getting to know you and working with you in your capacity as vice chief of staff of the Army. And I think that one of the most striking tributes to your success in that position is how sparsely attended this hearing is. Boring is good, General Casey. And I applaud you on that.

It's something I've not yet figured out how to do. But clearly, you're a master at it. And it goes to the heart of your success in your present position and I know your success in the future as well.

CASEY: I'm going to have to think about that for a minute.

WARNER: I'd note for the record that when we commenced the hearing we had half of the committee present. And a number have rotated in and out.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, I was more thinking of the press and the public, particularly the press.

WARNER: The press? Yes. I'm proud of the committee. That's where my head count goes.

CLINTON: That's right. I agree with that. But I think the fact that the press is not here and breathing down the general's neck is a good sign for the future.

WARNER: Yet, yet.

CLINTON: Yet.

WARNER: They're not breathing down his neck yet.

CLINTON: General...

WARNER: (inaudible)

CLINTON: ... there are a number of issues that have already been addressed by members of the committee, and I want to touch on a few others to get your reaction. You know, I, along with a number of my colleagues, have expressed concern about the increasing role and presence of private contractors in performing a variety of security functions in Iraq. I'm not talking about preparing meals or, you know, being parts of convoys with supplies, but actually performing security functions that put them in the line of fire.

And, in fact, we now know that they're not only engaged in what amounts to if not military, certainly paramilitary actions. But they are developing their own networks and intelligence services within Iraq. Yet they are neither bound by the U.S. rules of engagement, nor, as I understand it, are they protected by any kind of military shield with respect to the takeover of sovereignty on June 30th.

Could you give us your thoughts about this relationship that exists now? And do you have any plans to try to clarify the relationship between the U.S. forces in Iraq and contractors and the new sovereignty Iraqi government and these private contractors?

CASEY: Again, as I mentioned, I do not know everything I need to know about this subject, Senator. And it is something that I will commit to looking into. I do know that as part of the CPA's Order Number 17 that they're looking to revise and extend that they are working the issue of whether contractors get protection or not. But it's still an open issue, to the best of my knowledge.

CLINTON: But would that protection be military protection, General? Is that what the CPA is looking to?

CASEY: I'm sorry, it's protection under the sofa-like (ph) arrangements of the Order 17.

CLINTON: So that would go to the position they would hold vis-a- vis the Iraqi government after the takeover, as I understand it if this CPA provision is accepted.

CASEY: My understanding is that basically it would say that contractors who are providing support to the multinational force mission would receive protection similar to those of the multinational force. That's what they're trying to adjudicate right now.

CLINTON: And would that, in your view, include those security forces that are working to secure the other contractors who are in Iraq, those working on resumption of electricity, on the maintenance of the oil pipelines? Or would they be in a different category?

CASEY: Senator, I don't know the specifics of that.

CLINTON: And the other issue that is related to that that I would like to follow is whether there will be additional calls on our forces with respect to protecting the contractors and not only the contractors providing security, but the contractors doing necessary revitalization and rehabilitation work in Iraq.

You know, with respect to the U.N.'s recent decision not to provide continuing exemption for American forces from the international criminal court of justice, how do you view that as affecting the status of the forces under your command within Iraq?

CASEY: With respect to the contractors that provide support to the U.S. military there now,...

CLINTON: Right.

CASEY: ... we provide support for them and security for them as part of our ongoing missions. For example, the people that run the dining facilities, that drive our trucks and things. They are provided the same security that we provide to our forces.

WARNER: Again, we're losing your voice when you do that.

CASEY: I'm sorry. I'm sorry, Senator.

CLINTON: General, the other piece of this, though, is that as I understand it, the United Nations has just refused to continue any exemption for our military forces from potential prosecution under the international court of criminal justice. This is a murky area, and I know that it's not yet resolved. Do you have any reaction to that? Or have you been given any guidance as to what, if any, changes you have to oversee when you take command in Iraq?

CASEY: Senator, I just heard that same report this morning. I don't know the details. I do know that as we talked earlier here, Jerry Bremer is focused on getting an extension of his Order 17 approved so that our forces and those supporting contractors have the protections that they need. And he expects to do that prior to the 30th of June.

CLINTON: General, is there yet identified the person who will be your counterpart in this new Iraqi government, the commander of whatever forces or security personnel that this new government will put into place?

CASEY: General Bobakur (ph) is the senior military adviser to the prime minister of Iraq. And he will be my direct interface.

CLINTON: So he, even though, he's what's called an adviser, he will have not only the responsibility for interacting with you, but will he have any line command or any operational responsibility, so far as you know?

CASEY: I am not 100 percent sure of that, Senator.

CLINTON: You know, all of these questions about how we interact with the post-June 30th government are really going to be in your lap, General. I know that it's going to be a very challenging task for you to line this up and to get the appropriate understandings. But one thing I was struck by is that news reports indicate CENTCOM is asking for five more brigades. Is that an accurate report?

CASEY: It's not, Senator. We talked about that a little bit earlier before you came in. CENTCOM is doing some contingency planning for increased levels of violence. It is not, as the report suggested, an informal request for forces. It's just planners doing planning.

CLINTON: OK. And finally, General, are there any projections that you're aware of that have looked to the numbers of troops we will need over the next, you know, one to five years?

CASEY: Senator, the central command and Army planners continually assess and reassess that.

CLINTON: And what is the range of troops? Do you have knowledge of that?

CASEY: Right now, we're looking at sustaining, planning -- and this is the difference in Army planners looking -- because we have to designate units two and three years in advance. We want to give them that notification so they have the stability. But we're planning on sustaining the current force levels through at least another rotation, so OIF four.

CLINTON: And do you know what percentage of Guard and Reserve members that will be consisting of?

CASEY: My sense is it will stay somewhere between 30 and 50 percent, Senator.

CLINTON: Thank you, General.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: General, just two quick things. One, to follow-up on Senator Dayton, we get reports that a lot of our troops are performing functions that they weren't trained for. And that seems particularly true with respect to some of these civil projects.

We've had reports that, you know, people who were, you know, trained for infantry are trying to help with controlling sewage. And, you know, there isn't a significant amount of troops for the engineering the kind of fundamental building block work that is required.

I don't know whether that's the case or not. And, you know, I'd like to get some sense of that because clearly, it may be that you have enough troops, but it may also be, as we're told consistently, that the mix of troops may not quite be right for the changeover and the new kinds of responsibilities you face.

Finally, on a matter that is, you know, not perhaps at the top of the pressing issues that you confront, there was a very poignant report this morning on -- I think it was National Public Radio -- by the man who had been Jerry Bremer's consultant for cultural affairs. And he spoke in detail about how we had established base camps in places like Babylon on the archaeological site. And that we, through the efforts to protect these sites and then to establish a permanent presence, had perhaps taken some actions that were contrary to preserving not just the archaeological heritage of the Iraqis, but the biblical heritage of the entire Judeo-Christian world.

Would you look into that, General? Because I was deeply disturbed in the aftermath of the initial efforts that we had the looting of the national museums and the like. And we found out the damage might not have been as great as had originally reported. So I'd like to know where we stand with respect to some of these very valuable ancient sites that mean so much to people around the world.

CASEY: I will do that, Senator. By chance, I did happen to visit that Polish base camp. And I can tell you that he inherited that from the Marines who went in first. But he is doing everything in his power to mitigate the effects of his presence there on the cultural sites.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS A HEARING ON IRAQ SOVEREIGNTY, 6/25/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I apologize for not being able to get here earlier. I thank each of our witnesses for once again appearing before this committee.

Secretary Wolfowitz, you know that on several occasions both I and others have raised predictions and comments you made before the action commenced in Iraq. Just as an example, on February 19th, 2003, on National Public Radio, you said, "We're not talking about the occupation of Iraq. We're talking about the liberation of Iraq. Therefore, when that regime is removed, we will find the Iraqi population basically welcoming us as liberators"

In your speech before the VFW in March of 2003 you said the Iraqi people understand what this crisis is about. "Like the people of France in the 1940s, they view us as their hoped-for liberator. They know America will not come as a conqueror."

It's not only comments from you, but others in the administration, such as Vice President Cheney on "Meet the Press," March 16th, 2003. "The read we get on the people of Iraq is there is no question but that they want to get rid of Saddam Hussein, and will welcome us as liberators when we come to do that."

Were those statements by you and others in the administration based on intelligence, CIA intelligence, or other intelligence agency analysis?

WOLFOWITZ: Senator Clinton, the Iraqi people in overwhelming numbers did welcome us as liberators. If you go back and read the headlines from any American newspaper on April 9th, April 10th of people cheering us in the streets of Baghdad and all over the country. They were dying for liberation.

But two things happened. Saddam and his people didn't quit on April 9th. They continue to fight. And we acquired this very burdensome label of being an occupying power. They wanted to be liberated, not occupied.

And I think that's why what's going to happen on July 1st is so important, that they will be a free country. They will have their own government. We will not be the occupiers, we will be supporting that government.

And the reason -- I think you weren't -- well, you weren't here when we talked about it -- I was struck during the course of four days in Iraq at how many Iraqis we encountered who were ready to risk their lives for this new Iraq.

We met a young Marine private first class in Fallujah whose life had been saved by five Iraqi Civil Defense Corps members who had put their own lives at risk to rescue him.

We met with the prime minister, Prime Minister Allawi, who was almost chopped to death with an ax by one of Saddam's murderers in 1979, and who is still the number one target of Mr. Zarqawi, and whose life is in danger every day.

The president of Iraq, Ghazi al-Yawer, whose predecessor was assassinated in a car bomb just a couple of months ago.

And this one particularly moving example, which I'll repeat because you weren't here, a young Iraqi interpreter working with our military up in Mosul whose sister was murdered a few weeks ago because she was working with us. And when the general who was with me, who knew her from before, asked her why she continued to put her life in danger this way, she said, "Because my father told me, we mustn't retreat in the face of evil."

We are confronting an evil enemy. The Iraqi people are confronting an evil enemy. Those people in overwhelming numbers still want to be liberated from that enemy.

I think it was a mayor of a town near Fallujah that said to General Mattis, "In my heart I want you to leave right now, but in my head I know we need you for a while longer."

I mean, that's the dilemma of this situation, that it's both our vulnerability and our great strength that we are facing an enemy that is tenacious, that kills very effectively, that has no scruples about killing innocents.

WOLFOWITZ: But that is also our strength, because the overwhelming majority of Iraqis don't want that.

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Secretary, based on that description, in retrospect, could we have avoided certain of the unfavorable consequences that you have just described if we had had more force in the beginning?

WOLFOWITZ: Senator Clinton, I think the notion that we'd be better off with 300,000 troops is wrong. I think, more importantly, our commanders, both General Franks and General Abizaid, emphatically think it's wrong.

You know, there were a lot of people, and I happen to have been one of them, who was pushing General Franks, I think it was in the November time frame of 2001, saying, "Don't you need more troops in Afghanistan?" And he was pushing back and saying, "I don't want to make the same mistake the Soviet Union made." And I think he was right.

I think the reason we've been as successful as we have in Afghanistan is we've kept our military presence...

CLINTON: But I'm not asking you about Afghanistan, Mr. Secretary.

WOLFOWITZ: I'm about to say the same things applies in Iraq. And General Abizaid will consistently tell people both publicly and privately he does not want to increase the weight of the American footprint on the Iraqi people.

It would have been much better if we could have been in there from the beginning in support of an Iraqi government rather than as an occupying power. But 300,000 troops, which no commander has ever remotely come close to asking for, would, in fact, have created more problems than it would have solved.

There's no reason to think that we would have had any better luck catching these people where they hide if there was a heavy American presence -- I mean a heavier American presence. It was pretty heavy.

And what we need is better intelligence. I think one of the keys to better intelligence is more Iraqis on the frontlines fighting with us, and that is what we're moving toward.

CLINTON: At some point, Mr. Secretary, will there be any kind of after-action review by the civilian leadership in the Pentagon with respect to this mission.

You know, certainly those of us who heard General Shinseki, who at the time was the Army chief of staff, testify based on his best knowledge and experience the numbers that were needed, have to conclude there was, at least, a debate within the professional military.

CLINTON: Now, how that debate was determined, obviously we have a regime of civilian leadership, is obviously clear. But I think to dismiss out of hand testimony we heard with our own ears and testimony that was very compelling and led to the public embarrassment of a distinguished soldier is a little bit difficult for us to accept.

WOLFOWITZ: I'm sorry. I don't think to disagree with someone should be publicly embarrassing. General Shinseki was, in fact, disagreeing with all of his colleagues on the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the combatant commander, General Franks.

Isn't that right, General Myers?

MYERS: Actually, we didn't -- as we discussed about troop strength with then the commander, General Franks, which we did many times during the planning, during conflict and then for post-conflict, and then later on with General Abizaid, the issue of more troops never came before -- never was brought up in our deliberations. Nobody said, "You need more."

It was General Franks that proposed what he thought was right. We'd have discussions and talk about it. And then we'd provide our military advice to the secretary and the deputy secretary. But there was never a push inside the Joint Chiefs of Staff for more forces.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

"Good Morning America," ABC, 7/26/2004

CHARLES GIBSON, ABC NEWS

(Off Camera) All right, thanks very much, Tony. We're gonna turn now to the woman who is helping kick off the Democratic convention tonight by introducing her husband, Bill Clinton. Hillary Clinton first came to national attention as a political wife, but she is now one of the undisputed stars of the Democratic party. So here's a look at Hillary Clinton at center stage, especially at conventions over the years.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON,

DEMOCRAT, NY, CONVENTION SPEAKER

You know, I suppose I could have stayed home and baked cookies and had tea, but what I decided to do was to fulfill my profession which I entered before my husband was in public life. We're not taking anybody or anything for granted.

film clips of hillary clinton

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

I am overwhelmed. In October, Bill and I will celebrate our 21st wedding anniversary. Thank you for supporting my husband. What an eight years it has been.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) And joining us from the convention hall this morning is Senator Hillary Clinton. Back at the Democratic convention. Senator, good to have you with us.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Thank you, Charlie. I'm glad to be back.

CHARLES GIBSON

Let me ask about your role at this convention. Because a lot has been made, as you know, in the political pages about the fact that you were not on the original speaking schedule for the convention. Was that an oversight, or do you think it was a deliberate move by the Kerry people?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Oh, you know, I have no reason to think either. I think that a convention is an evolving kind of event. And I'm just delighted to be part of supporting John Kerry and John Edwards. That's what I'm going to try to do tonight to give people maybe some insight into why I feel so strongly that this is the team for America's future. And then I'm going to enjoy myself with all of my friends and the delegates here.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) There's something I've wanted to ask you about ever since I had a chance to talk to your husband when the book came out. You have been very circumspect about your own presidential ambitions, and I asked President Clinton about it in our interview. And I just want to play the clip.

PRESIDENT WILLIAM JEFFERSON CLINTON,

UNITED STATES

She's now where I was in 1988. When I didn't run in 1988, and I thought I'd never get another chance to run, because I really thought the Democrats were going to win. And, and I do again.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) Now, that was his comparison. And I thought it was really interesting. We know he thought about running in 1998. Decided against it. And acknowledges there if Dukakis had won, he'd have been shut out for some period of time. He made the comparison, do you, this time, if John Kerry wins are you shut out for some period of time?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

You know, I don't know, and I really don't care. That's what I'm trying to convey to everyone I speak with. My commitment is to elect John Kerry and John Edwards, and I do it for two reasons. I think that John Kerry is exactly the kind of man we need to be president right now in our country's history, and I cannot imagine four more years of this administration. I just think that, you know, the Bush- Cheney team has put us on a disastrous course. So I, I care deeply about the outcome of this election, and, you know, the future takes care of itself, Charlie. None of us knows what the future holds for any of us. But right now, my goal is to do everything I possibly can to elect John Kerry.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) Handicap this election for me. You know presidential politics very well. In some sense, is this an election between George Bush and not George Bush? To what extent is this to John Kerry's to win, or do you think it's really a referendum on the president?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

You know, Charlie, every time you have an incumbent president running, as we did in '92, a president named Bush, as we do now in 2004, a president named Bush, the election has to be about the incumbent, first and foremost, because Americans have to decide whether they want to give their president a new contract of employment for four years. I think that this race up until now has been Bush versus Bush, and Bush is losing. And then people begin to look at the alternative. John Kerry. And I think this convention is going to increase the support for John Kerry. I think people are going to like what they see and hear. You know, I was joking earlier this morning with an old friend of mine who's been to a lot of conventions that, you know, it really takes a long time to get to know a candidate. For the American people to feel that they understand who someone is. You know, this is a big country, and I think Senator Kerry has done a very good job in just running his own campaign, ever since he got into the primaries last year. And that's what he's doing in this election. And as people know more about him, they see his steadiness, his seriousness, his thoughtfulness, they know something about his past military and public service, his sense of duty to our country, the policies he's putting forth, I just believe that this is going to be a Democratic victory, and so there will be another one-term Bush president.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) Senator Clinton, always good to have you with us. Good luck tonight. Look forward to seeing you perhaps up in Boston.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Thank you, Charlie.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) All right, you take care. When we come back, you're about to get a lot more free time in your life. How?

CHARLES GIBSON

(Voice Over) Well, you can stay tuned for our time-saving tips. "Good Morning America" continues, stay with us.

"Special Report," ABC, 7/26/2004

Live from Boston, the Democratic National Convention

Star of the Democratic party, this remarkable woman has inspired us all as First Lady of Arkansas, and First Lady of America, as a legal champion of America's children, as a wife, as a mother, and now as a Senator from New York. She is a clear voice for a strong military on the Armed Services Committee, for the men and women who serve and for fair treatment of our veterans. I am honored to present the junior Senator from New York state, and a great Democrat, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

PETER JENNINGS

(Off Camera) Senator Kennedy did say to us a little earlier today that even she got nervous on such occasion, the mouth got a little dry. She's introduced her husband hundreds of times. And she says, well, this one is a little different but not significantly different. There is no doubt that in the Democratic party, particularly among the activist Democrats here, Senator Clinton is a rock star.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON, DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK

I am practically speechless. However, 12 years ago, when our country needed new leadership, Americans selected a Democrat who gave us eight years of peace, prosperity and promise. Tonight -tonight I have the pleasure of introducing the last great Democratic President. But first, I want to say a few words about the next great Democratic President, John Kerry. You know, I, like all of you, just heard the moving testimonials about the horrors of September the 11th, and the extraordinary witnessing by Reverend Alton, concerning his Lieutenant, John Kerry. I don't know how any American could hear the Reverend Alton and not know John Kerry is the man we need to be our President and Commander-in-Chief.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

And yet, we meet at a moment of great peril, but also of great promise for the country we love. Together we can, once again, widen the circle of opportunity for all Americans. We can once again transcend our differences and divisions. We can once again give our children a safer and more secure future. That is the promise of America. And John Kerry will renew and keep that promise to this generation and generations to come. He knows very well that you have to lead the world, not alienate it. He will -he will lower the deficit, not raise it. He will create good jobs, not lose them. And he will solve a health care crisis for our people, not ignore it. Now, I know a thing or two about health care. And I know that the problems have only gotten worse in the last four years. We need to rededicate ourselves to the task of providing health care coverage for the 44 million Americans who don't have it. And we have to do more to lower the cost for all the rest of Americans who are facing increasing health care insurance premiums and drug prices.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

We also -we also need to lift the ban on stem cell research and find cures that will help millions of Americans. You know, health care is a serious issue. And it requires serious solutions. And that's what John Kerry is good at and that's what he will give us. He will also give us something else, a great Vice President by the name of John Edwards. Now, we know that John Edwards is smart, he's energetic, and he's empathetic, and he understands the challenges that hard working Americans face in their daily lives. Americans will be proud to have the Kerry-Edwards team in the White House. And they will be proud as we all will be to have their extraordinary partners, Teresa Heinz-Kerry and Elizabeth Edwards working for our country as well. Now, you know, we've been through our share of challenges as Americans. You know, from a Civil War to a Great Depression to world wars and so much more. But being a Senator from New York, I saw firsthand, as all of my friends and colleagues did the devastation of September the 11th. I visited ground zero the day after we were attacked. And I felt like I was standing at the gates of Hell.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I hope no American ever has to witness a horrible sight like that ever again. And yet that tragedy both changed and challenged us. I know it did for me. And everyday now as a mother, as a Senator, as an American, I worry about whether we are acting as wisely as we can to protect our country and our people. Last week, the bipartisan 9/11 Commission issued its report. And that commission would never have been in existence had it not been for the brave family members who insisted that this government have a commission to look into 9/11.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

And those commissioners issued a sober call to action that we ignore at our peril. John Kerry understands what's at stake when it comes to our security. We need to fully equip and train our firefighters, our police officers, and our emergency medical technicians. They are our first responders in the event of a terrorist attack. And we need to secure our borders, our rail lines and our ports, as well as our chemical and our nuclear plants. We need to reorganize our Federal government to meet the new threats of these times. And we need to make sure that homeland security is a priority, and that it is funded properly and that the resources go to the areas of greatest risk, like New York City.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

And along with that, we need to take care of our men and women in uniform who, like John Kerry, risked their lives and, for too many, lost their lives in service to our country. These brave Americans deserve better. We need -we need to increase our troop strength. We need to raise their pay. We need to provide our veterans, our National Guard and reserve with the benefits they are entitled to for the service and duty they perform for our nation. And do you know - do you know what we need to meet these challenges? We need a new Commander-in-Chief named John Kerry.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I've been saying for many months now, John Kerry is a serious man for a serious job and a serious time in our country's history. So let's join together, not just those of us in this great hall tonight, but throughout our nation, and do everything we possibly can to convince our fellow Americans to look to the future, to look deep inside themselves. They know what is best for our children. And if we just have the courage to act on our conviction, we will, by an overwhelming majority, send John Kerry and John Edwards to do their duty for us in the White House, starting next year. I am very optimistic about this election because I think I know a great leader when I see one. And so does America. In 1992 and 1996, Americans chose a President who left our country in better shape than when he took office. And he still spends his days working to empower the powerless, to promote racial, religious and ethnic reconciliation, to inspire young people to citizen service, and to bring life saving medicines to people living with HIV/AIDS throughout the world. He showed Democrats how to win again, and so will John Kerry. Please welcome the 42nd President of the United States, Bill Clinton.

"CBS Evening News," CBS, 7/26/2004

One of the most intriguing speakers here tonight is Hillary Rodham Clinton. There is a lot of interest in the former first lady, now senator from New York, about her role here at the convention and in the future of the party. I spoke with her today about that and what some people call a rivalry with Senator Edwards and got the Inside Story.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): I know that right now the American public, in my view at least, has decided that they want an alternative to President Bush, and this is the opportunity for those of us who know and admire John to hopefully convince a lot more of our fellow citizens to support John Kerry.

RATHER: And what about those who don't wish him well? They say, 'Listen, he's Senator Flip-flop, always has been, and would be as president.'

Sen. CLINTON: Oh, I think that's, you know, Republican propaganda. You know, what I think is the case about John Kerry is that he has a very steady core. He's a man of a lot of personal strength, and he understands what it takes to lead. And because he thinks through issues and he asks questions, apparently in some quarters of American politics today, that's considered inappropriate, whereas for me, it's very reassuring.

RATHER: Tonight, it's Senator Hillary Clinton's job to rally the crowd for John Kerry.

Sen. CLINTON: It takes a long time in this big country for people to get a sense of who you are.

RATHER: But for months, she was the center of serious speculation.

Your husband, President Clinton, has said in interviews that you considered running for president this time.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, that's not accurate. You know, I think that a lot of people considered it for me. It was just not anything I wanted to do or thought was right to do for me, and I'm, you know, very much at peace with that.

RATHER: Well, you and your husband helped get John Edwards elected senator from North Carolina. But now he is--correct me if I'm wrong, but he's a competitor of yours for future stardom in the Democratic Party.

Sen. CLINTON: Oh, I don't see it that way. You know, I don't see politics as a zero-sum game where, you know, if someone's up, you're down, or vice versa. I just don't see it like that. To me, we're all part of a team.

RATHER: And to those who say, 'Listen, down deep, the Clintons plural did not want John Edwards to be on the ticket because it might harm Senator Clinton's chances in the future,' you say what?

Sen. CLINTON: I say that's, you know, just not true. I say that, you know, from my perspective, both my husband and I have done everything we can to help this ticket, and we're going to continue to do it. I want to be there on January 20th when John Kerry and John Edwards are sworn in on behalf of our nation. You know, I cannot imagine four more years of the Bush-Cheney administration. I think it has been a real setback for our nation and for the world, and I don't think there's any about-face that the president can perform that will change that. We need a new leader.

RATHER: I also asked Senator Clinton about what it might be like for her to be a presidential nominee. She said, quote, "Personally, I don't think about it," but she would like to see a woman president in her lifetime.

"The Early Show," CBS, 7/26/2004

After much ado about the actual role that she would play during the Democratic National Convention, Senator Hillary Clinton will be introducing her husband tonight, former President Bill Clinton, to the party faithful here in Boston.

Senator Clinton, good morning.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning.

STORM: You will have a great opportunity to set the tone for this convention. What are your goals tonight?

Sen. CLINTON: I want to do two things: I want to really express how strongly I feel about John Kerry, why I trust him to be our president and our commander-in-chief. And, of course, introduce my husband. It's an interesting position to be in, to introduce the last Democratic president and the future Democratic president. But I think that this convention is going to really provide Americans with some insight and understanding about John Kerry and John Edwards, which will tip the balance. I mean, we're going to win, and I just want them to win with as big a margin as possible. So they will have a lot of opportunity to get our country back on the right track.

STORM: There was a big flap about your participation. You weren't initially invited to speak here at the convention. There continues to be all this speculation about your own presidential ambitions and how they might play. How do you set all of that aside and portray the fact that you are solidly behind getting this team into the White House?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, it's very easy for me, because everyone who knows me knows that I am appalled at the Bush/Cheney administration and the direction they've taken our country, and I just cannot even imagine four more years of their leadership, which I think would put us in a big hole domestically and around the world. So, it's very easy, because I am 100 percent behind John Kerry. I have worked with him in the Senate. I knew him before the Senate. I just want Americans who haven't made up their minds to know him as I know him, to know that he's a serious, thoughtful, effective leader who is going to be a great president for our country.

STORM: And if you never got the opportunity to run for president, would you be at peace with that?

Sen. CLINTON: Of course. I'm having a great time being the senator from New York. You know, I know a lot of people speculate about my life, but I just try to get up every day and lead it. You know, that's hard enough.

STORM: Well, sometimes that can be difficult, particularly if you're the wife of a candidate or the wife of a president. And I want to talk a little bit about Teresa Heinz Kerry and what happened as she was with the Pennsylvania delegates last night and she told a reporter to, quote, "shove off." This is a very fine line that a strong woman walks as her husband is campaigning for the highest office in the land. What sort of challenges does she face, from your perspective, and what advice would you give her?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, she doesn't need my advice. She's doing a great job and, you know, everybody gets frustrated with the press, with all due respect.

STORM: Would something like this hurt, though? Yeah.

Sen. CLINTON: Oh, I don't think so. I think that as people have gotten to know her, they see a strong, outspoken, caring, very loving person who really is supporting John, but also, you know, wants to do what she can to change the direction of the country and I think people understand that.

STORM: I want to ask you about the 9-11 Commission, and you said last week that the president had dithered--I believe that was your term--in providing the funds needed for the city of New York as the commission recommended that those areas at the highest risk should be receiving the most funds. How much more money are you looking for for New York City?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I have to say that the commission validated what I and others have been saying, which is we have no national strategy and we certainly haven't done enough to get money to the high-risk areas like New York City. If you look at any intelligence report, New York City's at the top of the list of being a potential target. And the--you know, the city with the police and the firefighters have done a fabulous job but they've been shortchanged.

STORM: What can the president accomplish by executive order? What are you looking for him to do, specifically?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I'm looking for him to show some leadership and to change the formula by which money is distributed. Obviously it's a congressional decision, but you know, the president's party controls both houses of Congress. If he were to choose, he could say, 'This is what I want done for America.' He's going to New York City for his convention. You know, I'd like to see a strong statement that we're going to change this formula and I expect the leaders of the Senate and the House to, you know, really do what I think is best for the country, to have a national strategy with more money and have it allocated differently.

STORM: What about Congress? What should their top priority be here in terms of enacting some of these changes?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, that's what their priority should be...

STORM: Right.

Sen. CLINTON: ...and I'm pleased the Senate will start holding hearings this coming month, but there's more to be done. It's not only what the executive branch needs to do with the new way to organize intelligence, but what the Congress needs to do to provide better oversight. That may be the harder part for Congress, because, you know, people who have been there a long time, have a lot of power are going to have to be willing to cede some of it so that we have a better system that can keep us safe.

STORM: Senator Clinton, thanks so much for joining us and good luck tonight as you speak in front of this convention.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you.

STORM: This is THE EARLY SHOW on CBS.

"American Morning," CNN, 7/26/2004

Let's go from that now back in Boston with a view from the convention stage, a familiar one to Hillary Clinton. The New York Senator, former first lady addresses the party faithful later tonight in prime time, just ahead of the former president, her husband.

Senator Clinton, good morning to you and thanks for your time.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Thank you.

HEMMER: I don't know if you have much of a comment based on what Teresa

HEINZ KERRY: said last night. If you do, I'll give you the platform here.

CLINTON: Well, I know Teresa. And I think she is expressing herself honestly and openly. And, you know, I've been around politics long enough to know that there are lots of people who say things that are not true. So from my perspective, you know, she's just a terrific person.

HEMMER: At what point, if you go back to '91-'92 did you realize that everything you say would be looked at closer than you ever had before?

CLINTON: Well that happens during the campaign. But, you know, you want to be yourself and you also don't want people to say things that aren't true about you and your family. It's a tough line to walk, but she's doing a terrific job and she's going to be a fabulous first lady.

HEMMER: A tough line to walk -- how easy or difficult is it to step over that line, at times, and have your remarks being taken and turning off people, essentially?

CLINTON: Well, you know, I don't think that will. I think a lot of American are going to say, good for you. You go, girl. And that certainly is how I feel about it.

I think that what we're living in, in our political, you know, history at this moment is extremely polarized. There is a lot of, you know, strong emotions and that's perfectly appropriate. But then there are people who are, frankly, out to score political points or to put words in people's mouths and that's not appropriate. And they have to be called on it.

HEMMER: There was a suggestion last week that your husband might overshadow John Kerry, and that is perhaps why he's going on the first night. Do you think that's a possibility?

CLINTON: No, no. I think that's the way conventions are planned. I mean, obviously the big event is John Kerry's speech Thursday night, and everything leads up to it.

So I know that Bill is happy to be, you know, kicking off the convention. I'm delighted to be introducing him. We want to do everything we possibly can do to help the American people who have yet to make up their minds -- and there aren't too many left -- that this is a man who could be a great president and really a perfect choice for our country at this point in our history.

HEMMER: You are endorsing a man who, if he wins on November 2nd, may have significant impact on your own possibilities for the White House, maybe even, some suggest, pushing it back to 2012.

You laugh, that's fine. That's fair. When you think about that possibility?

CLINTON: I don't think about that possibility, but I know that a lot of people in your position do, and that's fine.

But I am so excited about replacing this administration. You know, I think that the Bush-Cheney presidency has been bad for America and bad for the world. I can not wait to see them leave the White House -- the sooner the better. I wish we could move the inauguration up a few months.

I am so hopeful that we will get back on the right track. And the only way we can do that is by having new leadership.

HEMMER: Thanks you, Senator.

CLINTON: Thanks, Bill. Good to see you.

"Inside Politics," CNN, 7/26/2004

Well, as a former first lady, Hillary Clinton knows all about the pressures of being in the spotlight. The senator from New York is one of tonight's convention speakers introducing her husband. Earlier today, she talked with me about a number of important concerns facing the Democratic Party as it tries to unseat George W. Bush. I started by asking if the party's claim of unprecedented unity is real.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CLINTON: It's real. It's deep and it's real. Obviously, there will be differences over issues. This is a very big tent of a party.

But the overriding objective to elect John Kerry and John Edwards and defeat George Bush has united Democrats from all ends of the political spectrum. I've never seen it or felt it as strongly as I do this year.

WOODRUFF: At the same time, you've got the Republicans practically camped outside the FleetCenter saying that what's going on here is an extreme makeover, that John Kerry has the most liberal voting record in the Senate, that he's...

CLINTON: That's so funny.

WOODRUFF: ... voted against defense votes one after another, even though this convention is talking about "A strong America." Are the Democrats going to be able to get away with it?

CLINTON: Well, the real question is will the Republicans get away with once again insulting the intelligence of the American voter. Talk about makeover, you know, they've hidden all their most extreme members of Congress and other people in their party. They've got a convention lineup in New York that is filled with people who disagree fundamentally with the president on every important issue.

And I think it's a sign of desperation. You know, John Kerry's record is a record of accomplishment and thoughtful consideration of difficult issues. He has more experience in foreign affairs, he knows more about military and defense policy than certainly this president did, when he came in, and in my view, probably to this day. Because, you know, what Senator Kerry has done is to study issues carefully and consider all the different angles.

And, you know, I think that's appropriate. That's what I want in a president. I don't want someone who is so convinced he is right and tries to create an evidence-free zone so that there is no evidence or facts that can in any way shake his opinion.

WOODRUFF: But the Republicans have been successful, haven't they, in portraying him as flip-flopper, somebody who changes positions on issues?

CLINTON: I don't think so. I mean, they spent, oh, a huge amount of money, $50 $60, $70 million trying to sell that old dog, but it doesn't hunt and it's not going to be very effective in this campaign.

WOODRUFF: Senator, the 1992 convention, which you remember so well, was really important in turning around fortunes for your husband. What does John Kerry need to do at this -- the 2000 convention not so successful for Al Gore. What does John Kerry need to do at this convention to help himself?

CLINTON: Well, I think -- I think John has a different challenge than Bill did. You know, Bill was running behind going into his convention. He really had to persuade the American people to take a look at him and, at the same time, decide not to reelect George Bush the first.

I think most Americans are already reaching the conclusion that they're not enthusiastic about a second Bush term. And what John has to do is what he has done, which is to present his very solid, steady presence with the policies that he has fought for and developed in this campaign to the American people.

You know, he's been so successful. You know, I remember talking to him last fall, Judy, when everybody had written him off and, you know, people were saying he should just pull out. And he called me about a couple of matters. And I said, "Well, what do you really think, John?" And he said, "I'm going to win."

And, you know, I think I have a pretty good ear for when people are just kind of being full of bravado. He was solid, he was steady.

I said last night that some polls ask voters, "Who would you rather have a beer with?" I don't think that's the question in the 21st century.

Who would you rather be in a foxhole with? Who would you put the lives of your children and your family into the hands of? Those are the questions that I think voters are asking, and when they ask those questions, I think John Kerry is the answer.

WOODRUFF: One other contrast for the 2002 convention, is John Kerry and his campaign treating your husband and his administration differently from the way Al Gore treated your husband and his administration?

CLINTON: Oh, you know, I don't know. I think that may be overblown. I think in both instances, you have to run the campaign that you think will win.

And I'm very excited about it this year because we're going to do, both Bill and I, everything we possibly can to elect the Kerry- Edwards ticket. And it's really thrilling to see the Democratic Party united, to see the response from people around the country to what the Kerry-Edwards team is putting out there. And I'm very confident about victory in November.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WOODRUFF: More of my interview with Senator Clinton ahead. Find out what she has to say about Teresa Heinz Kerry' choice words.

Also ahead, three decades after his own presidential nomination, I'll talk with Jimmy Carter about his role in this convention and his party's quest to reclaim the White House.

Plus, we are wired and ready to bring you the inside story of this convention and how Republicans are trying to crash the party.

With 99 days until the election, this is INSIDE POLITICS, the place for campaign news.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WOODRUFF: (AUDIO GAP)

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CLINTON: I think she's doing fine. I think she's got a tremendous, you know, wonderful, energetic attitude that people are really responding to. And she's very open and she's independent, and she says what she thinks. And who hasn't been frustrated by, you know, reporters? I think that goes with the territory.

WOODRUFF: All right. Back to this convention, Judith Hope, who was -- was formerly chair of the New York Democratic Party, said it was a slap in the face that you were not originally given a prominent role speaking at this convention. What -- what happened here?

CLINTON: Oh, I don't know. I mean, I think that whatever happened has been totally worked out. And I have a great deal of understanding for how difficult it is to put together a convention program.

It is hard. And I'm just delighted to be here. I'm looking forward to introducing the last Democratic president and strongly endorsing the next Democratic president.

WOODRUFF: So nothing more to say about that?

CLINTON: No. I'm just excited about the convention and about this ticket.

WOODRUFF: Senator, you know very well what the conjecture is. It's not just among the press and the pundits. It's a lot of Democrats are saying it's you and John Edwards spoiling for whatever in 2008, if this ticket doesn't make it this year, or 2012, if it does.

CLINTON: You know, Judy, I just don't see politics as a zero-sum game like that. And I guess it makes for interesting speculation. But I don't think that's any way to live a life.

I think you have to do what you believe is right every single day. And that's what I'm trying to do as the senator from New York.

I also think that it's great being part of a winning team. You know, I loved being part of the winning team in '92 and '96. I'm looking forward to being part of the winning team in 2004.

I think John Edwards brings so much to this ticket. He's going to be a terrific energizing force, not only on the campaign trail, but as vice president.

What I care about is team America. Yes, I'm a Democrat, and I'm proud to be Democrat. But I believe that we are at a moment in our history where we've got to be unified, we have to be up to the challenges we face. And one of my great sadnesses about this president is that after 9/11, when he had a chance to unify the country, he chose a different direction.

He decided to adopt the old divide and conquer strategy, and I think that's been a losing strategy for him. But it's also been very unfortunate for America.

WOODRUFF: Well, speaking of 9/11, there's a report today that the president is now saying he is going to implement by executive order some of the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission. Is this going to undercut any effort by Senator Kerry to make an issue of that report?

CLINTON: Well, I don't think so. He's had two-and-a-half years since 9/11 to do more than he's done. And unfortunately, I and others have been urging a different strategy for all that time.

I have taken to the Senate floor many, many times to argue that we didn't have a national strategy when it came to protecting our borders or our ports or our critical infrastructure. And we didn't have a good strategy for getting money where it was most needed; namely, to our police officers and our firefighters, our cities, our front-line defenders.

I have been saying that, a lot of people have been saying that. You know, maybe it's fine now that the president is going to try to implement some of the 9/11 Commission report recommendations, which I think is absolutely critical, but we need to make sure that we have a president in office come January who will actually follow through.

We get a lot of rhetoric from this administration on homeland security and other issues. And then when the cameras are off, basically they just let it die. Because look what they've done. They've driven our country into this huge deficit hole that can't afford to do what we need to do on homeland security.

The most sacred thing to them far above security is protecting their tax cuts for the wealthiest one percent of Americans. So it just doesn't add up. We need new leadership and a new direction.

WOODRUFF: Last question, back to the convention. You're going to be speaking here tonight, introducing your husband. We are told that the Kerry campaign has been asking speakers to delete any criticism of President Bush. Have they asked you to -- you and your husband to do that?

CLINTON: No. But, you know, we're not usually hyper-critical. You know, we like to draw contrasts. And we think the contrasts speak for themselves.

So I think you'll hear a lot of contrast-drawing tonight from my husband and me. But I think that the case for John Kerry positively is so strong, that this is the week to present it.

Most people know what they don't like or they're worried about when it comes to the Bush administration. What we want to do is to get them to feel very comfortable in the choice of John Kerry for our next president.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WOODRUFF: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

REMARKS BY SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY) AND PRESIDENT BILL CLINTON AT THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL CONVENTION, 7/26/2004

LOCATION: THE FLEETCENTER, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

SEN. CLINTON: I am practically speechless. (Cheers, applause.) However -- (cheers, applause).

Twelve years ago -- (chants of "Hillary, Hillary!") -- when our country needed new leadership, Americans selected a Democrat who gave us eight years of peace, prosperity and promise. (Cheers, applause.) Tonight -- tonight I have the pleasure of introducing the last great Democratic president -- (cheers, applause) -- but first I want to say a few words about the next great Democratic president, John Kerry. (Cheers, applause.)

You know, I, like all of you, just heard the moving testimonials about the horrors of September the 11th and the extraordinary witnessing by Reverend Alston concerning his lieutenant, John Kerry. HILLARY-BILL-DNC-MONDAY PAGE 2 07/26/2002 .STX

I don't know how any American could hear the Reverend Alston and not know John Kerry is the man we need to be our president and commander in chief! (Cheers, applause.)

And yes, we meet at a moment of great peril, but also of great promise for the country we love. Together we can once again widen the circle of opportunity for all Americans. We can once again transcend our differences and divisions. We can once again give our children a safer and more secure future. That is the promise of America, and John Kerry will renew and keep that promise to this generation and generations to come. He knows very well that you have to lead the world, not alienate it. He will -- (cheers, applause.) He will lower the deficit, not raise it. He will create good jobs, not lose them. And he will solve a health care crisis for our people, not ignore it. (Cheers, applause.)

Now I know a thing or two about health care. (Laughter, applause.) And I know that the problems have only gotten worse in the last four years. We need to rededicate ourselves to the task of providing health care coverage for the 44 million Americans who don't have it. (Applause.) And we have to do more to lower the costs for all the rest of Americans, who are facing increasing health care insurance premiums and drug prices. (Applause.)

We also -- we also need to lift the ban on stem cell research -- (cheers, applause) -- and find cures that will help millions of Americans. (Applause continues.)

You know, health care is a serious issue, and it requires serious solutions. And that's what John Kerry is good at, and that's what he will give us.

He will also give us something else: a great vice president by the name of John Edwards. (Cheers, applause.)

Now you know that John Edwards is smart, he's energetic, and he's empathetic. And he understands the challenges that hardworking Americans face in their daily lives. Americans will be proud to have the Kerry-Edwards team in the White House, and they will be proud, as we all will be, to have their extraordinary partners, Teresa Heinz Kerry and Elizabeth Edwards, working for our country as well. (Cheers, applause.)

Now, you know, we've been through our share of challenges as Americans; you know, from a Civil War to a Great Depression to world wars and so much more. But being a senator from New York, I saw firsthand -- (cheers, applause) -- as all of my friends and colleagues did, the devastation of September the 11th. I visited Ground Zero the day after we were attacked, and I felt like I was standing at the gates of hell.

I hope no American ever has to witness a horrible sight like that ever again. And yet, that tragedy both changed and challenged us. I know it did for me. And every day now as a mother, as a senator, as an American, I worry about whether we are acting as wisely as we can to protect our country and our people.

Last week the bipartisan 9/11 commission issued its report, and that commission would never have been in existence had it not been for the brave family members who insisted that this government have a commission to look into 9/11. (Cheers, applause.) And those commissioners issued a sober call to action that we ignore at our peril.

John Kerry understands what's at stake when it comes to our security. We need to fully equip and train our firefighters, our police officers, and our emergency medical technicians. (Applause.)

They are our first responders in the event of a terrorist attack. And we need to secure our borders, our rail lines and our ports, as well as our chemical and nuclear plants.

We need to reorganize our federal government to meet the new threats of these times. And we need to make sure that homeland security is a priority, and that it is funded properly, and that the resources go to the areas of greatest risk, like New York City. (Cheers, applause.)

And along with that, we need to take care of our men and women in uniform, who like John Kerry, risk their lives, and for too many lost their lives in service to our country. These brave Americans deserve better. We need -- (cheers, applause). We need to increase our troop strength, we need to raise their pay. We need to provide our veterans, our National Guard and Reserve with the benefits they are entitled to for the service and duty they perform for our nation! (Cheers, applause.)

And do you know, do you know what we need to meet these challenges? We need a new commander in chief named John Kerry! (Cheers, applause.) I've been saying for many months now John Kerry is a serious man for a serious job in a serious time in our country's history.

So let's join together, not just those of us in this great hall tonight, but throughout our nation, and do everything we possibly can to convince our fellow Americans to look to the future, to look deep inside themselves. They know what is best for our children. And if we just have the courage to act on our conviction, we will, by an overwhelming majority, send John Kerry and John Edwards to do their duty for us in the White House starting next year! (Cheers, applause.)

I am very optimistic about this election because I think I know a great leader when I see one. (Cheers, applause.) And so does America! In 1992 and 1996, Americans chose a president who left our country in better shape than when he took office. (Cheers, applause.) And he still spends his days working to empower the powerless; to promote racial, religious and ethnic reconciliation; to inspire young people to citizen service; and to bring life-saving medicines to people living with HIV-AIDS throughout the world. (Cheers, applause.) He showed Democrats how to win again, and so will John Kerry.

Please welcome the 42nd president of the United States, Bill Clinton! (Cheers, applause.)

(Music: "Don't Stop Thinking About Tomorrow.")

(Cheers, applause.)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON INTELLIGENCE REORGANIZATION, 8/16/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thanks to our witnesses for being here today.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we're struggling with two very significant questions that are difficult to answer. One is, in a system with different and sometimes competing intelligence agencies, both for collection and analysis, how do we ensure accountability? And the second is, how do we ensure that executive branch officials do not cherry pick the intelligence that most conforms to their views, or I think in the words of Secretary Schlesinger, the concept of reality that they hold?

We're dealing with human beings, we're dealing with politics, we're dealing with, unfortunately, partisan politics. You had a Defense Department that already controlled 80 to 85 percent of the intelligence budget, and yet the current secretary of defense thought it necessary to create an Office of Special Plans and go and find even more intelligence to be used for whatever concept of reality existed.

You had a vice president who went over the CIA not once, but innumerable times, to find out what he could find out that would fit his concept of reality. So we need a system that can ensure accountability, but also put some checks and balances back into this system. It is certainly clear that many signals were missed. There's no doubt about that, but I think it would be a shame and a tragic indictment of all of us if we are not more straightforward and honest about the problems we face.

I listened with great interest to my friend Senator Sessions go on and on about the questions concerning tradecraft and the exposure of people, yet I have not heard one call from anyone on the other side of the aisle to conduct a congressional investigation to the outing of Valerie Plame. Talk about an example that's going to send shockwaves through the existing CIA and any of our friends and allies around the world. There's no drum beat for any congressional investigation. Why? Because it's in partisan politics.

So, I mean, I think we can rearrange the deck chairs on the Titanic from now until doomsday, but we need to reassert a sense of ethics and responsibility that go beyond partisan politics, again, to get back to sort of an old-fashioned American patriotism, where our highest obligation is to whatever the facts lead us to. And I don't know how we get that by changing statutes, laws and rearranging government positions.

I also think it would be irresponsible of our committee not to take a hard look at Defense Intelligence. It may very well be, and I think the arguments are quite compelling, that you don't want to interfere with the chain of command or in any way upset the tactical intelligence that's needed in combat. But there have been mistakes, and there have been missed opportunities, both operational and tactical.

I still don't understand what happened at Tora Bora. I don't understand what happened when the Predator allegedly had bin Laden in their sites and didn't fire. I don't know what happened. I think we need to know what happened.

So, even if we conclude that it is not prudent to put any overarching authority over Defense Intelligence, we better make sure we're doing whatever is needed to improve Defense Intelligence, both collection and analysis, and not act as though, oh, well, we're not going to mess with Defense Intelligence because that might possibly interrupt the chain of command and tactical.

We need to make sure we're doing the best job we can with Defense Intelligence. So, there was an example, and the 9/11 Commission talks about it. They call it the millennium exception. At a certain point in time, all the forces of our government were called into a room, day after day after day, run by the national security adviser, because after all, all of these decisions are ultimately going to be decided in the White House. I don't care who you put in charge anywhere else.

And what we need to do is to figure out how to have a system that replicates what worked the one time in our recent history where we think it worked. And that required literally having people in the same room, being held accountable, having their information vetted, asking for further information from the collection, as well as the analyst side.

So, I think that it's important that we take seriously the need to reorganize, if it is necessary, but there's a much more important, deeper issue at stake here, and that is to try to de-politicize the collection, analysis, cherry picking, utilization of intelligence, no matter where it comes from. And I hope that that won't even be an issue, post-9/11. But, as I say, the outing of Valerie Plame does not give me a lot of confidence -- that we would use a CIA operative for partisan political advantage.

So, I guess from my perspective, and I take very seriously what each of you have said. I have high regard for your opinions, based on many years of service, but let's focus for just a minute in the area of each of your expertise.

Are there types of changes that you think our defense and military intelligence need to make to improve on its performance going forward in both battlefield situations, like Afghanistan and Iraq? And with respect to the point that my colleague Senator Dayton made, he's beating this horse quite vigorously at every hearing, because he is, as I think rightly so, quite appalled by what the tick-tock is that broke down a chain of command under unusual, but nevertheless pressing, circumstances.

So could each of you just address the defense and military intelligence issue for a moment?

SCHLESINGER: Several comments. The first, Senator Clinton, is there may be cherry picking, but it doesn't not affect, in my judgment, collection, which you mentioned. I think that the collection activities go on. I think that the attempt -- we have had failures in collection, most obviously HUMINT in Iraq, but I don't think that the problem of collection is either partisan politics or cherry picking. Now, the interpretation is a problem.

The second point that I would make is in the past we have, as you indicated, had less partisan politics, and I join with you in wishing that we could return to those days. But one must distinguish between partisan -- problems of partisan politics and the problems of real policy differences. And real policy differences are appropriate, and people will disagree with regard to what should be done given certain circumstances. They may do that for partisan reasons, but there are an irreducible level of policy differences.

The third point I would make is, while you're here on Armed Services, strengthen the DIA. You ask what do you do about Defense Intelligence? It is not a real competitor, in my judgment, for the CIA, and we would be better off analytically if we had a stronger DIA.

CARLUCCI: Well, certainly, I think we can all agree, those of us who have served professionally, that partisan politics is very damaging to our intelligence capability and to our military efforts.

I think the one area that requires some attention is the distinction between national intelligence and tactical intelligence becoming increasingly blurred. You mentioned Tora Bora. Well, that fighter in the field actually has to know everything there is to know about bin Laden, his whereabouts. Things that used to be considered national intelligence now have to get into the tactical area. So that argues, once again, for some kind of closer relationship between the DCI and the Defense Department intelligence agencies.

HAMRE: Senator, lots of areas that we need to work. Specifically, I think the need in DOD is for what we call long-dwell collection capabilities. We have two types right now. We have collection that comes from airplanes that fly around, and that's a little like looking over an area with a spotlight, and so it doesn't -- you can only look at a little spot for a period of time. And then of course we have satellites, and they have huge coverage, big, floodlight type thing, but they last for 10 minutes and then you won't be back for another hour and a half.

What we're really needing in the defense world is what we call long dwell, the capacity to get broad area surveillance that can linger, so it has the best attributes of both. It has the capacity to see wide areas but stay over the target area for a long time. Now, that's going to be done with a new generation of remotely piloted vehicles, largely, is going to be the way we'll do this.

It's a ways away, and there are some very serious technical challenges associated with it. They should be military assets, in my view. They should be funded under the TIARA and JMIP, because you want them integrated into war fighting. But they'll have tremendous capacity in the national world as well, and that's a very good example where the tactical systems will feed the national environment.

We do that a lot. That's a good case in point where you would not want to break that relationship, and you'd probably want to put the lead on developing that inside the Defense Department for it. But that's a case in point, and we could come up with other examples like that for you.

CLINTON: Thank you.

WARNER: Thanks, Senator.

Senator, I'm sure you're fully aware, because of your interest in the situation, the Wilson -- Ambassador Wilson's wife -- that the Federal Bureau of Investigation is now having an ongoing criminal investigation. And it's been my experience that when that is taking place, should a parallel investigation begin in Congress, it could impede or imperil the work of the FBI.

CLINTON: Mr. Chairman, I remember very well federal grand jury investigations that had congressional investigations going on simultaneously.

WARNER: I defer to your recollection.

CLINTON: I have personal experience with that.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON DEFENSE INTELLIGENCE REORGANIZATION, 8/17/2004

CLINTON: Oh, thank you Mr. Chairman, and I thank you for holding these hearings.

There are so many questions and so little time, and everyone has been here for so long. I would ask unanimous consent to submit some additional questions for the record, Mr. Chairman.

WARNER: The record will remain open close of business today for further questions to the panel by all members.

CLINTON: Thank you.

There are a number of questions that the 9/11 families have provided that I feel are very important, and I want to submit them.

CLINTON: Senator Dayton was able to ask a variety of questions about the activities on the day of 9/11; the chain of command, NORAD, et cetera.

I think he will be furthering those, and I will add to them as well.

I don't think any of us disagree with the very strong assumption that whatever we do cannot and should not in any way undermine the provision of intelligence to our war fighters and our combatant commanders. But I think there is a concern on the part of not just the 9/11 families, but many people who have watched the interplay between the Department of Defense and the intelligence agencies and the provision of information to the commander in chief over a number of years.

At the end of the day, the Defense Department has an enormous amount of authority, both explicit and implicit, which it operates under and which it does use to influence how intelligence is not only collected and analyzed, but how it's used for decision making.

So, among the questions that the 9/11 families have asked me to pose to you, Secretary Rumsfeld, are the following.

Imagine, for the sake of argument, that there is an NID as proposed by the 9/11 Commission. What are the assurances that you would need in the legislation that would enable you to feel comfortable that the war fighters and combatant commanders were provided for and that the primary obligation of providing tactical intelligence was protected?

Secondly, with respect to tactical intelligence, I think it is important, as I said yesterday, that we not go into this assuming that everything is 100 percent perfect in the area of tactical intelligence.

CLINTON: I think that would be a mistake. I think that there are questions that need to be raised, and among them are those that have been raised by officers who have testified before this committee, starting last spring, with respect to lessons learned.; And in the 9/11 Commission, pages 210-212, there is a description of the coordination problems between DOD and CIA that resulted in what they call a missed opportunity to use armed predators to attack Osama Bin Laden.

There have also been questions raised with respect to the intelligence that was used or not used in the battle situation known as Tora Bora, so I think that part of our obligation on this committee is not just to assume that everything the DOD does has a level of perfection, and we're only looking at the intelligence outside of DOD.

And I know that inside DOD there are lots of after-action reports and lessons learned. And I think it's important that as we proceed with this enquiry as to how to reform intelligence, we have the advantage of your recommendations, with respect to changes at the tactical level that could influence some of these decisions going up the chain.

And finally, this is also directed to Assistant Secretary Cambone, it is bewildering to me that there were pieces of information within DOD, within CIA, within FBI, that were not shared, and that has nothing to do with budget authority, it has nothing to do with human intelligence capacity. It has to do with a breakdown somewhere in the chain that would have gotten information pushed to the top and shared among respective agencies.

If any of you can lend any light to the operational opportunities that were missed, again as set forth in the 9/11 Commission on pages 355 and 356, I think for any of us who read this, it is very hard to understand how the FBI wouldn't be given information that the CIA had, and that continued with respect to Iraq.

CLINTON: As I understand, the problems with the so-called source curve ball, that information was not conveyed to the CIA as to the background of this individual, the reliability of his information.

So we can spend a lot of time talking about rearranging the boxes on the organization chart, but unless there is a fundamental commitment to the sharing of information, at all levels -- you know, national, strategic, operational, tactical -- we're just spinning our wheels.

And finally, because I know you have to put in a lot of words before the times goes up, this whole question of secrecy is something that I think deserves a lot of attention. My predecessor, the late Senator Moynihan, wrote a book called "Secrecy," which I commend to you because in it he raises some very interesting questions about what we need to keep secret and what we don't need to keep secret.

And, in fact, we have overclassified a lot of information that if not kept secret, could have actually helped people at all levels of our government respond to situations that they were confronted by. And it is, I think, a legitimate concern that we have to figure out how to keep secret what is worth keeping secret.

But we have to put this overclassifying and create almost an incentive for people to share information and sometimes to, I think, very detrimental consequences such as the outing of Valerie Plame and also the latest outrage which was the revealing of Mr. Khan's name. I mean, I find those things just inexcusable and unbelievable. And it happens all the time.

So I think the whole question about secrecy, what should or shouldn't be classified, needs to be looked at at the same time.

CLINTON: So having exhausted, I'm sure, my time, I'd appreciate any response that any of you might have to any of these points.

RUMSFELD: I'll leave the CIA/FBI piece to John McLaughlin, but let me just say that you're exactly right, that the problem of stovepiping and not sharing information is a serious one. It is addressed in this report by the 9/11 Commission properly. It's been addressed by the executive branch.

It occurs not only between organizations, as you suggest, but within organizations.

And second, I'm familiar with Pat Moynihan's book on secrecy, and you're correct there, too. When you're dealing with these things everyday, I very often ask: Why is this classified? And give me a declassified version that comes out almost the same.

It is because, I suppose people are busy, they want to be safe, not sorry. And there is a process, always, to review after some period of time. But the overclassification is, I agree, something that very properly ought to be addressed in a serious way. And we'd be happy to respond to some of the other questions in your comments for the record.

CLINTON: What about the issue of curve ball? Dr. Cambone?

MCLAUGHLIN: Well, maybe Steve has a comment on it, but it's properly in my arena as well.

My sense, looking back at that one was that the real problem, Senator Clinton, was the fact that we collectively -- the Defense Intelligence and CIA -- did not have direct access to that source, which generated over 100 technically seemingly solid reports from a technical basis.

And I think that was the key thing that impeded the use of that source. I don't know whether Steve had something to add on that or not.

"This Week with George Stephanopoulos," 8/29/2004

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS, ABC NEWS

(Off Camera) And we're back with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. Welcome.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON,

DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK

Thank you.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Well, actually, thank you for having is in your town.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Welcome to New York.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) We're also here with a lot of protesters, up to 250,000 demonstrating this morning. Their goal is obviously to hurt President Bush. But are you concerned at all that it's going to backfire, and what's your message to them?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, George, I think that, you know, peaceful protest is just part of the American political system. And everyone has a right to have their views demonstrated and heard. And as long as people act appropriately, I think that's fine. But you know, my real message is that the best form of making their views known is voting in November. If they do not approve of the policies of this administration, which many of them do not, then they should be sure that they and all of their compatriots are registered. That they are motivated to turn out and vote. Because, you know, this is such an important election, that's why they're obviously out there hoping that people will pay attention to their views on all of the domestic and international issues of the day. But the election will determine the direction of the country, not a protest here in New York.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) A lot of people will also be paying attention this week to the families of the 9/11 victims, since we are in New York. And "The New York Times" had a remarkable survey of the families this morning. One of the things they found were that more of the families blamed President Clinton for 9/11 than President Bush. What do you say to them?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I have had a lot of personal encounters and contact with members of the families. And you know, it still is such a horrible personal loss that people are going through. I think the 9/11 commission did a very important and commendable job in trying to sort through the facts, trying to, you know, disentangle all of the feelings, the opinions, the emotions from what we know. And I think what they concluded, which I believe is a fair rendering, is that there were missed opportunities. They list ten missed opportunities in the 9/11 commission. Six of those in the first eight months of the Bush administration, four of those in the eight years of the Clinton administration. But they also point out that the only exemplary action that they could point to with respect to our government coming together to deal with the threat of terrorism took place around the millennium, when the Clinton administration really had all hands on deck. So my view is that we need to be looking toward the future, we need to be trying to figure out what we can do to ensure the maximum safety. There is no 100 percent solution. But there is more we could do. I've been speaking out about the need for more homeland security money right here in this city. I think the Republicans will have a wonderful time in New York, how couldn't they, you know, it's the greatest city in the world. But the fact is that their policies and the president's budget are cutting money for firefighters and police officers and we haven't accurately and I think effectively distributed the homeland security money too.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) You gave an interview to "Time" magazine that's out this morning, where you called President Bush a bait and switch politician. What do you mean by that?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, well, you know, you look at that 2000 campaign, and compassionate conservatism, and a uniter, not a divider, you know, you couldn't hear anything else. Well, in fact, that's not the case. But again, they're coming to New York, they're going to run a kind of Potemkin convention where they will have people on the stage who don't run the Congress, don't run the administration, but are going to be putting the kinder and gentler compassionate conservative look on this administration.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Governor Pataki in prime time.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Yes, and you know, Governor Schwarzenegger and people like that. I really believe that the show that the Republicans will put on is not going to fool the American people this time. You know, back in 2000, people didn't have any experience. The governor from Texas said, you know, I want to be a uniter, and he's run one of the most divisive administrations in our country's history. He said he was going to be compassionate and conservative, he's been neither. I think, though, the reality show that we've lived the last three and a half years is going to trump any effort to try to divert and deflect attention from the true agenda of this administration.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) You know, you know, the Republicans say the same thing about Senator Kerry, that he says one thing and does another. The phrase they always bring up is when he said I voted for the $87 billion for Iraq before I voted against it. And both you and he voted for the Iraq resolution. But you've been very critical of how President Bush has used that authority. If you knew now what you knew then about, if you knew then what you knew now about how President Bush has used that authority, would you vote to give it to him again?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

George, we wouldn't have had a vote. There is no way any president could have brought a vote to the United States Congress in the absence of good intelligence, with no credible plan. We wouldn't have had a vote. And I think that, you know, one of the judgments that the American people will have to make about this administration is whether or not they are competent. I mean, we're talking about not just miscalculations, which the president finally admitted to in an interview on Friday, we're talking about a series of wrong judgments that have literally been matters of life and death. So I think that the American people have a chance in the next two months to really hold this administration accountable. But it's not just on foreign policy, and the miscalculations there, it's domestically as well. You know, every time we have more information, we are just, unfortunately, given more evidence that, you know, we have more people in poverty, we have more people losing their health insurance. We have not one net new job under this administration's leadership. I think it's a sorry record. And I hope that what worked for them in 2000, which was diverting and deflecting and baiting and switching and pretending to be one thing but turning out to be something else has run its course.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) So you don't think you made a mistake voting for the resolution?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Oh, I think based on the information that we had at the time, I don't regret giving the president authority but as I've said many times, I regret the way he used that authority.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Why don't you think Senator Kerry answered the question the way you just have right now?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I think he did, George. I think that, you know, I have a high regard for Senator Kerry personally and professionally. I think he is an incredibly thoughtful, tough-minded person who wants to understand issues. He doesn't just adopt a position and stick with it and make consistency some kind of virtue even when the evidence is against, you know, the position you've taken. I think that his approach has been rooted in an understanding of the world that we are desperately in need of today.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) He's also called on secretary of defense Rumsfeld again in the wake of this Abu Ghraib report to resign. Do you believe Secretary Rumsfeld should resign?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I'm hoping that we fire the entire administration November 2nd. You know, I don't think that one cabinet member, even one as powerful as Secretary Rumsfeld is the answer. You know, the policy starts in the White House, the president and the vice president are the ones who've been setting the policy. They've had, you know, willing allies throughout their administration to carry out these wrongheaded policies. But there's another perfect example, I mean, the Schlesinger report, the report from Generals Fay and Jones clearly point out that there was a climate created, that accountability does run to the highest levels at the Pentagon-. This administration has only ...

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) But excuse me, right there, if that's true, why shouldn't Secretary Rumsfeld resign now?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, my view is that the entire administration should be gone in two months and they will be gone in two months if the American people get the facts and the evidence that they need to form the right decision and make the choice that is in the best interest of our country.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) You know, this morning, also in "Time" magazine, Laura Bush was asked about the swiftboat ads that have been run against Senator Kerry. And she was asked if they were unfair. And she said not really. Do you agree with that?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Oh, I think that's unfortunate. Because of course, they're not only unfair, they're flat out wrong. Even the president has, you know, regretted that they're being used in this way. You know, the bottom line here is John Kerry is an authentic war hero. In fact, that's a phrase that Zell Miller used about him in 2001. It's a phrase that anyone who looks at the record would have to repeat. And this attempt by the Republicans to smear a man of John Kerry's character and courage goes to the heart of their pathetic campaign.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) You said the Republicans. Do you believe President Bush is behind it?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, certainly people close to his campaign have been involved in it. I don't think, you know, if you find a turtle on a fencepost it didn't get there by accident. I think you have got to point to the fact there has been a concerted effort to engage in these smear tactics against Senator Kerry in order to divert attention from the failure of their domestic policies. They don't want to talk about the economy or their fiscal policies that have driven us back into debt and deficit. They don't want to talk about people losing their health insurance, the latest number is 5.2 million, or the four million Americans who have fallen back into poverty. They can't talk about a their record, so they either explicitly or implicitly encourage these kind of smear tactics, and then when asked will not condemn the advertising that engages in these smear tactics and uses falsehoods to try to impugn Senator Kerry.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) But many have said that Senator Kerry brought this on himself. He made his Vietnam record fair game by highlighting it at the convention and especially his antiwar activities. And I wonder, do you understand why people might be upset with Senator Kerry's 1971 testimony and his antiwar activities?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

But you know, George, it would be fair game to debate that but not to try to smear his courage under fire in Vietnam. Those are two different issues. You know, John Warner, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee on which I serve, was the secretary of the Navy at this time in history. He has said that John Kerry deserved every medal he received. You know, so if you're going to argue about the courage that I believe Senator Kerry showed when he returned from Vietnam and tried to prevent the loss of more lives, you know, at the time he returned, I think the death toll was 44,000. We lost, you know, more than 10,000 additional young, you know, men in the ensuing years. You know, argue about that but don't stand up there and pretend that you have information which is discredited at every turn that would in any way impugn his character. So my view is that, yeah, you can argue that you don't think that he should have tried to prevent further loss of life. I frankly think that it showed his, you know, his courage under a different set of circumstances. But this is all intended, this entire smear and this attempt to divert and deflect attention from the real issues of the campaign. And you know, when all is said and done on November 3rd, what happened 30 years ago is not relevant to what is going to happen in the lives of the American people.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Let's turn to some of those issues that are happening today. You know, you've seen these reports over the weekend that Larry Franklin, an analyst in the Pentagon, is being targeted by the FBI, according to many reports, for spying for Israel. Both Israel, the state of Israel, and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, a Washington lobby supportive of Israel, that's also implicated in some of these reports, have denied any wrongdoing whatsoever. Are you 100 percent confident that they had no involvement?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I don't think we know. I mean, I think the first the most of us knew about this was the reports in the paper in the last, you know, 48 hours. You know, let's see where the investigation goes.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) But you're not, you're not concerned about AIPAC?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

You know, I don't think anybody knows, you know, what the facts are. And so, you know, I've learned a long time ago, let's just wait and see what happens with the investigation.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) You mentioned a few minutes ago Zell Miller. He's a Democrat, he's giving the keynote speech at the Republican convention, 12 years ago in Madison Square Garden for Bill Clinton, he gave the keynote address for Bill Clinton. What happened to Zell Miller?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Right. Well, he would have to answer that. But you know, 12 years ago he was very concerned about fiscal responsibility and that deficit that had been run up in the 12 years prior to the '92 election. You know, I don't hear him talking a lot about that a lot this time. And as I said, in 2001 in Georgia, he introduced John Kerry, he called him an authentic war hero, he commended him for the work he had done in the Senate to try to get the budget balanced and to bring some fiscal sanity to Washington. So you'd have to ask him what happened.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Finally, you know, I want to show a poll that the NBC and "The Wall Street Journal" did this week, of Republicans, and they showed that of all the Democrats in the country, you're the most disliked. You beat out President Clinton, you beat out Senator Kennedy, Jesse Jackson, Al Gore, and Senator John Kerry. For you, is that a badge of honor or something to fix?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, it's a perverse form of flattery, I guess. I don't know. I can't worry about that.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Nothing you need to do about it?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Actually, you know, I feel very good about the work I've done here in New York, and the work I've done in the Senate and you know, when you take strong stands and when you stand up for what you believe in, and when you take on the Republicans for their tactics, as I try to do, because I think it's bad for the country, I suppose, you know, that will engender some reaction. But it doesn't bother me.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) We also have Governor Pataki on the program today. As you know, some talk that he's gonna challenge you in 2006 for the New York Senate. Formidable opponent?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

You know, I don't worry about who might or might not run. I can't worry about that. I just do what I try to do everyday. And just, I love my job, I love what I'm doing. And I'm working hard to elect John Kerry and John Edwards because I really believe that four more years of this administration with its international and domestic policies would be incredibly damaging to America.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) But you are going to run for reelection?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I intend to.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Finally, what's the one thing that Republicans coming to New York shouldn't miss?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

They should just have a great time and they should also thank all of our police officers and firefighters, and then tell the Republican administration to fund our police officers and our firefighters, give us the homeland security money that these brave American men and women need and deserve to do the job they're doing for the Republicans and they job they do for New York everyday.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) Senator Clinton, thanks very much.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Thanks.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS

(Off Camera) We'll be back.

ANNOUNCER

Once again, from New York, George Stephanopoulos.

"CNN Late Edition with Wolf Blitzer," CNN, 8/29/2004

The junior Democratic senator from New York state, Hillary Rodham Clinton, is a key part of that Democratic Party effort. Just a short while ago here at Madison Square Garden, I spoke with Senator Clinton about the Republican Convention, concerns about terror and much more.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Senator Clinton, welcome to Madison Square Garden. You've been here many times, but not at a Republican Convention.

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: You're absolutely right about that. In fact, as we were just talking, there's never been a Republican Convention in New York before. So I'm delighted to be part of the welcoming committee.

BLITZER: You wanted this Republican Convention here in New York, didn't you?

CLINTON: I wanted anything that would show that we were open for business and just the greatest city in the world after 9/11. And I'm delighted that the Republicans are here. I hope they spend a lot of money and a lot of time here.

BLITZER: Is it going to cost New York State a lot of money to deal with this Republican Convention?

CLINTON: Well, the security costs are enormous. We were able to get some money from the Congress to help defray the costs in both New York and Boston. But, you know, it's just a very difficult financial commitment to do what we do better than anybody in the world, which is provide security.

And I'm hoping that, maybe as a result of their being here, the Republicans, led by the president, will give us some more help with our homeland security needs.

BLITZER: Is everything in place security-wise? Are you confident that the threat levels and all of that have been worked out so that everyone who comes here will be safe and secure?

CLINTON: You know, Wolf, I met earlier with the mayor and Commissioner Ray Kelly. I'm confident that they have done everything they know to do that is humanly possible.

Now, I do wish we had more federal resources for our ports, for example, for our rail lines, for our subways. But given what needed to be done, I am very confident that the team in New York City has done it better than anybody else could.

BLITZER: All right. Let's talk a little bit about politics right now. Those Swift Boat ads going against the Democratic presidential nominee, John Kerry. Did he wait too long to respond vocally and aggressively and deal with that issue?

CLINTON: You know, Wolf, it's so sad that these smear tactics have been undertaken by this group and, apparently, with at least the knowledge, if not complicity, of high-ranking members in the Bush administration.

And this is a tactic not only to impugn the courage and the character of Senator Kerry, which I think is beyond dispute -- the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, on which I serve, Senator Warner, was the secretary of Navy during this time. He said that, you know, John Kerry earned and has earned every medal he received.

But this is really an effort to not only, you know, fight the Vietnam War all over again, but to divert attention from the issues that are important right here and now and that will affect the future of our country, at home and abroad.

BLITZER: Who are the high-ranking officials in the Bush administration who were at least complicit in this?

CLINTON: Well, of course, the counsel to the campaign, who had to resign. And then very close...

BLITZER: But he's not a member of the administration. He's a member of the campaign.

CLINTON: But I said the campaign, the campaign. But, you know, I mean, I think we're splitting hairs.

But the real bottom line is that they were not only inaccurate, but they were smear tactics. And they were designed to divert attention.

So, you know, people are focused on the response. A lot of the outrage is by the effort to try to undermine the heroism and courage of a young man who did his duty for his country, came home, and has had a distinguished life of public service.

BLITZER: But one thing you learned and former President Clinton learned early on, when attacked, you don't wait, as Michael Dukakis did in '88. You go right back on the offensive. He waited two, three, four weeks as this was building up and up and up. And clearly, according to the polls, it's had a negative impact on him.

CLINTON: Well, I think that, you know, you can always debate tactics. The bottom line is that these were, you know, smears. And I think the American public are seeing that.

And they're also understanding that this convention, which is about to start tomorrow, is sort of a bait-and-switch convention. They're going to talk about things that they are, you know, not really committed to. They're going to have leaders who don't have any influence in Washington.

And I think what the Kerry campaign has done in a very consistent way is to point out the miscalculations and the wrong direction that this administration has taken us.

BLITZER: You said in an interview in the new issue of Time magazine, and you're hinting at it right now, "I don't think that we have had a president in recent memory who did such an about-face after getting elected. I can only conclude that he's a bait-and-switch politician."

All right. Explain specifically that charge.

CLINTON: Right. Well, you know, just two examples.

The compassionate conservative theme that we heard all the time in 2000, and this administration has been neither compassionate nor conservative. Certainly, it's been quite radical on many agenda items, most particularly the abrupt move back into these deficits and the reckless fiscal policies, the fact that no jobs have been created, that...

BLITZER: But didn't he avoid a recession?

CLINTON: No, no.

BLITZER: Wasn't there 9/11? Weren't there factors out there that caused these economic problems?

CLINTON: Well, you know, Wolf, there's always a business cycle. And the recession technically started in March of 2001, and there probably would have been some need for adjustments.

But what this administration has done is to throw the baby out with the bath. Instead of making mid-course corrections, instead of having some affordable tax cuts, they, indeed, had these massive tax cuts that totally obliterated the surplus that was projected.

And because of that, they have not been able to find their footing when it comes to the economy. And this will be the first administration since Herbert Hoover under which not one new job has been created.

Across the domestic agenda we see that. You know, the recent Census figures: 4 million people have fallen into poverty, 5.2 million people have lost their health insurance.

These are dire bits and pieces of information that, I think, put together, paint a very dramatic picture of an administration that said it would do one thing and has done something else.

BLITZER: In the past year, though, things have gotten better. A million new jobs have been created in the past year, albeit that a few million were lost in the first...

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: Albeit? If it's your job, that's pretty important.

BLITZER: But it's still getting better. The economic growth of the country seems to be moving in the right direction.

CLINTON: I just don't see that. I think that there have been, you know, some signs of improvement, thank goodness, for everybody's sake. But on balance, what you've got are 4 million more people in poverty than there were just 3 1/2 years ago; 5.2 million people who've lost their health insurance; 45 million people without health insurance now; not one new net job created.

And, you know, this president also campaigned on being a uniter, not a divider. And, for goodness sakes, that was the greatest bait and switch, you know. And it's especially painful for many of us because, after 9/11, we united behind our president, and I thought that was the appropriate thing to do. But instead of using that unity, the president has gone far to the right and has appealed to the most right-wing elements of his constituents.

BLITZER: Having said that, let's take a look at the latest CNN- USA Today-Gallup poll. "Who's more likely to stand up for what he believes in?" The president, 52 percent; John Kerry, only 35 percent.

The American people are confused, at best, about John Kerry, what he stands for. That's a problem he has.

CLINTON: Well, I think, though, as the campaign has moved forward and the issues have been joined, I'm very confident that by November a majority of voters is going to say that you can be consistent, and maybe in some respects that is a positive, but when you're consistently wrong, as this president has been, and refuse to make any kind of mid-course adjustments -- finally the president on Friday in an interview said that he made a miscalculation in Iraq.

Well, all of us have known that for months. You know, he refused to admit any mistakes.

This president is on a path that, with four more years, would render our country really unrecognizable. You would see a decrease in the standard of living, a decrease in the income for the middle class, an increase in poverty. So many of the indicators would be going in the wrong direction.

BLITZER: The miscalculation he spoke about was the miscalculation that there would be such a spectacular, swift defeat of Saddam Hussein, and that they weren't necessarily ready for that huge victory in time to deal with the reconstruction.

CLINTON: Well, that's how he's tried to spin it. But as a matter of fact, there were a lot of people inside and outside the government who predicted exactly what happened. And they were given absolutely no opportunity to have their voices heard.

And, in fact, when the economic adviser, Mr. Lindsey, said this was going to cost $200 billion, when General Shinseki said this was going to be at least 200,000 troops, those were people who were basically shut out completely. They had a view of reality that was wrong.

So you can say that he's consistent, but he's been consistently wrong. He's wrong on issues about the economy, he's wrong on issues on education, on health care, on energy, on the environment, that I think all add up to a very strong case against him.

BLITZER: Do you agree with John Kerry that Donald Rumsfeld should resign as defense secretary?

CLINTON: Well, I'm hoping that the entire team is fired on November 2nd. I don't think this is just about the secretary of defense. I think this starts at the top, with the president and the vice president. And I'm hoping that we'll have a change in administrations.

BLITZER: So at this point you're not going to say what John Kerry said, that he should go?

CLINTON: Well, I think that, you know, it's a perfectly defensible position, but I'm looking even beyond that. I want to see all of them gone.

BLITZER: Do you agree with the president? He'd like to see all of these so-called 527 advocacy groups that are putting out all these attack ads, attack ads against John Kerry, the Swift Boat ads, attack ads against the president, would you like to see those 527 organizations removed?

CLINTON: You know, I have no problem with eliminating any group that is misusing their financial position to spread inaccurate falsehoods.

And that is indeed what has happened with respect to Senator Kerry. I haven't seen a lot of the other ones. I don't have a comment on that.

BLITZER: The other ones, ones that are attacking the president, are pretty, pretty strong, the ones from MoveOn.org and some of these other groups.

CLINTON: Right. Well, you know, then I think we need to take a look at all of this.

But the point here is that these smear tactics against Senator Kerry, which are totally wrong and false, are being used to divert attention back 35 years, when we should be looking forward four years.

And we need to keep our focus on what this administration, given what it's already done, is likely to do to our country if they have all the power as they're seeking in the next four years.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: More of our interview with Hillary Rodham Clinton. That's coming up.

We're also monitoring other live developments under way here in New York City, including Governor George Pataki, the governor of New York State. He's speaking out on Ellis Island right now, kicking off this Republican National Convention.

Across town at the Riverside Church, the former president of the United States, Bill Clinton, has just wrapped up speaking to churchgoers there. You see the former first lady, now the senator from New York, Hillary Rodham Clinton, there, as well. We taped our interview with her just before she went over to the church to meet up with her husband.

We're watching all these developments, including these large protests unfolding outside Madison Square Garden here in Manhattan. You're looking at live pictures of that.

We'll take a quick break, a check of what's making news right now. That's coming up. Then more of my interview with New York Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

More of our special "LATE EDITION" from Madison Square Garden. That's coming up.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICHARD CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: ... a man of his word, as the Taliban were the first to find out. Under the president's leadership, we drove them...

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Vice President Dick Cheney speaking at Ellis Island, welcoming Republicans to the national convention here in New York. We'll watch his words, go there live if necessary. The vice president of the United States already in New York for this week of the Republican National Convention.

Welcome back to "LATE EDITION."

Now let's continue with more of my interview with the New York Democratic senator, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Do you regret your vote in favor of giving the president the authority to go to war against Saddam Hussein's Iraq?

CLINTON: You know, Wolf, I have said I don't regret giving the president authority. I regret deeply the way he used that authority. And I think there is plenty of reason for us to question the decisions that were made from the moment that he received that authority.

BLITZER: But when you voted for that resolution, like almost everyone else, you believed Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction?

CLINTON: Right, right. Well, indeed I did. And if someone asked me that if we had known then what we know now, there wouldn't have been a vote. You know, no administration would have come to the Congress and asked for a vote that would have authorized any kind of action based on what we now know.

But, you know, we are where we are. And what we have to do at this point is get new leadership, so that we can prosecute the war on terrorism more effectively, so that we can actually have a fighting chance to be successful in Iraq.

BLITZER: Did those nearly 1,000 U.S. troops who have died in Iraq die in vain?

CLINTON: Oh, Wolf, I think that, you know, the removal of Saddam Hussein and the actions that our brave men and women in uniform have taken are a great credit to them, their families and our country. And they paid the price of their service in an ultimate fashion with the loss of their lives, plus the many who have been grievously injured.

You know, what we need to be focused on is which president is more likely to make decisions that will achieve our objectives with putting the least amount of lives at risk? You know, we were successful in Kosovo and we didn't lose a single American military person. And I think we need a smart strategy.

You know, I resent it when the Republicans say that we're better, meaning they are better, on national defense than the Democrats. It was Democratic presidents who prosecuted the wars that were successful in this past century that, you know, there's no debate about. And I am a strong proponent of a national defense that is smart.

BLITZER: But you have to admit, it was Democratic presidents, your husband, and Republican presidents, the first President Bush, who really didn't do enough to prevent this al Qaeda terror organization from developing the way it did throughout the '90s.

CLINTON: Well, I think, Wolf, the 9/11 Commission has it right, that there were probably 10 missed opportunities -- six of them during the first eight months of the Bush administration, four during the eight years of the Clinton administration.

But they also pointed out that the exemplary fashion that the Clinton administration dealt with the millennium threat is what should have been done going forward.

You know, every one of us learned things. The American people learned things about what our real threats were. Now we have to make sure we're doing all that we can do.

And that's where I part company with the administration. I don't think their homeland security strategy is up to the task that we confront.

BLITZER: We only have a little time left. I want to get through a couple points: Iran, one of the axis-of-evil countries based on what president said a couple of years ago.

How worried are you that the Iranians are developing a nuclear bomb? And what, if anything, should the U.S. do about it?

CLINTON: Well, obviously I'm concerned. I mean, the information coming out of Iran is somewhat mixed but, I think, points to a continuing desire to at least have nuclear capacity. And we need to be, you know, as engaged as we possibly can. And we need, this time, to try to bring the rest the world along with us.

BLITZER: Can the U.S. tolerate a nuclear power in Iran?

CLINTON: Well, I hope we never reach that point. I hope we're able, through a different approach than this administration has taken to date, in trying to muster public opinion and working with others as well as the Iranians, to try to reach a point where that's not necessary.

You know, the principle architect of the Iranian nuclear capacity is Russia. And, you know, we have a lot that we should be doing with Russia that we're not.

I just came back from a trip with John McCain to Estonia, the Arctic, and Iceland. And there's a lot of concern about, you know, Russia's actions and motivations.

There's a lot we should be doing. And we are so totally diverted in a way that I don't think leads to a safer, stronger America in the world.

BLITZER: You're a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee. There are reports now that the FBI's investigating the possibility of an Israeli spy at the Pentagon. What have you heard about this? Can you give us some perspective?

CLINTON: Wolf, all I know is what I read in the paper. I returned from this trip to the Arctic and Iceland, Ireland, other places last night. I've read the articles, and I'm waiting to see what the investigation proves.

BLITZER: You haven't checked? Your staff hasn't checked?

CLINTON: No. Well, they've been checking, but, you know, we're going to stick with what the public information is.

BLITZER: One final question. We spoke when you were running for Senate in Buffalo, New York, my hometown. You promised, at that point, you'd serve all six years, if elected. You've been elected. You're obviously going to serve six years.

But what about down the road in 2008, 2012? Would you like to be president of the United States?

CLINTON: You know, in 2008, I hope I'm going to be working for the reelection of John Kerry and John Edwards.

You know, I love my job. And I think you have a sense of it. I mean, you're from Buffalo. You know what a fabulous place New York is. I enjoy what I do every single day. I want to keep doing it.

BLITZER: A lot of conservative radio talk show hosts would love you to run for president.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: Well, it's a perverse form of flattery, I know, their obsession with me. But I'm doing what I want to do. And I'm going to do the best job I can do to elect John Kerry president.

BLITZER: Is it possible that Rudy Giuliani, you think, might be challenging you for reelection?

CLINTON: I have no idea. I have no idea. You know, that's not how I think. I'm just focused on what I can do, which is the best job that I'm capable of doing for the people of New York and everything that I can possibly do to elect John Kerry, elect, you know, more senators in the Senate, which I think would be good for New York and the country.

BLITZER: Senator Clinton, thanks for joining us here at the Republican National Convention.

CLINTON: Indeed, indeed. Thank you, Wolf. Thanks very much.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

"Meet the Press," NBC, 8/29/2004

MR. RUSSERT: And we are back. Senator Clinton, welcome.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, (D-NY): Thank you.

MR. RUSSERT: A former Goldwater girl and you were at the '68 Republican convention in Atlanta?

SEN. CLINTON: I was. I was there. Yep. I write about it in my book. You know, I had spent the summer as an intern for the House Republican Conference Committee, headed at that time by Gerald Ford. And had an incredible experience.

MR. RUSSERT: But now you're a full-fledged Democrat?

SEN. CLINTON: Yes, I am. Yes, I am. I've seen the light.

MR. RUSSERT: Five national polls this last week all show George Bush has pulled ahead of John Kerry. The president's favorable rating breaking 50 percent. In those two numbers, an incumbent has never lost an election for re-election. What's John Kerry's problem?

SEN. CLINTON: Oh, Tim, I think this is a close election. It's always been and it will be, right down to the wire. There's a lot of concern in the country about how to evaluate what our direction should be. But I am confident, as I have been from the very moment John got the nomination back in the spring, that he is going to be elected. And he's going to be elected because the failed policies on the domestic agenda of this administration cannot be ignored. I mean, these new census figures, 5.2 million more people have lost their health insurance, four million have fallen back into poverty. Not one new net job yet created under this administration. You know, the evidence cannot be ignored, deflected, and we can't be diverted from it. And eventually that's going to make the difference.

MR. RUSSERT: Has the Swift Boat Veterans ads distracted John Kerry and has now George Bush saying that Kerry's service was heroic ended that issue?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, it should have never started, because it's, you know, just such a tragedy that anyone would spread false stories about John's heroism under fire. There's no doubt that, you know, he served with great distinction and courage in Vietnam.

But the issues are not what happened 30 years ago. The smear tactics used very effectively by this group, in, you know, conjunction with people very high up in the Bush campaign have been an effort, not only to impugn Senator Kerry but, more importantly, to divert and deflect attention from what's really at stake internationally and domestically. So maybe now we can get back to talking about the future and where we go as a country.

MR. RUSSERT: Is Mayor Giuliani right that all the ads from 527 committees should be taken off the air, even those that are against George Bush?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, we're going to have to look at this whole 527 issue. Obviously, too much money is chasing too many issues that, unfortunately, are being distorted. I mean, if there was some standard of accuracy, you know, we wouldn't be here talking about it. But there isn't. But what I most regret is that we're not talking about what really matters to people on November 3, after they wake up after this election, and they're going to be confronted with a stagnant economy, a huge deficit and, unfortunately, a lot of problems that have really happened, not just on the president's watch, but because of the miscalculations of this administration.

MR. RUSSERT: But in the interim why not have, in effect, a truce and pull all 527 ads down on both sides?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I'd be for that. I don't think that you'll get agreement on that because there's too much, you know, intensity and too much money. But at the very least the public and the press should be alert and when you have falsehoods being spread, both to essentially assassinate the character of a candidate, and to try to divert attention from what's really at stake in the election, particularly here with the economy and all the other issues that are stake, you know, they ought to be called to account for that.

MR. RUSSERT: The speaker of the House has written a book where he takes to task you and other New Yorkers, and this is what he says: "Dennis Hastert is charging in a new book that New York lawmakers' attempt to win financial aid after the 9/11 attacks amounted to an 'unseemly scramble' for money..."

SEN. CLINTON: That's so sad. You know, we had to fight very hard, and it was a united delegation, Republicans, Democrats, downstate, upstate, everybody pulling together. You know, any of us who saw the devastation, which I know the speaker did, understood that we had to move quickly. We needed not only to reach out and help repair the physical damage and the emotional and tragic losses, but to send a signal to the world that New York was open for business. You know, it wasn't a mistake that we were attacked. We were attacked because of what we symbolize. So we did our part and I'm grateful that we were successful in getting the resources that New York needed and deserved.

MR. RUSSERT: Will you be able to get the formula changed so that New York is targeted and Washington is targeted because they are perhaps ground zero for a future attack?

SEN. CLINTON: Absolutely. You know, the way this works is that a lot of money does go out in a per capita basis, but then a lot of money on top of that is being distributed also on the basis of population. The president could issue an executive order tomorrow that redirected that money, and I wish he would, because what we're seeing in New York is a heroic effort on the part of our city, the firefighters, the police officers and others who are on alert. But we are losing money. We're not only losing money because we're not getting our fair share of the homeland security dollars, but under this president's budget, we're cutting the COPS program, we're cutting law enforcement grants, we're cutting money for firefighters. It doesn't add up, so we need to have the president take some leadership on this.

MR. RUSSERT: There's been a big discussion about Vietnam. Many people are wondering why this country is not debating Iraq in this presidential race. Jay Rockefeller, the vice chair of the Senate Intelligence Committee, was on this program a few weeks ago and this is what he said: "There is simply no question that mistakes leading up to the war in Iraq rank among the most devastating losses and intelligence failures in the history of the nation. The fact is that the administration at all levels, and to some extent us"--meaning Congress--"used bad information so bolster its case for war. And we in Congress would not have authorized that war--we would not have authorized that war--with 75 votes if we knew what we know now."

Do you agree with him?

SEN. CLINTON: There would not have been a vote, Tim. There would never have been a vote to the Congress presented by the administration. There would have been no basis for it. But we are where we are, and what I think we have to do now try to understand the series of miscalculations which for the first time ever the president admitted in an interview last week, have occurred which have rendered our situation more dangerous, less safe, and have put back the effort to try to stabilize and democratize Iraq. I believe with all my heart that, you know, we have to have new leadership at the highest level of our government in order to be successful in the strategy we have embarked upon in Iraq. No matter how we got there, and as I said, we wouldn't have even had a vote if all the facts had been available.

MR. RUSSERT: But John Kerry said he would vote again today for authorization, even knowing what he knows now. You don't agree with that.

SEN. CLINTON: Well, but I think the point John was making was the same one I was making, that we don't have a choice to have hindsight. You know, I have said many times, I think on this program, that I don't regret giving the president authority based on what we knew at the time, but I regret deeply the way he's used it.

I think there have been so many mistakes made, but it's not just in the international arena, and I want to keep coming back to this, because the economy is the number-one issue that people are living with. This president's not doing anything about outsourcing, his reckless fiscal policies have really put us into such a deep deficit hole, that whoever is president is going to have to start digging out. Unfortunately, this president doesn't seem to understand that. The energy dependence that we have and no plan to get us out of it. The appointments that are going to be made by a second term if, you know, there were one of this administration. All of this adds up to a very sobering picture of four years of unaccountable use of power based on, unfortunately, a past record of miscalculations which I don't think we can afford.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Kerry said that Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld should resign. Do you join him in that call?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I'm hoping the entire administration's fired on November 2. I think that it's not just the secretary of defense that needs to go, it's the entire administration, starting at the top with the president and the vice president.

MR. RUSSERT: But do you think that Rumsfeld will resign before that?

SEN. CLINTON: I don't know. That's up to the president, obviously, and to Secretary Rumsfeld, but what I'm focused on is changing the entire administration on November 2 and putting in people who will get us back on the right track here at home and around the world.

MR. RUSSERT: There's a lot of discussion about John Kerry and flip-flops. Rudy Giuliani in August said this about Senator Kerry on Iraq: "I don't know what [Kerry's] position is on Iraq. Of course, it changes all the time. There hasn't been a consistent position. He voted for the war. Then he voted against funding the war. Then he said that he voted both for the funding and against the funding. So there have been so many different positions. Honestly, again, I mean this in the most respectful way. I don't know Senator Kerry's current position on Iraq."

And what he's pointing to, Senator, is you both voted for authority for the president to go to war, but you voted for the $87 billion to support the troops. Senator Kerry voted against it. Joe Biden, a fellow Democrat, said this: "The truth is, [Kerry] usually spends more time talking about the politics of a vote ... and that was certainly the case on the $87 billion." And then this: "As one of [Kerry's] advisers put it ... 'Off the record, he [voted against the $87 billion] because of Howard Dean. On the record, he has an elaborate explanation.'"

And then Biden again: "Biden himself ultimately voted for the [$87 billion], and he confirmed that Kerry's decision not to was 'tactical,' an attempt 'to prove to Dean's guys I'm not a warmonger.'"

Didn't you advise John Kerry to vote for the $87 billion?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, we had lots of discussions during that time period. But, you know, this reminds me of what the Bush campaign did to John McCain. You know, John McCain has voted against defense appropriations bills in order to make a point, and the Bush campaign then went after him, pulling something out of that bill and saying that he wasn't in favor of breast cancer research.

You know, I think John, who understands war a heck of a lot better than I do, for example, and has understood completely what it would mean for us to be on a wrong path in Iraq, was making the point that, you know, by the time we had that vote, we needed to take a hard look at the policies of this administration. That was a perfectly legitimate position. And I think just like John McCain, nobody can say that John Kerry doesn't support our troops, that he doesn't know firsthand the dangers and perils of combat.

But this whole discussion, you know, Tim, is unfortunately really playing into the hands of the convention we're about to see over the next four days. They are running what I call a bait-and-switch campaign. They did it in 2000. This is their second convention. They're trying to present one view and one face on the party to the people, and they're trying to keep the focus on those who frankly have no influence in Washington, with all due respect. They're not running the House, Tom DeLay is. They're not running the Senate. The Republican Senate caucus largely driven by the most extreme members are unfortunately calling the shots, and the White House is.

MR. RUSSERT: Bill Frist extreme?

SEN. CLINTON: No, but he's pushed, though, by his caucus all the time, you know. You can go and look at the decisions that are made, and it's very frustrating, I think, for the majority of us on both sides of the aisle. But the point is that the people who are really running the country under this president are not going to be highlighted in this convention. And we've gone through this. You know, this is the president who said, "Hey, I want to be a compassionate conservative." He's been neither. "I want to be a uniter, not a divider." He's been, in my view, so divisive, and it's been so painful because following 9/11, there was such a chance for everybody to be united and to work together and to, you know, set goals together, and that has not proven to be the case. And so there's a lot that is going to really affect the lives of people, and I think we should be talking about, you know, jobs and health care and education and all the other things that really matter.

MR. RUSSERT: You heard Mayor Giuliani, however. The vast majority of delegates in Boston oppose the war in Iraq, and yet John Kerry, John Edwards, you, all voted to authorize the president to go to war. So there always is that inconsistency between delegates and people who speak to the convention.

SEN. CLINTON: Well--but if you look at the platform of the Democratic Party, we take a very tough stance on national defense. You know, I get my back up a little bit when Republicans talk about how they own national defense. The best I recall, you know, it was Democratic presidents who led and won us the major wars of this century--or the last century. But what really bothers me is that any president is going to do what he believes is right and in the national security interest of America. You know, all this talk about this president and how consistent and strong he is, well, you know, if you're consistent and wrong, and you're leading your country in the wrong direction, I don't think that's much of a selling point.

On point after point, this president has been wrong. He said that he would cut taxes dramatically and increase revenues. It doesn't add up in the arithmetic and it doesn't make any sense as a policy. He said that he would, you know, try to have a quick victory in Iraq, and then we'd democratize Iraq. He had to admit that it was a miscalculation. So whether we're talking about important domestic issues or critical life-and-death issues abroad, this president may be consistent, I'll give him that, but he's been consistently wrong and he's put our country on the wrong track.

MR. RUSSERT: Your husband signed the Defense of Marriage Act which said that, "'marriage' means only a legal union between one man and one woman as husband and wife." Do you support that?

SEN. CLINTON: I do, and I have said repeatedly that, you know, I do not support gay marriage but I support civil unions and I support the right of states to make this decision. This Republican platform even says there shouldn't be any benefits for people who are in committed relationships. I find that appalling. You know, there are so many people who are being unnecessarily hurt and demonized by this very political, partisan campaign that's being run on this issue and then the platform takes it even a step further.

MR. RUSSERT: But the Defense of Marriage Act would not allow one state to recognize gay marriage in another state.

SEN. CLINTON: Right. But ind...

MR. RUSSERT: You agree with that?

SEN. CLINTON: Yes. And individual states would then determine, you know, what they want to do on their own, but there's nothing in the so-called DOMA act that would prohibit the city of New York, as we have already done, or any other state, as others have done, providing benefits, inheritance benefits, hospital visitation. The Republican platform, Tim, basically tries to outlaw that.

MR. RUSSERT: The Democrats have been silent about guns. When you ran in 2000 for the Senate, you said there should be legislation which licenses gun owners. Do you still agree with that, support that?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, here's what I'm most concerned about right now is the assault weapons ban is slated to expire in September. The president has said he would sign it if it was sent to him and he's not lifted a finger to enable it to be sent. So here's where we are. He's taking money off the streets that have funded police, including some of the New York police officers who put their lives at risk on September 11. We, I think, have about 700 or so left that are funded by the so-called COPS program, and he's willing to let assault weapons come back on the streets. That is a recipe for disaster. It's also an open invitation for terrorists, who have, in some of their training manuals, pointed out how easy it is to get weapons in our country.

We're living in a different world, you know, and I think we have to be smarter about how we do it. I recognize the political realities, but if assault weapons come back on the streets starting in September and we start having some of these egregious, horrible situations that we had before the assault weapons ban was passed, I think there's going to be a real outcry from the American public and I think the responsibility rests solely with the president.

MR. RUSSERT: But in 2000, Senator, you said, "I stand in support of a commonsense legislation to license everyone who wishes to purchase a gun and believe that every new handgun or sale or transfer should be registered in a national registry." You still support that?

SEN. CLINTON: You know, Tim, I said that in part because what we do in New York is license. And you know what? There are a lot of folks in New York who have a lot of guns. Nobody's missed a single day hunting or target shooting or collecting. You know, I understand the political realities and we have to obviously deal with that. I support the Second Amendment, but I also think that when it comes to guns ending up in the hands of criminals, terrorists, people who are unfortunately mentally unbalanced, you know, we ought to be smart about this. The safety of the majority of people who are going about their daily business should be taken into account.

MR. RUSSERT: The NBC News and Wall Street Journal does polling. We asked Republicans about Democrats. The intensity is extraordinary. Which Democrat do you most dislike? You won. Here it is.

SEN. CLINTON: Yeah. What do you know?

MR. RUSSERT: Hillary Clinton, 24 percent; Bill Clinton, 19 percent; Ted Kennedy, 19 percent; Jesse Jackson, 11 percent; Al Gore, 7 percent; John Kerry just 5 percent. Why? Why the intense dislike for Hillary Clinton amongst Republicans?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, I think a lot of people, frankly, have never really gotten to know me or had any direct contact with me. You know, there was a lot of that intensity when I started in New York and there still is some, but it has diminished as people have seen what I really stand for, what I really fight for, what I really care about. You know, I think it's just a question of time. But on the other hand, I do stand up and say what I believe and I do fight back. And I guess they would prefer that everybody, you know, just basically allow them to call the shots. I don't think that's good for the country. You know, if you've got an administration and a Congress and increasingly a judiciary all under control of both one party and in, frankly, the right wing of that party, I think that's a recipe for abuse of power and for a lot of bad things happening, which is one of the reasons I feel so strongly about electing John Kerry.

MR. RUSSERT: Will you run for re-election in 2006?

SEN. CLINTON: I intend to. I'm having a great time being a senator from New York. You know what a terrific job it is.

MR. RUSSERT: I've covered a lot of them and worked for one. The Gridiron dinner in Washington, Rudy Giuliani spoke and you spoke. It's a night of humor and Rudy Giuliani had some fun. He concluded his speech this way. "...everyone knows that this November, when all is said and done - behind the sanctity of the voting booth curtain - we're both going to be voting for the same person:" and he said, "George W. Bush."

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, I would hope we're both voting for John Kerry. You know, I certainly think that on many important issues, he agrees more with John Kerry than with the nominee of his party.

MR. RUSSERT: But if George Bush wins, you're on your way to 2008, the presidential nomination for the Democratic Party.

SEN. CLINTON: You know, Tim, this is a subject that I am absolutely unambiguous about. There is no doubt in my mind that four more years of this administration would be a disaster for my country, a disaster for New York. You know, having a Democratic president, hopefully having a Democratic Senate, maybe a House, would be so good for New York. It would also be good for the issues that I think are important to the future.

You know, suppose you are a Republican who says your two most important issues are national defense and the economy. I think we're heading in the wrong direction on both. I give no ground to anyone on national defense. I believe we have to be smart about what we're doing. Did we have to divert attention, resources and personnel from Afghanistan, where we still haven't found bin Laden? That's an open question and one that should be debated.

Here at home, you think this economy is producing jobs? Well, then I don't think you're following what's really going on in people's lives. So I don't think we can afford four more years of George W. Bush, and I frankly think that, you know, being a senator with John Kerry in the White House would be one of the great privileges of my life.

MR. RUSSERT: But if John Kerry doesn't happen to win, you would never allow the Republicans to have another four years in 2008?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, you know, I'm doing everything I can right now to avoid them having another four years in 2004.

MR. RUSSERT: So the door is open?

SEN. CLINTON: No. Now, Tim, you're so good! You're very good! But let's take one election at a time. And this election in 2004 is going to determine the next four years. I hope I'll be in 2008 working for the re-election of John Kerry and John Edwards.

MR. RUSSERT: We'll be watching. Senator Hillary Clinton, thank you for joining us.

SEN. CLINTON: Thank you.

MR. RUSSERT: Coming next, Bush vs. Kerry, just 65 days to go. Insights and analysis from NBC's Tom Brokaw, who has covered every convention since 1968. He's next.

"Anderson Cooper 360," CNN, 9/3/2004

CLINTON: I wanted to report to you that my husband is doing very well. He's in great humor. He's beating all of us at cards and the rest of the games we're playing.

He will be having surgery early in the week. There will be information after surgery from the medical staff. There will not be any further information between now and then.

I also particularly want to thank everyone who has been sending us their best wishes. One of the ways that you can get that information to him is by posting a note to him or a letter of concern on the Web site clintonfoundation.org, because it will get to him, and he's extremely grateful for the outpouring of concern and prayer and support from around our country and indeed around the world.

I'm just so pleased that he's in such good spirits, and obviously we're in one of the great hospitals in the world with superb medical staff. He had excellent care at the Westchester Medical Center with our doctors there. And he's going to be fine, and he will be back in fighting form before, really, very long after the surgery and the period of necessary recovery passes.

So I'm just here to express his, you know, gratitude and real appreciation for all of the incredible expressions of positive feelings and concern that we've already received in the last hours, and to thank all of you for being here, and to give you the weekend off. So enjoy Labor Day weekend. This is not how we expected to be spending our Labor Day weekend, but it will be fine. We know that. We're in very good hands.

And we're delighted we have good health insurance. That makes a big difference, and I hope someday everybody will be able to say the same thing.

Thank you all very much.

U.S. REPRESENTATIVE CHRISTOPHER SMITH (R-NJ) HOLDS HEARING ON TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, 9/21/2004

CLINTON: Well, Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you and Chairman Smith for holding this important joint issue forum on this critical matter.

I have followed and been involved in this for a number of years.

CLINTON: And I'm very pleased that the work started in the Clinton administration, has been carried on and furthered in the Bush administration. The more we work on this, I think the more we realize how difficult a problem it is and how much needs to be done.

And this particular issue forum, focusing on the role that our armed services can play, our allies, in a united way to take on not only the scourge of trafficking, but the companion scourge of prostitution which feeds the trafficking, is a very critical agenda item and one that I'm delighted that our Department of Defense and our military leadership and the very able leadership of Ambassador Miller are bringing to public light. And I hope that this joint effort will lead to even further action.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I want to thank all of the witnesses for excellent testimony, and even more for the commitment that you bring to this issue, and particularly for the military, its commitment as exemplified by General LaPorte, to implement the zero-tolerance policy.

With respect to the zero tolerance policy, and perhaps this is best addressed to Secretary Abell: Are the forces based here in the United States receiving the same kind of training and education with respect to trafficking and prostitution?

CLINTON: And I ask that because there are a number of instances where it appears that women and girls are at least engaged in prostitution, and in a number of instances apparently trafficked into prostitution around some of our bases here in our own country.

So is this part of the zero-tolerance outreach, Secretary Abell?

ABELL: Yes, ma'am. The training will be universal. It will be as part of their initial entry into the service. It will also be reinforced pre-deployment for those who are leaving the United States, going overseas.

It is a two-pronged approach, one for service chiefs, who are the force providers, who are charged to provide a ready trained force; and then, part two, for the combatant commanders, the theater commanders, like General LaPorte, to adapt it to their theater when they get there. And the Uniform Code of Military Justice applies without regard to geography.

CLINTON: And will there be increased cooperation between our military leadership on these bases and civilian authorities with respect to criminal prosecution of houses of prostitution and other rings of prostitutes?

ABELL: Our commanders, whether overseas or in the United States, do and will cooperate with their local law enforcement agencies. They share intelligence, and maybe less formally than intelligence, indicators that the military members, the civilian component of the Department of Defense have observed and reported.

CLINTON: Additionally, this past July and August there were press reports indicating that subcontractors on DOD contracts in Iraq may have kept Indian laborers in debt bondage. This is, obviously, a serious charge and suggests that trafficking for forced labor is not a hypothetical situation.

The secretary of defense's memo of September 16th raises the issue of forced labor trafficking and for the first time really addresses the problems associated with involuntary servitude and debt bondage.

CLINTON: How has DOD and the State Department, Ambassador Miller, responded to the recent allegations that subcontractors on DOD contracts in Iraq may have kept laborers in debt bondage? And what steps are you taking to try to take action against these contractors to perhaps prevent them from either continuing the existing contracts or obtaining new contracts?

And finally, to the inspector general, will you be considering labor trafficking and debt bondage issues as well as sex trafficking in your inspection process?

ABELL: Let me start, please. The Army is reviewing those contracts and the subcontractors to determine whether there's actually debt bondage there. And as I said before, we're pursuing at the departmental level language that would be an enabling tool for the contracting officers to be able to disbar and hold contractors both at the corporate level and at the individual level accountable and responsible for those actions.

MILLER: I think Secretary Abell has answered what the Defense Department is doing.

At the time of that allegation, we did go through our embassy in India to try to see if there was factual support. We were not successful in verifying it. This doesn't mean, however, that there is not this threat. And clearly forced labor is a major factor in any post-conflict situation. It's a major component of slavery throughout the world.

It's certainly a factor in the Middle East. Whether that particular allegation is correct or not, there's all sorts of use of forced labor in Middle Eastern countries, a lot of that forced labor coming from Eurasia, coming from the Indian subcontinent. It is a major problem. And we are pushing, through our report, we are trying to report the governments in the region to be more aggressive in apprehending and correcting the situation.

MILLER: And we're pushing the governments where the people are coming from. They have a responsibility in terms of when the people go out of the country and the whole visa process. So it's a major issue.

SCHMITZ: You asked if we will be considering the labor trafficking and debt bondage in our activities. Yes. In fact, when I found out about the Indian allegation, I immediately put on my oversight hat. And we'll follow up if there is any DOD nexus there to make sure that we are turning every stone.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON GLOBAL POSTURE REVIEW, 9/23/2004

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Secretary, currently in the conference committee on the defense authorization bill there is a provision concerning the opportunity for Guard and Reserve members to access TRICARE in order to have health insurance. We learned that about 20 percent of our Guard and Reserve members do not have health insurance.

Senator Graham and I, along with Senator Daschle and others, introduced this legislation. We were successful in passing it in the Senate. We continue to be told that the Defense Department opposes it.

Could you explain your opposition to what I see as a critical part of ensuring that the Guard and Reserve members who are being called up on a continuing basis would have, along with their families, access to health insurance where they don't currently have it?

RUMSFELD: I'd like to ask General Myers, who's up to speed on this, to comment on it. But one of the things I've discussed with Dr. Chu, the head of the Department of Defense Personnel and Readiness Office, and with the chairman, is what I believe to be the need for us to look on a macro basis at how we manage our force -- the active force, the Guard and the Reserve.

RUMSFELD: What's taken place over recent years is that for a variety of reasons, incremental benefits have been added, in large measure, to the Guard and the Reserve and the retired force, less so to the active force. And the cost of each person has been incrementally changing. And we're getting to the point where the cost of Guard and Reserve relative to the active is something that needs to be addressed so that we can manage it in a way that's proper from the standpoint of the taxpayers and appropriate from the standpoint of the people we need to volunteer to serve in the armed forces.

And rather than -- my personal view is -- and as I say, I want Dick to answer this, but I think that what happens each time there's a new proposal here, then it's passed, and then there's another proposal that comes along to create some sort of equity across the board. And the imbalance that's evolving is something that I know this committee needs to address, just as we need to address. And we want to do that together.

Dick, do you want to respond precisely on this point?

MYERS: Precise, I don't know. But Senator Clinton, I can respond. I think the Joint Chiefs of Staff are worried about a couple of things.

One is cost. This will not be cheap. And health care costs, as we know, had a history of going up in a way that is almost unpredictable.

There's an equity issue that's brought up as well. And the equity issue is, "Gee, I'm serving active duty. I serve 365 days a year. I get health care for me and my family. Somebody that serves part time gets the same health care benefit," which is one of the better and bigger benefits that the United States military gets. So that is brought up from time to time.

Nobody is saying we don't need to change the way we provide health care to the reserve component. We found that up out in these massive call-ups that indeed many reservists are not ready for active duty. And any proposal that would ensure that reservists, on an annual basis, get a physical paid for by the United States government, would be a very good thing. Because we would then know what kind of force we have out there, and we wouldn't have to reject people as they show up at the mobilization station, because they're not healthy.

MYERS: My understanding is, DOD has a proposal, a counterproposal, that would put in place another program to test for a while. And I think it would be my view that we ought to proceed fairly slowly here, mainly due to the cost. It's not an issue of providing the right benefits to the reserve component, but it's a huge cost issue.

CLINTON: Well, I know that it's a huge cost issue, but we've heard a lot of discussion today about capability and about needing to equip our men and women in uniform. And I for one feel very strongly that it's clear we're going to continue to rely on the Guard and Reserve, and when you have 20 percent without health insurance and then, I guess not coincidentally, you have 20 percent who are found to be unready when they are activated, that's a cost. And it's a readiness issue.

So we're going to continue to press our point, because we think that the best investment we can make is in these men and women that we are sending out. And given the way transformation is proceeding, and given the pressures on the existing force, it certainly seems to me that it's no longer fair to exclude, if not fail to help, those who are in the Guard and Reserve.

Secretary Rumsfeld, over the weekend, I'm sure you saw because there was a lot of publicity, about a number of very distinguished Republican senators, including Senators Lugar, Hagel, McCain, Graham, and others, raising very serious questions about our status in Iraq, using strong language.

Senator Lugar talking about incompetence in this administration; the lack of planning is apparent.

Senator Hagel referencing his belief that, no, we're not winning and how did we ever get into this situation?

And when you look at the statements that have been made in the past by you and others in the administration, it is very difficult to track the predictions and the expectations that were presented to this committee, to others in Congress, and certainly to the American people, with where we are today.

We now know from books that have been written with the full cooperation of the administration that shortly after 9/11, war plans were begun with respect to Iraq. That was not information shared with the Congress nor with the American people. In fact, as late as August of 2002, the administration was still saying there were absolutely no plans to go into Iraq. And we know what happened then.

In a recent article reporting on the work of the Defense Service Board and their concerns about our ability to maintain ongoing stability operations, there is a paragraph that refers to a widely reported phone call in which William Luti, a senior Pentagon policy official, hinted with congressional aides from both parties that a second Bush administration may carry its preemptive war strategy to five or six other nations beyond the current Axis of Evil.

CLINTON: Now, Mr. Secretary, I respect and appreciate your long service to this country. But if there are such plans, if there are such discussions, don't you believe that the Congress and the American people ought to be informed?

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON IRAQI WEAPONS OF MASS DESTRUCTION, 10/6/2004

CLINTON: I'd prefer to go now, if I could.

SESSIONS: Good. You're recognized.

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

And, Mr. Duelfer and General, thank you both for your service. And please express our appreciation to your predecessors and all who serve in the Iraq Survey Group. We have a deep understanding, based on the work that you've done, of issues that are quite difficult. And I thank you for that.

Mr. Duelfer, when was your report finished?

DUELFER: Well, when it was in the printer, which was probably two or three days ago -- I mean, it's dated the 30th, but, I mean, you know, the printing process -- I think the last volume of it actually trickled off in, you know, the couple days after the...

CLINTON: And who have you, or anyone on your behalf, briefed with respect to this report?

DUELFER: Briefed?

CLINTON: Or discussed, presented the report?

DUELFER: Well, for my part, I mean, I've talked to, you know, people as this has progressed, you know, including up here. But this is, you know -- earlier this morning the SSCI. I've had meetings, you know, with various people saying, "Where are things coming out? Where are they going along?"

But in terms of the final report, it hasn't been briefed anywhere other than to Congress right now.

CLINTON: Have you had discussions with anyone at the Pentagon over your findings?

DUELFER: I haven't, no.

CLINTON: Has anyone, General, on your staff or anyone on behalf of the Iraq Survey Group briefed the report to anyone in the Pentagon?

MCMENAMIN: No, ma'am.

CLINTON: Have there been any briefings or any discussions of any kind, broadly construed, with anyone in the White House or the National Security Council?

DUELFER: I've had discussions with, you know, a staffer over there.

I mean, let me be careful that. The report has been around and circulated for declassification purposes. A lot of people had to look at it, you know, for force protection reasons and for other issues, to make sure it was proper that it all go out publicly.

CLINTON: So the report has been in circulation within the government?

DUELFER: The report has been in the intelligence community -- and, frankly, it's been all over town -- in bits and pieces while people went through it to see if there was, you know, material in it that should not be out in the public domain.

CLINTON: Now, Mr. Duelfer, with respect to the ongoing dispute about aluminum tubes, is it your testimony that finally that dispute has been put to rest insofar as it is possible to determine the use for the tubes?

DUELFER: I have the advantage of being able to just make a call on this, because the report goes out under my name and, you know, this aluminum tube issue to me is just -- to me it's rockets.

CLINTON: It's rockets.

So if the national security adviser on Sunday said of the tubes, quote, "People are still debating this," unquote, is it fair to assume that she's not been briefed or not aware of the findings of the Iraq Survey Group?

DUELFER: Well, there may be people debating it in various places but, you know, they debated it in front of me and I came to a conclusion and that's what I put in this report.

Again, this is not an intelligence community report. I have, you know, the great pleasure of not having to go through an interagency process on this.

CLINTON: But you are representing the best judgment of a thousand people that filtered information and evidence up to you.

Let me ask, Mr. Duelfer, did you find any evidence that Saddam Hussein either passed weapons or materials or information to terrorist networks or that there was a real risk of him doing so?

DUELFER: We found no evidence that he was passing to terrorist groups WMD material, but that really wasn't a strong focus for our work.

CLINTON: So there is no evidence, in your report, that there was such a risk of him doing so?

DUELFER: We didn't address that.

CLINTON: And is there any other source of information, other than the work of the Iraq Survey Group, that would present evidence sufficient for a statement such as that to be made that you're aware of?

DUELFER: I'm unaware of assessments on that. But I'm not sure I would be aware.

CLINTON: So if, this morning, President Bush said, and I quote, "There was a risk, a real risk, that Saddam Hussein would pass weapons or materials or information to terrorist networks," unquote, he could not be relying upon your exhaustive report for that statement, could he?

DUELFER: Well, I mean, if, you know, you had -- the talent and the knowledge existed in Iraq. So what Saddam did with it you, again, have to evaluate.

CLINTON: But he's not talking about passing on, you know, talent. I'm talking about weapons materials information.

DUELFER: The report describes what we found on the ground which was, you know, no stocks. There was a decision to sustain, to the extent they could, the intellectual capital. But, you know, I'm trying to say exactly what we've said here.

CLINTON: And I appreciate that, because I think you've done a great service to your country, Mr. Duelfer. Because, you know, I sometimes fear that we're trying to turn Washington, at least, into an evidence-free zone. So the introduction of evidence and facts, upon which reasonable people I hope can reach conclusions, is a great service.

We've seen too little of that. So I am very appreciative of the professional way in which you have proceeded in the fulfillment of your function.

Let me also ask you, Mr. Duelfer, as an experienced inspector, the conclusions you reached about the decay of the attempt to obtain nuclear weapons is of great interest, I think, because we now are concerned about North Korea, about Iran. We, obviously, were surprised by both India and Pakistan. Those states and perhaps even non-state actors who are attempting to obtain nuclear weapons is the greatest threat we confront. And that was certainly the case, you know, before Iraq and now, indeed, after.

Do you have any advice about, you know, the best way for the United States to try to degrade and decay such capacity, so that we can be assured that proliferation will not pose a threat to us or to others around the world?

DUELFER: Well, the decay that occurred in the Iraqi program was a function of the sanctions and, you know, the extraordinary limits put on this regime.

We looked at some of the activities of these scientists, in areas where we thought they might have been serving as a surrogate for nuclear-related activities. For example, there was a development program of a rail gun, which is an electromagnet -- it's like a magnetic device for firing projectiles. We thought that that might be a surrogate for development of nuclear expertise. We looked at a series of projects like that, but we found that it was inconclusive.

Drawing conclusions that would apply to a country like North Korea -- it's difficult, frankly, Senator, because they are so different. Iraq invaded another country and lost. It was subject to an extraordinary set of U.N. regulations. It fought a war with Iran. It had enormous natural resources. It has a population which is energetic; they're great builders.

It's in a different region where, you know, many would expect just objectively to see, you know, Iraq as a country and its people really should be the hub. But, by virtue of the leadership, you know the difference between what is in Iraq and what could be is huge.

I don't know. It's difficult for me to draw lessons for North Korea, but it's a very good question. Maybe others smarter than I can do it.

CLINTON: Thank you so much, both of you.

"CBS News Special Report," CBS, 10/8/2004

Also joining us now from the debate hall in St. Louis is the junior senator from the state of New York, the former first lady of the United States of America, Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Senator, thanks for being with us.

Before we ask you how Senator Kerry did, quickly, how is President Clinton doing after his heart surgery?

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Oh, thank you, Dan. He is really doing well. Every day he is getting stronger and feeling better and following the doctors' orders. And I thank you for asking about him and all the people who've sent their best wishes and their prayers. It's really been an overwhelming show of support for him.

RATHER: Now let's talk about tonight. The Republicans say that President Bush has what the military calls 'command presence' and that Senator John Kerry does not. And already they're beginning to say--you saw it again tonight--President Bush has that command presence; John Kerry does not. Tell me why any voter should not agree with that.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think voters are very smart, Dan, and I think they saw tonight that, first of all, John Kerry was superb this evening. And he has the momentum from the first debate when he clearly demonstrated that he could be the commander in chief that America desperately needs. And tonight he not only reinforced that, but he demonstrated clearly that he has a command of domestic issues, and, equally importantly, he plans about what to do to get the economy producing jobs again and to deal with the rising health-care costs and to fully fund our educational programs.

And what was so striking to me is that, you know, the president couldn't think of anything he had done wrong in the last three and a half years, and he didn't have any plan about how he was going to do anything right for the next four years. The contrast could not have been clearer.

RATHER: Senator Clinton, what would you say--sorry, didn't mean to step on your last line. I apologize.

Sen. CLINTON: Yes. That's all right, Dan.

RATHER: What did think was President Bush's best moment in this hour and a half tonight?

Sen. CLINTON: Dan, I have to tell you, I was disappointed in the president's performance tonight. I knew that he--I mean, he had a lot of energy. He was certainly more energetic than he'd been in the first debate. But time and time again he came up with the same lines, the same story that he's been telling the American people for years. You know, it doesn't change. This is a person and a president who is consistent, I'll give him that, but he's been consistently wrong, consistently wrong on economic policy and on foreign policy and on security policy, on homeland security.

So I think that the American public, particularly any undecided voters, would be scratching their heads saying, 'Well, what is it he will do differently?' Because with my own eyes, I can see that things are not proceeding as well as they should; therefore, we need new leadership. And I think John Kerry was very strong in presenting the plans that he would bring to the Oval Office.

RATHER: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton in St. Louis, give our best to President Clinton. Thank you very much.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you, Dan. I will.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 10/8/2004

We now go to the debate hall, and we check in with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, the former first lady, looking very well tonight. Before we ask about anything else, how is President Clinton doing?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Oh, Larry, he's doing so well. Every day, he gets stronger and he walks further and he feels better. I know you can relate to that. And I want to thank you for your many kind comments. He really enjoyed talking with you that night from the hospital. And we certainly have learned a lot about heart disease, and I hope that we'll be able to join with you in doing more to educate people about what they can do to protect themselves and how to deal with this disease.

KING: That would be wonderful. When is the president going to go out and campaign, or is he?

CLINTON: You know, Larry, he goes back to the doctor in about 10 days for his routine check-up, his six-week check-up, and we're really going to be guided by their advice. And I'm so pleased that Bill has really made it clear he's going to do what the doctors advise, and he doesn't want to rush -- he wants to be as fully recovered as possible. He's obviously on the phone. He's offering advice. He's talking to the campaign and to supporters around the country.

And he -- I think that, certainly, the debate performance tonight, just like the one last Thursday, will speed his recovery because Senator Kerry did so well, and it really -- I know because I watched it with him on Thursday night at home. He was so excited and so delighted at the clear contrast and the strong presence that Senator Kerry presented. And I just spoke with him here, and he felt that, you know, Senator Kerry hit it out of the park tonight.

KING: The president felt that?

CLINTON: Yes. Yes. I mean, you know, last Thursday, we saw Senator Kerry as a strong commander-in-chief. Tonight we saw that he has an equal command over domestic issues. He came forward with the plans that he has been talking about and presenting to the American people now during his campaign about how to get the economy producing jobs, how to deal with health care costs, how to make sure the education, educational needs of our country are met and all of the issues that these very impressive questioners asked him today in St. Louis.

KING: All right, do you -- how do you assess the president tonight? Everyone said he was weaker -- was he stronger tonight than last week?

CLINTON: Well, Larry, I think the president had a real opportunity tonight. He obviously was energized, but that didn't translate into plans for the future. He couldn't, again, think of anything he'd done wrong in his three-and-a-half years. He didn't present any alternatives about how he would proceed differently in the next four years. He didn't give the American people any reason to believe that there would be the kind of change that everybody knows we need in this country.

We've got to have a different approach to the world. We've got to have a different formula for being strong at home and creating economic prosperity. I mean, that's as clear as it can be. And the president, you know, tonight failed to really give the voters who were watching, trying to make up their minds, any reason to believe that he would be able to offer anything new.

In contrast, Senator Kerry came forward with the detailed plans that he's been working on. He presented them forcefully. He's obviously so knowledgeable about what needs to be done. He's going to hit the ground running when he's elected.

KING: How do you assess what's going to happen on November 2? What's your read on this election?

CLINTON: Well, Larry, I've always thought this was going to be a close election. I'm confident that Senator Kerry's going to win, and he's going to win because he's done a terrific job in communicating effectively. Increasingly, the plans that he's been working on are getting through to people. He's connecting with people. I don't know how anyone could watch this debate tonight and not see what I know about John Kerry, which is that he gets it, he understands what people are going through. He knows that he has to fight for the middle class because, certainly, the president has abandoned the middle class.

I mean, you just can't look at the statistics -- we've had a -- you know, a dismal job creation record. We've had health care costs exploding. We've had more people losing insurance, more people falling into poverty, tuition costs going up. I mean, you just list the things that my constituents talk to me about, and I think it's -- on election day, people are going to say, Look, we've got to have a change. You know, we can't take four more years of the wrong direction from this president.

KING: Will it be a very close electoral vote?

CLINTON: I think that -- based on the recent information, I think that it will be a close but significant win for Senator Kerry. I think that a lot of the so-called battleground states are beginning to break his way. You know, that first debate gave most Americans their first chance to see John Kerry unfiltered. You know, no more attack ads from people with axes to grind. No more campaign spin from the other side.

You know, what they got to see the two men, not in a partisan setting, like a convention, speaking to the faithful, but standing their on the stage, going head to head. And guess what? The American people saw in John Kerry a person that they can trust to be their commander-in-chief and a person with the understanding of what's going on in the world, as well as here at home, and with the plans to move us in a new direction.

And all the good feeling that came out of that first debate I think was multiplied tonight. John Kerry was the clear winner. He demonstrated a mastery of domestic issues, and the president was, you know, pretty much left to just say the same things over and over again.

KING: Good seeing you, Senator Clinton. Give our best to the president.

CLINTON: I will, Larry. Thank you so much.

KING: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, the junior senator from the state of New York.

More panel, more discussion ahead on this special edition of LARRY KING LIVE. By the way, next Wednesday night, we'll be on again at 11:00, except we'll be in Tempe, Arizona, at Arizona State University, doing this program live from the site of the final debate.

We'll be right back.

"Decision 2004: The Presidential Debates," NBC, 10/8/2004

There's been a lot of discussion, obviously, this week about the report, that there were no weapons of mass destruction. It was--took up almost the first third of this debate alone. I remember vividly, however, your husband, as President Clinton saying right after major combat came to an end, 'We always believed there were weapons of mass destruction there.' You voted for the authority of the president to go to war, voted for the $87 billion as well. You saw that intelligence. So isn't that blame kind of spread across both parties?

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Well, I think what John Kerry said tonight, Tom, really summed it up. He was as good on foreign policy again tonight as he was in the first debate, and he was fabulous on domestic policy. And when he said, 'Look, the military did a superb job, the military won the war. The president didn't win the peace.' The difference has been from the very beginning that many of us believed that there were weapons of mass destruction. Many of us saw Saddam Hussein as a threat. But many of us also said, 'Wait a minute, we're not going about this the right way.' And no one has been stronger on that than John Kerry, consistently now, month after month. And yesterday with the release of the inspector's report and the president's continuing refusal to admit what everybody in the world now knows, that he did rush to war, he didn't give the inspectors a chance, he didn't use the authority which I and others gave him to really play the card of, you know, pressured, coercive diplomacy. And I think, you know, Senator Kerry made it very clear he has a plan to deal with Iraq. The president just has more of the same.

BROKAW: But Senator Kerry's plan has opened a question for a lot of people because Jacques Chirac of France, Gerhard Schroeder of Germany, they have all said 'No, no, we're not going there.' And without a specific plan that is practical, if John Kerry is elected president, what will that say to people in Iraq who are trying to change the equation on the ground?

Sen. CLINTON: I think the plan that John Kerry has put forth is much more detailed than that. I mean, he's talked very specifically about, you know, getting assistance and doing more training. In fact, there was an offer made of that, which was not really followed up on by the administration. He's talked about enlisting more help in the reconstruction efforts. In fact, this administration slammed the door on it and said, 'Wait a minute, you weren't with us, we're not going to have you at the table to do that.' On point after point, what comes across very clearly, and what Senator Kerry once again stressed tonight in a masterful presentation, was that he has a plan, and more importantly, he has the credibility to have the people of Iraq know that we're really going to stick with them and be on their side as they face the insurgents and the rest of the world to come to our aid in doing so.

BROKAW: When you watched this debate tonight, what did you think was President Bush's strongest moment, the one that unnerved you a little?

Sen. CLINTON: I have to confess I didn't have any of those moments. I thought that the president just didn't have a plan for the future, didn't give us much of a sense of what he would do differently in the next four years and that John Kerry was, once again, just absolutely masterful, as good as I've ever seen him.

BROKAW: All right. Thanks very much, Senator Hillary Clinton.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you.

"Primetime Live," ABC, 10/28/2004

DIANE SAWYER, ABC NEWS

(Off Camera) Good evening. I'm Diane Sawyer. And tonight, we bring you former President Bill Clinton and his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. It is a new and very personal account of his heart disease, surgery, and the transforming lessons they both say they've learned. As you may have seen in recent days, the former President is much thinner than the Bill Clinton we knew, more than 15 pounds. And you'll see he's also very introspective about his close brush with a fatal heart attack. But we're going to begin tonight on the operating table. Because former President Clinton said he brought back a souvenir from that surgery ... haunting images he cannot get out of his head.

BILL CLINTON, 42ND U.S. PRESIDENT

I did have a lot of very profound and lasting kind of images, flashing through my mind, when I was going under the anesthesia. Images that clearly connoted death. And images that clearly connoted life.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Are they images like ...

BILL CLINTON

I saw dark masks crushing, like death masks being crushed in series. And then, I'd see these great circles of light. And then, like, Hillary's picture or Chelsea's face would appear on the light. And then they'd fly off into the -distance. And other people that I knew and cared about. It was amazing. And I -it's the only thing I remember. I remember it very clearly. I don't remember whether it was going under or coming out or both. I just remember seeing it.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Is there a prayer you most wanted to pray?

BILL CLINTON

Well, no, I did pray. But -I didn't exactly say, oh, God, give me another chance here. I figured I'd been given another chance.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) Another chance and he knew it. And only Bill Clinton would come out from under anesthesia, well, still working the crowd.

BILL CLINTON

I don't remember all this. But they say I was quite funny when I came out. I was giddy happy when I came out of the surgery. And I was waving at everybody, calling them by name in the operating room. Lord knows what I did and how embarrassing it is. A lot of other people know better than me.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Campaigning?

BILL CLINTON

Yeah.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) And mostly, celebrating. If you wonder just how close he came, take a look at this picture. For the first time, you're seeing Bill Clinton's heart, as filmed in his angiogram. That area we highlighted is not just trouble, it's a heart attack waiting to happen. Perhaps only hours away.

DOCTOR CRAIG SMITH, SURGEON

There's not much blood flowing past this area.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) Dr. Craig Smith, President Clinton's surgeon and Dr. Alan Schwartz, President Clinton's cardiologist from New York Presbyterian Hospital.

DOCTOR CRAIG SMITH

The dye has been injected in the main coronary artery here.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) They show us how the blood in the arteries is proceeding normally here until it hits this part, where plaque buildup has almost entirely block blood flow.

DOCTOR CRAIG SMITH

That was his most critical obstruction.

BILL CLINTON

I must say I was surprised and the doctors were surprised when they did the angiogram that there was as much blockage as there was because I had been so active. I had over 90 percent blockage in two arteries. They were afraid I'd have a heart attack before I could have the surgery.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) So, in an instant, the President's family learned that the man they had regarded as indestructible was in a race to the operating room.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) What was Mrs. Clinton's first word to you?

BILL CLINTON

You mean when we found out about it? Oh, you know, she's a pretty stiff upper lip type. But I could tell she was upset about it. And I said, look, you know, we dodged a bullet here.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON, DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK

He was keeping up a really good front. You know, he was, "well, we dodged a big bullet. This is actually really good news." So, it was -typical Bill Clinton. It was, you know, we're going to be very positive about this. And meanwhile, I'm just dying on the inside. I'm so upset.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Who had to tell Chelsea?

BILL CLINTON

Hillary called her.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Was that hard, that first call with Chelsea?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

It was hard. It was very hard. She was shocked because, you know, he had looked good.

BILL CLINTON

They both came. And they -the hospital was wonderful to us. And they both stayed in the hospital with me.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) You played games the night before.

BILL CLINTON

Oh, yeah. I did.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

It was a really emotional, difficult period. But, you know, Bill wanted to play cards and play games and talk on the phone to his friends. And then, of course, have these long conversations with Senator Kerry about the campaign. You know, playing cards, playing boggle, this game he loves called upwards, which is a form of scrabble. You know, Chelsea and I would go off and sort of hug each other. And it was, you know, it was a little surreal because he was so sure -you know, Bill has -he's never been afraid of death at all.

BILL CLINTON

I wasn't frightened. But I think you know somewhere deep in your subconscious, that you know you're very close to your own mortality when they saw you open and flop your heart out, you know. I've already lived a year longer than my grandfather did, my maternal grandfather. My father died in his late 20s. My stepfather died at 58, the age I am now. And I know, you know, we're -it's -death is a part of life.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) What did you say, as you were heading in?

BILL CLINTON

I told them I loved them. And they were just there. I sort of prayed that it would come out all right. And prayed that if it didn't, that my family would be all right and my friends would be all right.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

"It's going to be fine. I'm going to be fine." He just kept saying that over and over again.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) At any point, did the two of you stop and contemplate the possibility it might not be fine?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

No. We really didn't. I mean, I thought about that. But I had a lot of confidence in the doctors. And, you know, I also still view him as indestructible, even after this operation. So, I never -I never allowed myself to think that.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Was there something you wanted to make sure you said to him before he went in?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Oh, yes. I mean, we, you know, we got up really early before they came to take him away. And we spent some time together as a family. You know, we just told each other how much we loved each other. And that, you know, we were there for each other in every way.

Up next, the first thing Mrs. Clinton saw when her husband came out of surgery.

And later, the one pre-election video that will have everybody on both sides talking ... Eminem. When "Primetime Live" returns.

ANNOUNCER

Diane Sawyer continues with former President Bill Clinton and his wife, Hillary Rodham Clinton.

BILL CLINTON

The number one thing I would say to people is, if you got a family history, you gotta, you know, be tested, tested, tested. And the only signals are not, you know, where your chest is hurting so bad you can hardly stand up and you're on the verge of a heart attack. There may be -it may be sustained shortness of breath or inability to do things you used to do, maybe enough. You just can't assume it's the aging process or something like that. I just missed it. That was my fault. I don't blame my doctors or anybody else. That was my fault. I was insufficiently vigilant.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) Former President Bill Clinton, who had serious heart disease, said he should have noticed something, perhaps as far back as 2001, just after he left the White House. He felt he was in top condition, but ...

BILL CLINTON

When I would go out to run, after a mile, I'd have to stop and walk 100 yards or 200 yards and get my breath. And then I could run again.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) Spring 2004, again, warnings but he ignored them and pushed through.

BILL CLINTON

I had several instances my chest felt tight when I was exercising. And because I could, you know, slow down and then resume that level without tightness recurring, I just assumed it was because I was exhausted and I was out of shape.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) By summer 2004 ...

BILL CLINTON

We have some very steep hills around here. And I'd take my dog for a walk and he'd pull me up these steep hills. And halfway up the hill, I'd have to stop and catch my breath, you know. And it was just ridiculous because I was in the best shape of my life, apparently.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) And we asked the doctors about a surprising fact, that the President had yearly stress tests. But those tests showed nothing.

DOCTOR ALLAN SCHWARTZ, CARDIOLOGIST

Stress tests are a screening test. And like all screening tests, they have false positive and false negative rates. It's going to have some situations where someone has a problem but the stress test looks fine.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) Not only that. The President says since his high cholesterol seemed to be down, he was reassured and ended the medication Zocor.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Should the doctor have told you not to go off Zocor and was it your decision to do it?

BILL CLINTON

No. But to be fair to them, they used the latest standards for what cholesterol was. And my cholesterol was below that. Now, it's much lower now. I think it is, you know, I think that in the last -since I left the White House, maybe if I'd stayed on a lower-fat diet. You know, maybe if I had not eaten so many hamburgers and steaks, you know, which I love. Maybe if I, you know, had slightly less stress in my life. I worked as hard since I left office as I did when I was there. Maybe it would have been different.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Well, I have to say, he was really into, you know, the low-carb, high- protein diet. I didn't think it was healthy. But I know so many people who are doing that now. I would say, well, you know, you think you should have like a cheeseburger everyday for lunch? And, you know, steak as many times as you want? I remember we went for a walk with our dog, Shamus. And we were walking up this hill near our house. And he said, you know, I'm just so tired, I just -don't feel like I can do this. And I urged him to go see the doctor and see what the explanation could be. But he'd been working really hard on his book. Literally around the clock and hadn't been sleeping. It was allergy season. He always has a tougher time breathing during allergy season. And I, you know, I nagged him some. I told him I thought he really should go see somebody about it. But he was so convinced it was nothing. And, you know, now, I wish I had nagged more. But I'm not sure it would have made a difference.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) And then, August 2004, the incident that finally sent the former President to the doctor.

BILL CLINTON

I had a really severe tightness in my chest when I came home from my book tour on August 31st, in New Orleans. And I'd never had that before, unrelated to exercise.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) Days later, his wife and daughter are watching him, wheeled away to surgery.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) To watch that hospital bed roll away from you ...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Oh, I know.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) And know -not know what's on the other side of the doors.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Right. He said, don't let them put that funny hat on my head when they take me away. I don't want to -I don't wanna go into the operating room with that hat on. So, I talked to one of the nurses and said, can you put the hat on later, you know?

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) The surgery would last four hours. For 73 minutes, his heart was stopped. He was on a heart/lung machine.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

He looked so peaceful. He had -there wasn't a line in his face. He looked so rested. It looked like he had been in the deepest sleep he'd been since I've known him for 33 years.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Were you aware of the vision he brought back as a souvenir in a way from whatever continent he was on, whatever land he visited when he was there?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I heard about people who have experiences like that, where they see darkness, and then they see light. And, you know, it was so moving to me. And he said it was so reassuring. He said, "I'd see the darkness and then I'd see you and Chelsea and I'd see the light." And, you know, it really meant so much to me.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) And remember when he worked the operating room?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Before that, we had been -I'd met him in Iceland. And then we had gone to -Ireland to see some of our friends, to make some speeches and to actually go golfing. So, he was waving. You know, he was really tired. We came out, he said, we had a nice time in Iceland, didn't we? Didn't you love Ireland? And he was so blissful. But those first few hours, particularly the time right after I got to see him, I will treasure forever because he just, you know, he kept holding Chelsea's and my hand. He kept telling us how much he loved us.

BILL CLINTON

I know that I must have been concerned about it because I was fairly quite happy when I woke up. I'll never get tired of living. But I think it's a great waste of time to sit around in morbid fear of the fate that we all have to share. So, you just have to -I think the most important thing is to keep your head in the game and to think about what you're doing at the moment.

ANNOUNCER

Up next, the two new jobs President Clinton would consider. What are they? When "Primetime Live" returns.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) And now, more with Bill and Hillary Clinton. We conducted his interview at their house in Chappaqua, New York, which, as you'll see, has a few rooms in it designed to remind him of a White House he lived in some time ago.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) We're walking in the front door of the house where he lives in Chappaqua, New York. An old farmhouse rebuilt with rooms reminiscent of the White House. The solarium and the windows with all that light.

BILL CLINTON

And there's a back part that was added in 1989. But all this was farmland, all around here. This was originally, where you see that, this was an open porch.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) And the solarium-like room?

BILL CLINTON

That's my contribution to the house. That was a screened-in porch when I came here, shaped just like that. It was a screened-in porch. And it was no good half the year. It was too hot, too cold, too much pollen. So, we glassed it in. And that table is almost identical to the one we had in the solarium at the White House.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) You know, I'm surprised you can -you do your arm like this and I keep wanting to go, no.

BILL CLINTON

No, no, no. I can actually hold my arms behind my chest for the first time. But it's only in the last week I can do that. No, no. It's fine. It needs stretching.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) Stretching for me. And then ... there he is, stretching on the stage with John Kerry. Hard to believe just seven weeks since they wheeled him out of surgery.

BILL CLINTON

You know, I remember being a little sore. And I had all those tubes in me. You know, they stick all the tubes in you. When they pull the tubes out, that's one of the most bracing things in the world. You got these huge tubes in your chest. They just pull them out. It's like, you know, these snakes are slithering around inside you. It was pretty interesting.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) You have a pillow that says, "it only hurts when I laugh."

BILL CLINTON

Yeah, it kills you when you laugh and you talk -cough. When you sneeze, it's awful. So, they give you these little pillows to hug to your chest. You know, and you feel like you're about 4-years-old hugging your bear. But that was the most difficult part. And that and not knowing when I was going to lose mental clarity. When I'd just get tired, I said, look, I just can't talk anymore. I've got to go lie down or whatever.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) They do warn that everyone should be respectful afterwards of sometimes disorientation, depression.

BILL CLINTON

Some people have memory loss. I've heard all kinds of stories. I've talked to a friend who had some memory loss for a year afterward. And a week of depression. I talked to several people who felt periods of depression.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) You have had none?

BILL CLINTON

None of that. And I think -but I think it's because for many people, especially busy active people, it's the first time they ever come face-to-face with their own mortality. You know, I never been particularly morbid about death. I think it's because, you know, my father died before I was born.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) So, I understand Mrs. Clinton changed the telephone number on you here.

BILL CLINTON

Yeah, she was afraid I'd be on the phone too quick when I came home.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) And you knew your husband.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

And I know my husband. And I know his multitude of friends.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Did he say, "nobody's calling me"?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

He did. At one point he said, jeez, nobody's called. And then, I 'fessed up. I said, well, we sort of made it possible for you to get some rest.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Senator Clinton is a tough nurse?

BILL CLINTON

Yeah. She was -she was so afraid that I would just be living on the phone. So, we rerouted our phones to the office. You know, it was interesting, we got 100,000 e-mails, 10,000 letters and hundreds and hundreds of phone calls. And, as it turned out, she has nothing to fear because, number one, 'cause when she wasn't here, Chelsea was coming up and spending the night with me. 'Cause she, you know, works in New York. But in the first couple of weeks, I couldn't have done that. I was too tired.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) We read that for people who have been through what you've been through, every single thing they do, exercise, sex, lifestyle, becomes a calculation. So, when you see a Big Mac now, what does it say to you now?

BILL CLINTON

It's funny, I don't miss it. But, you know, I've got a wonderful little French restaurant down here in the town where -that stays open until midnight every night. You know, and I work late. So, I used to eat a lot of hamburgers there at 11:00 at night. So, now, I just eat salmon or tuna or something, you know. I just eat something else. And I don't think about it much. I don't -it's not a big deal. And you don't have to live like a monk. I mean, once in a while, every couple months, you can fall off the wagon, I guess. Although, I haven't yet. I don't want to take any chances.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) He says that he goes to the restaurant now and it's tuna and salmon.

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Yeah.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) That's going to be hard, isn't it, down the road?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

It is. It's gonna be very hard.

DOCTOR ALLAN SCHWARTZ

I'm sure there's some data to the contrary, but not a lot. I think it's okay to cheat once in a while.

DOCTOR CRAIG SMITH

He's really well along here.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) He says if anything his cholesterol these days is too low. And he started to work out with weights again. Though many people were stunned to see how thin he was when he headed out to campaign.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Should he be doing this?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Well, I think he does look noticeably thinner.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) You weren't worried?

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

I just said, I just want to be sure. I just want you to tell me that you feel fine. He said, I really do. He said, I wouldn't do it if I didn't. And I believe that.

DIANE SAWYER

(Voice Over) So, what's next? He has a foundation combating AIDS around the world. But he expressed a strange nostalgia for that six weeks convalescence. Finally a chance to think, read.

BILL CLINTON

If you work like I have, all your life, having a period of enforced contemplation and rest is really good.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) Is politics so important?

BILL CLINTON

Not in the way that it used to be. I don't feel the passion about the game that I used to feel. But I feel, in a funny way, more passionately about the consequences of the decisions that people in office make that affect other people's lives. So, I feel kind of distant from the to and fro of the elections. And a lot of these things I see happening, I just shake my head and say, gosh, I did that for 20 years and I know, but it doesn't have much to do with how we're going to live when it's over. On the other hand, I think it matters profoundly. I thought, you know, you've been given an unknown but substantial amount of extra time. And you should give it back. So, that's what I'm going to try to do.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) The indestructible man you married is ...

SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON

Still indestructible.

BILL CLINTON

This is, believe it or not, really good for my heart. The thing that has really touched me, I think most of all, is all the letters from people telling me that they or their relatives have gone in to see their doctor, have gotten checkups, are trying to do something about this. That, to me, has been the most moving thing of all. I just hope some good can come out of this for other people. 'Cause a lot of good came out of it for me.

DIANE SAWYER

(Off Camera) A lot of good, he says, and a reminder of what he wrote at the end of his book. That preachers are always warning that someday we're all going home. And he says, I want to be ready. We'll be back.

"Primetime Live" continues. Here, now, Chris Cuomo.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 11/17/2004

LARRY KING, HOST: Tonight, Hillary Clinton. Her first live, primetime interview since the election. It's in Little Rock, Arkansas. We're here for the William Jefferson Clinton Presidential Center which opens tomorrow.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton next on LARRY KING LIVE.

After we deplaned this afternoon and came up that little road from the airport and see that center lit up tonight, what a -- and we had a little private tour. You must be flipped.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, (D) NEW YORK: I am so proud, Larry. And my husband's worked on this now for, oh, about 6 years. And he's been involved in every aspect of the design and planning. And it exceeded my highest expectations.

KING: It's beautiful. Hands-on, right?

H. CLINTON: Very hands-on. What you know, what is so important about it is that, No. 1, it's a beautiful building, as you saw. And it's a metaphor. It is the bridge to the 21st Century, which of course was his great slogan when he was running.

And it also is open and airy and light. And it kind of conveys the sense of openness in our government. And then inside, someone said today it was the first museum of the 21st Century. It's so technologically advanced. Literally you can go, as you saw today...

KING: Push buttons and get everything.

H. CLINTON: Get everything. I mean, if you want to know what happened June 1, 1997, you punch the button. If you want to know if Larry King is in the library...

KING: I'm in, interviews, dates and schedules.

H. CLINTON: They're all there. It tells the story. The full comprehensive history of the Clinton administration. And it's both moving and exciting and informative. And I just could not be happier.

KING: You're going to have some opening here tomorrow. You've got President Bush, former President Bush, President Carter, Gerald Ford a little under the weather.

H. CLINTON: Right. Unfortunately.

KING: Two former presidents -- 3 former presidents with your husband. The current president. You're going to have ceremonies.

H. CLINTON: Right. We're going to have heads of state, former heads of state. Oh, it is just an overwhelming event.

But I think that tomorrow is especially important, because it's one of those rituals in American politics. You know, we just went through a very difficult and divisive election, but we're all going to be there together. Two Democrats, 2 Republicans, talking about the future.

KING: Almost half the Congress.

H. CLINTON: There's a huge number of senators and Congressmembers coming. And what I like is the symbolic aspect of it, because I remember when Bill was president and we went to former President Bush's library opening in Texas. There's just something very reassuring that despite our differences, no matter how partisan times can be, that we all remember that we're all part of this history. We have to do the best we can.

KING: We're going to back to it a little later.

First, how is the president?

H. CLINTON: Well, he is doing fine.

KING: We're in the same club.

H. CLINTON: I know you are. And you remember that you gain your strength steadily, but slowly. So I think he'd be the first to say he's not back up to 100 percent.

But his doctors say he's doing fine. He certainly is feeling well. But he just doesn't yet have that incredible Clinton tirelessness that I've known for 31 years.

KING: Is he revved up for this?

H. CLINTON: Oh, he's so excited. And he's just really gratified. I mean, so many people contributed. There were over 100,000 contributors to the library. There are people who are coming from all over the world to be here. And it is his effort to try to really keep the conversation going about what sort of country we want to have. That's what he believes in. That's what he loves.

KING: He saves everything, right. Because I think every letter ever written to President Clinton is here.

H. CLINTON: I think it's darn close. In part, because he became president at the very beginning of the information age -- e-mail.

KING: Cell phones boom.

H. CLINTON: Exactly. When bill was elected there were I think 50 sites on the world wide web. By the time he left there were, 50 million sites. And so the explosion in information, and the archives, which is the formal repository of all of the documents and the artifacts is just overwhelmed by everything there. So we're going to have a lot of rotating exhibits.

KING: You toured it with Chelsea today. What does his daughter think?

H. CLINTON: She loves it. She is much more attuned than I am to the technology. So she thought the way that the exhibits were presented -- well, you saw some of the almost ticker tape descriptions of what was happening, the videos everywhere.

KING: It's very 21st Century.

H. CLINTON: Very 21st Century.

KING: When everything's covered, the impeachment is covered, Lewinski is covered. I mean, they don't -- you get a full history of Clinton, warts and all.

H. CLINTON: I like to think, all of the good progress that was made in those 8 years. What he really stood for, the peace and the prosperity, putting people first. What everyone wants to say about my husband, everybody knows that he really deeply cared about the American people and he did try to do what he could to improve their chances in life.

KING: We'll get back to the library in a while.

Major story today in the New York Times. saying, in essence, Senator Clinton has decided to run for re-election in 2006 and a lot of key advisers are saying don't do that, because if you run for Senate in 2006, you can't run for the presidency in 2008, it's too close together. What will you tell the people of New York? So let's hear it from the horse's mouth.

H. CLINTON: Well, I have said I'm looking forward to and intending to run for re-election. I do provide a lot of copy, Larry, as you know. People are constantly speculating about me and my life.

KING: So, help us.

H. CLINTON: I love being the senator from New York. You know, it's the greatest place in the world. There's no place like New York.

And I have enjoyed the work there. I now think we're going to have some very difficult decisions ahead of us. I want to be part of making those decisions.

KING: So, you want to go back to the Senate?

H. CLINTON: I love being in the Senate.

KING: Would you like to be president? I mean, that's a fair question. You could say, I don't want to be. I think about it. H. CLINTON: You know, I'm not focused on that. I'm focused on what I'm doing and how well I can do it. That will take care of itself sometime.

KING: This is a good if question.

H. CLINTON: A good if.

KING: Assuming now you're going to run for the Senate, would you tell the people of New York you'll serve 6 years?

H. CLINTON: You know, I haven't gotten that far. I don't have any plans other than running for the United States Senate. And I'm looking forward to getting out there and talking about my record.

KING: When does that campaign start?

H. CLINTON: Well, in these kind of days...

KING: Next week?

H. CLINTON: Yes. I have to raise a lot of money. I'm fortunate in that I have wonderful supporters throughout New York and around the country. So they'll be helping me. But I have a lot of money to raise. I want to be in a position to withstand whatever challenge might come my way.

KING: Do you have any idea who might the opponent be?

H. CLINTON: I don't, Larry. You know, that's something -- I don't have any control over, so I don't think about it. That's up to the other side.

KING: You don't think, Giuliani, Pataki?

H. CLINTON: I don't have any inside information. That's not something that they share with me. So, I'll just wait and see who files against me.

KING: How devastated were you by the Kerry defeat?

H. CLINTON: I was very disappointed. I really believed that John was going to do it. He ran a strong campaign. He worked so hard throughout the country. I did everything I could to help him, as so many others did.

We came up short in the White House and in the Senate. And I think that means we've got to take a hard look at what we stand for as a party and how we present to the American people both the values and the priorities that Democrats are willing to fight for.

KING: When did we become a red and blue nation?

H. CLINTON: Well, I regret that we are. I don't like to see it that way. You know, we're sitting here in Little Rock, Arkansas. And I have so many friends here, so many wonderful experiences. KING: A red state.

H. CLINTON: Now it is. It didn't used to be. It's gone back and forth in the last 8 elections. Five times for the Republicans, 3 times for the Democrats.

I think so much of it depends upon the candidate and the message, the campaign that's put together. Whether you connect with the American people. And that cuts across all the lines.

There should be an effort to try to bring the country together again. I don't accept the fact that it's red versus blue. You know, in New York, we have red counties, 40 counties in New York voted for President Bush this time. You know, I work as hard as I can in every single county in the state. I try to represent everybody to the best of my ability.

And I think that's what we should do when we run for office. I don't think we should write off or ignore any part of the state. I don't think we should do that in the country.

So I'm hoping that maybe we can get back in the years to come to nationwide elections where we talk to the entire nation, where we travel through the entire country, and where we have a conversation about what matters.

You know people in red states and blue states love their children, care about their futures, worry about their jobs, wonder about their health care and definitely are concerned about the values that surround us. So I think we ought to have an open national conversation about this.

KING: Would you abandon the electoral college?

H. CLINTON: Well, you know, I think the electoral college is running afoul of our one person, one vote. I think realistically, it's unlikely ever to be abandoned. But...

KING: If you could wave a wand, would you?

H. CLINTON: You know, I'm inclined to think it may have outlived its usefulness at this point.

KING: We'll take a break and be back with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. We're at the beautiful -- and the only way you could term it, it's a magnificent structure, the William Jefferson Clinton library in Little Rock, Arkansas on the banks of the river, right next to the -- we're broadcasting from the old train station that was the Rock Island line. It's a mighty good line. That was a song once. Big hook. Do you remember that song?

CLINTON: I do.

KING: The Rock Island Line is a mighty good line. We'll be right back, don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BILL CLINTON, FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I wanted to make a contribution to the development of this city that I love so much. I also wanted the library to be in the middle of America, where people from all walks of life and all states passing through on the interstate, landing on the highway, coming here to conventions, doing whatever, could see what it is like to be president.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: He could have chosen other places, right? there were offers?

CLINTON: A lot of offers. But there wasn't any real choice in his mind, other than Arkansas. You know, this is a place that nurtured him and helped to raise him. It's a place that let him be their governor for all those years. And he couldn't have become president without the people of Arkansas standing behind him. I was thrilled when he decided to come here. And it's a beautiful location, as you've seen, right along the banks of the Arkansas River. And what I am especially pleased about is that I heard today, you know, that somewhere between $800 million to $900 million in economic development has already resulted because of Bill's decision to put the library here. And it's just -- I was at a big event today with all the former first ladies of the state of Arkansas who are still living. And you know, there are such wonderful memories. This is where we were married, this is where our daughter was born.

KING: You drove a car here.

CLINTON: I did. I used to drive a car here, I shopped here, I was sort a normal person, hard to believe.

KING: You have never voted in the Senate for a Supreme Court nominee.

CLINTON: That's right.

KING: We would imagine the next four years, you may have a few.

CLINTON: It may be.

KING: What will be your parameter? Must they be pro-choice? Is there a litmus, as you would vote?

CLINTON: I am going to take them as they come, each individual person. That's what I've tried to do with all of President Bush's nominees. I've voted on, my goodness, you know, more than 200. And we've confirmed more than 200. We have turned back a relative handful, I think maybe 10 of the nominees. So I think that the percentage is very much in favor of the process. There are those who want everything, but that's not the way the system should work. I mean, this is a system of compromise, where people have to be assured that we're within the bounds of whatever the mainstream is. And so I have voted in the last four years for judges who are certainly not in agreement with me on a lot of major issues but who I thought would be fair and judicious, would not allow whatever their personal opinions were to interfere with the kind of decision-making that will inspire confidence in the judiciary.

KING: You'll vote that same way for...

CLINTON: I will certainly vote that same way. And I will look at each individual nominee and weigh that person on the merits and then make a decision.

KING: Would you participate in a filibuster if that occurred?

CLINTON: I have. I have already. Because I think it's the duty of a senator -- you know, what happened in my husband's eight years was that the Republican Majority often wouldn't even let a well-qualified nominee come to the floor of the Senate. And so they would keep them bottled up in committee, they would never give them a hearing, they would never give them a vote in the committee, which I thought was very unfortunate. But unfortunately for us, we have very few tools at our disposal to make sure that everything is fully debated and the views are heard. And oftentimes, a filibuster is there for a purpose, which is to have the minority exercise its right to have a very strong view about what advise and consent means under our constitution.

KING: What do you make of what's going on with cabinet replacements?

Let's start with Rice for Powell.

CLINTON: Well, it's the president's prerogative. He has won his second term and, he gets to choose the people he wants. I think that Secretary Powell was a very significant influence within the administration during the first term. And although he didn't win very many arguments, at least counterpoints were heard in the highest level of debate. I don't know that that will happen now. I have a great deal of respect for Dr. Rice. She's an incredibly intelligent, devoted public servant. But it's very clear that she's not going to be disagreeing with the president or the vice president or the secretary of defense.

And I think debate and even dissent is very healthy in an administration. Otherwise, you do develop group think. We got into problems with that around the weapons of mass destruction and the Iraq war, where group think took over. And I don't think that's the way that you arrive at the best decisions.

KING: What do you think about General Ashcroft leaving?

CLINTON: Well, I think that that was probably an important step. Because he certainly did not have the confidence of a lot of people in the country on important issues that concerned civil liberties, individual freedoms. And I'll look forward to hearing more about what Mr. Gonzalez will bring to that job.

KING: What committees do you sit on?

CLINTON: On the Environment and Public Works Committee, on one that's called Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, and the Armed Services Committee. So I have my hands full with three very significant assignments.

KING: Armed Services being the most?

CLINTON: Well, it has taken up most of my time, because the work has been overwhelming. We have not only had the usual hearings you have to have with respect to what's going on in the Defense Department, but because of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and certainly the prison scandal at Abu Ghraib, we've had a lot of extra hearings and the work has been intense.

KING: What do you make of that shooting in Iraq?

CLINTON: I don't want to jump to any conclusions. I think it's appropriate there is an investigation, as there well should be. You know, it's easy to either jump to someone's defense or to the side of prosecution. But I like to see what the facts are and I'm going to wait until the report's finished.

KING: And your committee will be involved in testimony? Will it?

CLINTON: We'll see. I think that there's an ongoing investigation. We certainly will hear the results of that investigation. But it would probably not be appropriate to have any hearings about it until we get the facts.

KING: We'll be right back with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, on the occasion of her husband's library opening officially tomorrow.

We took a tour of it earlier. There you see it. By the way it's lit so that ultraviolet rays during the day of the sun do not get through. That's why it is very brightly lit. Architects have praised it widely, except one critic in the "London Economist" who said it looked like a recreational vehicle. Well, even that ain't bad. We'll be right back. Don't go away.

KING: Here's this library. Official opening is tomorrow. William Jefferson Clinton. We're looking forward to his return to this program. He was on the night he went into the hospital.

H. CLINTON: That's right, I remember. I was sitting there when he called you. And I so appreciate the work that you do through your foundation. And one of the reasons why Bill's not here and I am is because he still just doesn't have his full strength back and he wants to sort of conserve his strength for tomorrow, which is such a big day. But you and I were talking before we went on the air about how you just really have to work through this. Then eventually you get back to your full energy. KING: You feel better every day if things go right.

H. CLINTON: You do, every day you feel better. But I think he wants to do some work on behalf of heart disease too.

KING: I want to get back to the library but one other thing, it was printed -- that could be wrong -- that you, using your heavy clout, convinced Chuck Schumer to not run for governor, getting him better posts in committees so that Eliot Spitzer could run for governor. True? You don't even have to give me a long answer.

H. CLINTON: No. Chuck made up his own mind. I'm delighted he's going to stay in the Senate. He's doing a great job. He has for years.

KING: You didn't work behind the scenes at keeping him...

H. CLINTON: Well, I tried to persuade him that it would be great for the Senate. But he made his own decision.

KING: You're going to support Eliot Spitzer?

H. CLINTON: Well, I don't support anybody in a primary. But if there's no primary, I will be an enthusiastic supporter.

KING: You have a place in this library. What do you think of the Hillary part?

H. CLINTON: Well, I'm thrilled. It's very gratifying to have the work I did on behalf of health care and women and children and education and adoption, all the things that I cared about, highlighted in the library. And it is also exciting to see the second floor of exhibition space, about some of the behind the scenes of the White House. The little stories about our time at Christmas. Or the place settings of the china that I helped to design for the millennium, my inaugural gown from 1997. The kind of personal touches that people love to see.

And the oval office in this library is the exact replica. It's the first time they've ever had it exact size. So people who have never been to Washington, would never get to go to the Oval Office, will get a chance to see it.

KING: How about students?

H. CLINTON: I can't wait for students to be in this library. Because there's something for every age. There's a wonderful series of just the exhibits that are funny, the kind of gifts, the swords that come from different heads of state around the world to people who can really delve into it for research papers.

So every age of student is going to learn something in this library.

KING: What didn't you like about it?

H. CLINTON: You know, having been through it today, there is absolutely nothing I've found that I don't like.

KING: Really? Did you sign off on this by the way?

H. CLINTON: I certainly offered my suggestions. But this was such a labor of love for Bill. He labored over it. He offered so many ideas to the architects and to the designers. And he knew every nook and cranny about what was going to be in the library. I didn't have that level of involvement.

So when I saw it today, obviously I had an idea of what I was going to see. But it was so much more. It was -- it had a vitality to it, an energy that I just found infectious. I was walking through it, and I had tears in my eyes in some places, and I was bursting out laughing in other places. It just came alive for me again.

KING: What does a library do for, if anything, for a legacy?

H. CLINTON: I think that for Bill, it gives him a chance to do the official part of it, which is to turn his papers and artifacts over to the country, to take possession of them through the National Archives.

KING: And the country takes possession tomorrow. It belongs to the United States tomorrow.

H. CLINTON: Absolutely. Now he had to raise the money privately to build the museum part of it. And it really stands for what he cares about in governing and in politics. And it talks about the issues that he thought were important to the country and the way he kept score. The way he kept score is, were more people working when he left than when he started? Were we in better financial shape when he left than when we started? Did more people find their way out of poverty than when he started? All the things that really matter to improving the lives. That's what he thinks politics is about.

But this is only part of his legacy. Because he's so young. And this is also not only the place where the library and the museum are situated, but as you say, right here we're in the Clinton school of public policy. We're going to be giving degrees to people who want to become better public servants. He's going to be running his foundation out of the library here and out of his office in Harlem in New York. He's going to continue the work on HIV/AIDS prevention and treatment around the world, and racial and religious reconciliation, and economic empowerment.

So I don't think that this captures his entire legacy. It takes time, both for history to look back, but also he's got a lot of work he still wants to do. He's going to remain very active here at home and around the world.

KING: What does he want to do more than that, more than a foundation and an office in Harlem? Does he have larger plans?

H. CLINTON: I think, Larry, he really wants to make a difference in the world. He wants to continue the work he did in Northern Ireland, in the Balkans, in the Middle East. He's already met with some former and present government officials, heads of state and others just in the last two days here in Little Rock. Talking about what they can do together. Because people come to him and they ask him for advice. They ask him for his ideas about solving problems. He wants to save lives with diseases like HIV/AIDS. He really cares passionately about the work of the foundation.

KING: When President Bush was on this show a couple of months ago, we talked about how gracious he was when the official portrait was unveiled in the White House. And he said that he has terrific admiration for president Clinton, his personality and his verve. Do you think that he might be called upon to key areas maybe help this administration at times? And would he take it?

During the campaign, President Bush said that he would like to think of ways to call on Bill. And I know Bill would be more than willing to help. Both because he thinks that when your president asks you to help, you say yes. And secondly, because he'd like to provide whatever assistance because he knows more than the rest of us what that job is like. Really, the pressures on whoever the president is are so enormous. They are almost unimaginable for most Americans. I've seen it up close. You've seen it closer than most people. You know what a toll this job takes on any person. So if he were asked, I know he would be more than willing to help.

KING: We'll take a break, come back with our remaining moments with Senator Clinton. And then Mack McLarty, the former White House chief of staff, only went to kindergarten with Bill Clinton, will be with us. Ann Richards, the former governor of Texas. And historian Michael Beschloss will look at the life and times of the former president. Right back with more moments with Senator Clinton after this.

KING: We're back on LARRY KING LIVE. We're in Little Rock. Another shot of the President Clinton Library which opens officially tomorrow. They're forecasting rain by the way.

H. CLINTON: Oh, no, can't rain.

KING: Well, make a call as I said. Do you think the impeachment thing was handled tastefully and well?

H. CLINTON: I do. I do. I've told everyone that the history was going to be full and accurate. Nothing's left out. Obviously, not everything can be shown. But there's going to be access to all of the documents. In fact, Bill is going to be making his documents accessible even earlier than legally required.

KING: He is?

H. CLINTON: He is. Because he really thinks it's important. That's one of the things the library really stands for. It physically stands for openness with all the glass and the light. But he wants it to be a place where people come and really study. And everything's going to be available. KING: A couple of other things. Senator Harry Reid. What do you think about him?

H. CLINTON: Wonderful guy. I adore him.

KING: He's your new head.

H. CLINTON: He is. And I'm an enthusiastic supporter. Obviously I'm so sad for Tom Daschle, who's a wonderful, wonderful man and a great public servant. I only wish the best for him and his family. Harry Reid will be a tough competitor. He's fair. He listens. He'll get along wherever possible with the White House and the Republicans on the other side of the aisle. But he'll stand his ground. He's a wonderful human being.

KING: The death of Arafat. Make you hopeful?

H. CLINTON: I have to be hopeful. I cannot afford not to be hopeful. We have to hope that the Palestinian people will make a transition to new leadership and will look for a way to adopt a two- state solution so that the people of Palestine, particularly the children, have a brighter future. The Palestinian people are such an intelligent, creative, entrepreneurial people when they...

KING: Poets of the Middle East.

H. CLINTON: And when they leave the region and come to the United States or Europe, they're successful in every walk of life. They should be able to do that in the area where they are now living, without having to leave. But that's going to require new leadership. It's going to require the United States becoming engaged and making clear that we're looking for some resolution that guarantees security for Israel and peace for the people.

KING: Do you know why Arafat turned that deal down that your husband brokered with him and Barak?

H. CLINTON: I do not, Larry. I think that when the time came to be a statesman, he couldn't do it. He was stuck in a time warp that had passed him by. But he wanted to hang on to what was familiar. He did a great disservice to his people, in my opinion.

KING: Are you hopeful about the elections in Iraq?

H. CLINTON: I am. We have a long way to go before we can hold secure elections. And we need to hold elections simultaneously in all parts of the country. It would be very troubling if we left certain parts of the country out. So therefore, we have to provide sufficient security so that the Sunni population is able to vote along with the Shia and the Kurds. It is certainly conceivable that with the capture of Falluja and driving out the insurgents there we are closer to making that happen. But we still have a lot of work to do.

KING: What are you going to do tomorrow?

H. CLINTON: I am so excited. I'm going to enjoy every minute of the dedication. And I have the great pleasure of introducing my husband. And we will have an incredible ceremony with the former presidents, along with President Bush speaking.

KING: Will President Bush speak?

H. CLINTON: Absolutely. He will speak. And I remember very fondly when Bill and I went to the dedication of former President Bush's library. It was a wonderful occasion. There's a camaraderie, a collegiality among former presidents and present presidents and first ladies that I'm really looking forward to tomorrow. I'm looking forward to welcoming the Bushes to the library. There will be a lot of presidential family children. I've already seen Susan Eisenhower and Linda and Lucy Johnson, Caroline Kennedy will be there. I think one or both of the Nixon daughters will be here. There's a real sense of identity with one another. We've been through an experience as members of a presidential family that is unlike any in the world. And it's a great privilege. It's often hard. But the honor is just overwhelming.

KING: And of course you like the collegiality of the Senate.

H. CLINTON: I do. I like...

KING: It's a club, isn't it?

H. CLINTON: It is. And even though we have people with very strong opinions, and I would include myself in that category, we find ways to work together.

KING: Always good seeing you, Senator. Send our best to Bill. We look forward to seeing him soon.

H. CLINTON: Thank you, Larry. Thanks for coming.

"On the Record with Greta Van Susteren," FOX, 11/17/2004

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: I think I know a great leader when I see one. And so does America. In 1992 and 1996, Americans chose a president who left our country in better shape than when he took office.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

VAN SUSTEREN: This is a special edition of ON THE RECORD, live from Little Rock, Arkansas, where the Clinton Presidential Center officially opens tomorrow. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton also has her own alcove in the library dedicated to programs she ran as first lady.

Earlier, I met with Senator Clinton for her first sit-down interview since the election. I started by asking her when she first came to Arkansas.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: In 1974. And so I spent 18 wonderful years here, first in Fayetteville and then in Little Rock.

VAN SUSTEREN: In your wildest dreams, did you ever think it would come to this?

CLINTON: No!

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: You know, I am overwhelmed. We had an incredible reunion lunch of all of the former first ladies of Arkansas today. And we told stories about what it was like moving into the governor's mansion, because a couple of us literally showed up with U-hauls and, you know, unloaded our things in the governor's mansion. And the idea that I would have, you know, had just this extraordinary experience here, the people were so wonderful to Bill and me, and then, you know, they helped make him president. And he wanted to bring the library right back here to really show how much he cares about Arkansas.

VAN SUSTEREN: Who designed this library?

CLINTON: Jim Polshack (ph) and a wonderful team of his young, vigorous creative architects. But Bill Clinton had a big hand in it. He knew exactly what he wanted. He wanted a building that would be architecturally significant and environmentally advanced. And it just won an environmental award. He wanted a building that was open and light, that was a real metaphor for what he thinks government and democracy should be, which is, you know, open to the people.

And then, in working with the architects, he and they came up with this idea of a building that was representative of the metaphor of building the bridge to the 21st century. I think they've done a fabulous job. This is really, probably, I think, fair to say, the first museum of the 21st century because it's so interactive, it's so technologically advanced.

VAN SUSTEREN: You know what I think is sort of interesting, as I went through the statistics about it, there are something like 80 million documents in there. I don't know who went through those documents, who had that job. But there are 20 million e-mails. I mean, this probably must be the -- this has to be the first presidential library with e-mails.

CLINTON: That's right. Well, when we, you know, were first moving into the White House in 1993, there were, I think, 50 sites on the World Wide Web, and it was mostly for scientists. And by the time Bill left -- you know, I can't remember, some huge number like 50 million.

And so this library, in part because Bill liked to, you know, respond to people and made sure that his staff was so attentive, people felt like they could write to the president. They felt connected to him. He always conveyed a sense that he cared about people, and that was a hallmark of his administration.

But the result is that it's a rather enormous archive because everything is moved from Washington to wherever the president, whoever the president is, builds his library, and we have literally millions and millions of pieces of paper. And I'm really proud of the fact that he's going to try to get as much of it open for the public, for scholars, for the press, as soon as possible because he believes in open government. He wants people to see the whole picture, see, you know, everything that he wrote on, every memo that came to him that he responded to because he worked really hard, which meant that people generated a lot for him, as the president, to -- you know, to read, analyze and respond to.

VAN SUSTEREN: Will he be giving lectures and participating? Will it be more than sort of just an archive or a museum?

CLINTON: It will be. Obviously, the museum is the attraction for the thousands of people who are going to be coming starting today and tomorrow. The archives are there for scholars and researchers. But there's also the Clinton School of Public Policy, which will begin to grant degrees to people, primarily in, you know, mid-life, or certainly after they've had some real-world experience, who want to make a difference in the public arena. That's going to be a major part of Bill's focus.

The foundation, which is located here and in New York at his Harlem office, will continue the work he has started primarily on behalf of HIV/AIDS prevention and treatment in Latin America, Africa and Asia. He will continue to work on economic empowerment and helping people really get the tools that they need to make better lives for themselves economically, racial and religious reconciliation, one of the biggest issues facing us, something he started when he was president.

So it's going to be a very active post-presidency, as it already has been the last four years. And he hopes to be able to hold a lot of seminars and meetings, international meetings, as well as, you know, national and local ones, here at the library and the entire center complex.

VAN SUSTEREN: This is great for Little Rock. I mean, I've talked to people here. They think that -- you know, they're excited to have it, as well as it's going to generate money for the community.

CLINTON: Well, I was told today at the luncheon I attended at the convention center with all of our former first ladies on behalf of the governor's mansion, that it's already generated close to a billion dollars in economic development.

VAN SUSTEREN: Is there a part of the building that talks about the first lady, a part of the museum?

CLINTON: There is. There's an -- one of the alcoves on the main floor tries to cover the work that I did as first lady with Bill and on behalf of issues affecting women and children at home and around the world -- obviously, health care, education, adoption, many of the causes I tried to champion.

And then on the second floor of the exhibit space, there are some of the more personal features. There's my inaugural dress from 1997. There's one of the gowns that I wore at one of the state dinners. There's a wonderful table that is set up as though it were for a state dinner, using the china that I had designed for the millennium. And then there are all these really touching pictures and artifacts that are both about us, as a family in the White House, and what people sent us and the gifts that they gave us, and you know, the pictures they drew.

It's both funny and touching. And the archivists who have some experience at other presidential libraries tell me that it's likely to be the most popular part of the library because it's the human part, you know.

VAN SUSTEREN: Does it talk about you running for the Senate?

CLINTON: It does, you know, just a little slice because that did happen at the end of Bill's term. So there's a picture there of my election. But it's mostly about what Bill did and what I tried to help him do. And it's all interactive, so that you can literally touch a computer screen and you can see what happened on every day of the year of all eight years.

And there's a constant running video. There are many, many video screens, and there's interviews and statements from people like Nelson Mandela. And you just get a sense of the -- the almost explosive energy that went into Bill's presidency, that there was so much happening. There was, you know, so many positive steps for our nation, whether it was, you know, driving the crime rate down or the welfare reform or anything else that strikes you.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

VAN SUSTEREN: As we go to break here at the library, there are fireworks in the background. We're going to be back with much more from the former first lady of the United States. Stay with us.

VAN SUSTEREN: They're shooting off fireworks in Little Rock, Arkansas, outside the president's new presidential center right here behind me. And now for more of our interview with the former first lady, Senator Hillary Clinton. I asked her what it's like when a number of U.S. presidents from different parties get together.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

CLINTON: I remember very well when Bill was president, and we went down to Texas A&M for the dedication of the first President Bush's library. And it's a tradition. So tomorrow, we'll have former president Jimmy Carter, former president Bush, and President and Mrs. Bush with us. And I think that's especially important after this election, to show unity on behalf of our nation, to show our leaders past and present there together, really focusing on the future together. And it's, to me, a very touching part of our American political tradition.

VAN SUSTEREN: Is it fun to see all of these former presidents and their wives?

CLINTON: It is fun because, you know, there are things that, no matter what party you are or what age you came into the office, that you only share with this small group of people. It's an awesome honor to be given the chance to serve the American people, and we were fortunate to have it for eight years. And there's just a kinship there. Even if you are on opposite sides of the partisan divide, there's a recognition of the sacrifice, the hard work, the real burdens that come with the office. And I enjoy, you know, seeing our predecessors, as well as President and Mrs. Bush, on occasions like this.

VAN SUSTEREN: Is the museum such that it -- you know, that it's going to capture things in the future, as well?

(LAUGHTER)

VAN SUSTEREN: For instance, let me give you the trick question. If you run for president in 2008, have you accommodated for that?

CLINTON: Well, I have no plans whatsoever of doing that. I...

VAN SUSTEREN: That was a trick question.

CLINTON: That was a trick question. You're good at it! But you know, I'm really happy being a senator from New York. But this is a library about the Clinton presidency, the Bill Clinton presidency.

VAN SUSTEREN: No, I couldn't -- I couldn't trick you into that. I couldn't trick you into that one!

(LAUGHTER)

VAN SUSTEREN: You know, I planned that one.

CLINTON: Well, you know, Greta, I -- I just feel so blessed. I mean, you know, coming back here -- and we've seen just in the, you know, few hours already, so many people who were part of the administration, who were supporters. I met three women who drove from Flint, Michigan. I met a couple who, you know, flew in from Seattle, Washington.

I'm just so touched by the outpouring of support for the idea that we want to remember what happened in those eight years, and we maybe want to learn some lessons from it, about how we try to build on positive progress. And obviously, you know, as the senator from New York, I'm thinking a lot about that because we're going to have big decisions facing us in the Senate. And you know, I really -- I'm hoping to bring some of the lessons of the Clinton presidency to the debate about issues like the deficit and Social Security and health care and other matters that are really important to people's lives.

VAN SUSTEREN: How about the Supreme Court? That's going to be a huge issue in this next four years.

CLINTON: Yes.

VAN SUSTEREN: What is your expectation, in terms of any appointment that comes from the White House for the Supreme Court?

CLINTON: Well, I'm going to wait and see. I would love to be able to enthusiastically support President Bush's nominees. I have voted for the vast majority of them. I have opposed, you know, a handful of them. But the Supreme Court is such a critical institution in our balance of power and our checks and balances that I hope, if there are openings, that the president sends nominees who are, you know, really worthy of commanding broad-based bipartisan support, not only in the Senate but across the country.

VAN SUSTEREN: In terms of leadership in the Democratic Party, who do you endorse or support or who would you like to see head of the DNC?

CLINTON: You know, there's been no decision made about who the DNC chair will be, but a number of very able people have expressed an interest. What I think is important is that the energy and the ideas that I believe mark us as Democrats really get a full hearing. Obviously, we have to do a better job in communicating with people and, you know, putting out ideas that are both workable and worthy of support.

And I've been, you know, very willing to reach across the partisan divide in the Senate to work on ideas that I thought were worthy and important, and I'd like to see more of that. But at the same time, I think, as a Democrat, I also want to, you know, clearly articulate, you know, why we think it's important, for example, to deal with the deficit, you know, why we think that's good for America, as opposed to just, you know, being caricatured and kind of put in a box by people who don't agree with us.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

VAN SUSTEREN: And up next, more of our special interview with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton at the Clinton Presidential Center in Little Rock, Arkansas. And later: Does Scott Peterson's lawyer, Mark Geragos, have a new plan to keep his client off death row? There's breaking news out of Redwood tonight. We have the latest.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLINTON: Let's join together, not just those of us in this great hall tonight, but throughout our nation, and do everything we possibly can to convince our fellow Americans to look to the future, to look deep inside themselves. They know what is best for our children.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

VAN SUSTEREN: We're back with this special edition of ON THE RECORD. We're live from the Clinton Presidential Center in Little Rock, Arkansas, which officially opens tomorrow. And you can hear the fireworks in the background here. And we have more now from our interview with former first lady, now senator, Hillary Clinton. And first up in the last part of our interview is the 2004 election. Take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

VAN SUSTEREN: What happened? Why did the Democrats, why did Kerry not win, Senator Kerry not win? Why did you lose four seats in the Senate?

CLINTON: Well, I think the post-mortem on that is still going on. Obviously, I hoped we would do a lot better, and I was optimistic about both the presidential election and the Senate seats that were up. Clearly, we didn't do a very good job.

VAN SUSTEREN: Well, why not?

CLINTON: Well, I think that, first of all, it is hard. And it's been proven hard in history. We've never unseated an incumbent president during wartime. That's just a given. So John Kerry, who ran a really strong, vigorous campaign, had a big uphill climb. In addition to that, I think that, you know, we didn't really do as good a job as I think we can addressing the broad range of issues that concern people.

You know a lot of people think of New York as a blue state. Well, we have a lot of really blue areas. We have some really red areas too. You know, President Bush carried I think 40 counties in New York.

And what I have found in the last four years is that, you know, people may not always agree with you but you owe them the respect of listening, which is something I believe very strongly in and, you know, expressing your opinions and having a dialog with people.

So, I hope that as we pick up the pieces from this last election we'll do more listening and reaching out and we won't just do it in the places that we won but, you know, we'll go to the places like Arkansas or upstate New York, places I'm very familiar with and, you know, listen to people and talk with people because I think if we do a better job of -- of clearly communicating what we stand for, we will do better in elections. I was struck that two groups where we lost ground were women and Hispanics.

VAN SUSTEREN: Why?

CLINTON: You know, there's no reason for that but I saw some very interesting research in one of the papers which said that, you know, about four percent of the people made up their mind in the last day and I don't think we can underestimate the impact on individuals of, you know, just the concerns about the Iraq war, the concerns about terrorism, which I understand.

I mean I, you know, I was there the day after 9/11 in New York. I saw the horrors of that attack. You know, I think we have to be, you know, strong and aggressive but we have to be smart and I don't know that we did as good a job as we should have sort of drawing the contrast.

You know let's just accept that we're going to do everything we can to keep America safe. That's what I've tried to do now for three years. But I don't think we've done enough in homeland security.

I don't think that we have protected our borders or our ports or provided our first responders with the resources they need, so we can do more and we can do better.

VAN SUSTEREN: How do you protect the borders, though? I mean like it's a great idea, you know, but I mean, I mean our borders are vast.

CLINTON: They are but there's technology now available. There are some advanced radar systems. There are biometric and other kinds of identification systems that we've been very slow to deploy and unwilling to spend money on.

With respect to our ports, which are part of our borders, we have under this administration steadfastly refused to provide the resources necessary to examine the sufficient of cargo containers coming into our ports that would serve as a deterrent.

We have done a better job with airport security but we still aren't where we need to be with cargo, either passenger or other forms of cargo. So, there's just a lot of work that we have started but we haven't had the urgency or the resources that I think every expert who has looked at homeland security who has come and said, "Here's what we need to do for borders. Here's what we need to do for ports. Here's what we need to do for chemical plants and nuclear plants. Here's what we need to do for our first responders."

We have bipartisan independent reports, which have spanned a couple of years. They all say the same thing. They all provide the same sort of recommendations and so far, even with the 9/11 Commission report, we have not put into effect what I think would make us safer going forward.

VAN SUSTEREN: Is it money?

CLINTON: I think it's money and it's will. Clearly, when you're in a deficit like we are, you know, we went from a balanced budget with a surplus when Bill left office to the biggest deficit we've ever had and...

VAN SUSTEREN: We're in a war though. We have a war. I mean we have a war.

CLINTON: We do but we also have huge tax cuts that are unaffordable that are shifting the tax burden rather dramatically away from those of us who are most able to bear it to the middle class, which I don't agree with.

And so, we have had a president who has been the first in our history to take us to war and cut taxes at the same time. That's never happened before. You know, you can't have everything in life. You know, I try to teach my daughter that. I try to preach about that to, you know, people all the time.

You've got to make choices. Life is a series of choices and, you know, ironically this administration seems to be the free lunch administration, you know, the big credit card in the sky and they have not controlled spending. They've not controlled tax cuts.

They allowed all the rules that used to balance us and having the kind of prudent approach toward budgeting that worked in the Clinton administration out the window. So, I think that it is a question of money but behind money it's a question of will and we just haven't had that.

VAN SUSTEREN: Why isn't it though in light of that that the Democrats didn't win? I mean if you hear those things and talk about the money, you talk about the borders I mean that certainly interests everybody.

CLINTON: Well, Greta, I think that we did a great job. I mean let's not forget how close we came but clearly we fell short and I think we have to take a hard look and analyze what our shortcomings were.

I want to be part of a dialog, a conversation because a lot of people who voted for Democrats in the past decided not to vote for Democrats this time and I think it's important that we understand exactly why and I don't think you can do that in the immediate aftermath of an election.

I think you have to wait, give it a little time, look at the real data that comes out and then, you know, engage in this kind of conversation that I'm advocating.

VAN SUSTEREN: How come we're not checking the bellies of these airplanes?

CLINTON: Beats me, bellies of airplanes, container ships. I worry a lot. I had legislation about dirty bombs. I had legislation about chemical plants, along with Jon Corzine from New Jersey. I had legislation about better security at nuclear plants.

We have fallen short and, you know, thankfully we have been able to avoid any consequences but I believe in being as prepared as possible and then if something doesn't happen, you know, great it didn't happen but we need to be as vigilant and prepared and use the resources that are necessary to protect our country.

VAN SUSTEREN: All right. Humor me. Is it safe to say that you have not flatly made up your mind not to run for president in 2008?

CLINTON: You are good. You are good.

VAN SUSTEREN: I'm trying. I'm trying.

CLINTON: You are so good. You're an old trial lawyer. I can tell.

VAN SUSTEREN: Senator Clinton, nice to see you and congratulations. The building looks exciting.

CLINTON: Well, I hope all the Fox viewers will come and see it, you know.

VAN SUSTEREN: I do too.

CLINTON: It will get their blood pressure going but that's always healthy.

VAN SUSTEREN: All right, nice to see you, Senator.

CLINTON: Thanks, Greta.

VAN SUSTEREN: Thank you.

And up next, new legal...

(NEWSBREAK)

VAN SUSTEREN: Coming up, paying the price for Laci's death. Does Mark Geragos have a new plan up his sleeve to make sure Scott Peterson doesn't pay with his life.

Plus, a late-breaking update on a college soccer star missing in upstate New York.

"Good Morning America," ABC, 11/18/2004

Many of the leading Democrats in this country are in Little Rock, Arkansas today for the opening of the Clinton Presidential Library, including a senator with a particular interest in the library. Talking, of course, about Senator Hillary Clinton. And our senior national correspondent, Claire Shipman, is with the senator in Little Rock. Claire?

graphics: feeling presidential?

graphics: hillary rodham clinton

CLAIRE SHIPMAN, ABC NEWS

(Off Camera) Charlie, that's right. Senator Clinton has spent almost as much time on this project, I think, as the president. Thank you so much for being with us this morning.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON,

DEMOCRAT, NEW YORK

It's a pleasure to be here with you. And welcome to the Clinton Library.

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

(Off Camera) Thank you.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

And, you know, it's been a real labor of love for Bill for about six years. And he's been deeply involved in planning it, and I think it really represents him. It's not, it's just open and welcoming and light, and I love to have you here with us.

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

(Voice Over) What did the two of you think when you saw the final product?

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

(Off Camera) Was it an emotional moment? Did you gagh

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

It was. Oh, Claire, it was a very emotional moment. I, I was here yesterday for the first time to see it with the exhibits all installed, and I'm just stunned by how well the building itself turned out. It's already won some awards, and it's all environmentally advanced, which I am very proud of. But then the exhibits, I mean, I was in tears in some places and I was laughing hysterically in other places. It was ...

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

(Voice Over) And the president? Has he been emotional about it?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Very emotional. Yeah. And, and, you know, it's also a time, over the last couple of days, when we've seen so many of the people who made his administration possible. People who served in government, people who supported him, you know, young people who were in the AmeriCorps program. It's just been an extraordinary experience.

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

(Off Camera) Now, I understand that on the very top there's an apartment ...

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Right.

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

(Off Camera) ... that you can stay in. So, I have these images of the president wandering through the Oval Office at night, looking at the files.

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

(Voice Over) I mean, will he stay there?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, when he's in Arkansas, which he hopes to be on a regular basis. I think everyone of the presidential libraries has an apartment, and this will be also used for entertaining. He's already, you know, visited with some heads of state, former heads of state, and members of governments in the last couple of days there. So, it will be a place for him to come. He wants to be involved in the work of the Clinton School of Public Policy, which he's very excited about. And I think, probably, visitors over the next years, you know, they might be standing, looking at an exhibit, or looking at the Oval Office, and somebody will say, what do you think about it? And they'll turn around, it's Bill Clinton.

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

(Off Camera) He'll wander in. And he knows every detail we were told. All right. Now, a lot of talk about perhaps in the future a second Clinton Presidential Library, because, you know, this is your husband's party, but the buzz is all about you. You want to tell us anything on "Good Morning America?" Are you going to run for president?

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Well, I'm going to run for re-election to the Senate, which I am very excited about, looking forward to. But I think if you go through this library, and you look at what was accomplished during the 1990's, there's some good lessons to be learned for, not only me, but for Democrats in general about what works and how better to connect with people and communicate with people. So, I'm going to be doing my part as a member of the Senate on behalf of the issues that New Yorkers and Americans care about.

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

You know, I think it depends upon the candidate. You know, and I also think we need people running for national office to try to bring our country together. You know, here we are in Arkansas, a place where I had a wonderful life for 18 years, and I think that the people in Arkansas, just like the people I represent in New York, care about, you know, their families, and their children, and their futures, and they want to exercise what they believe makes life important, like their faith and other important values. You know, I think we need to talk to each other. I think there's been an unnecessary division. And we may not always agree, but this country has survived and prospered because we've been able to figure out a way to bring people together to do what's right for our nation.

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

(Off Camera) All right, Senator Clinton. Well, it's a fabulous library. I hope you enjoy the day, and I hope it doesn't rain. Thank you so much for being with us.

SENATOR HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

Air Force One, with President Bush on his way, just said that maybe it will hold off. So, I'm hoping that's right.

CLAIRE SHIPMAN

(Off Camera) (inaudible). Thank you so much. All right, Charlie, back to you.

CHARLES GIBSON

(Off Camera) Claire, thanks very much. When we come back, the mementos of marriage. The little things that mean so much to our 125 couples renewing their vows.

"The Early Show," CBS, 11/18/2004

We're joined this morning in Little Rock by former first lady and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Good morning.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning, Harry.

SMITH: So much triumph, tumults of the years that your husband was president of the United States. As this day has drawn closer, what are some of the emotions you've been experiencing?

Well, it's been just an overwhelming experience to actually see the library after all of the work. Bill has just poured his heart into this labor of love. And the exhibits are an incredible walk down memory lane. It's a full and comprehensive picture of those eight years for us and for the nation. And the building itself is just so symbolic of Bill. I mean, it's not only a bridge to the 21st century, but it's open, it's light, it's welcoming. So this has been...

SMITH: It's better in person, by the way, isn't it?

Sen. CLINTON: Isn't it?

SMITH: Yes.

Sen. CLINTON: Isn't it amazing?

SMITH: So much better in person than on television.

Sen. CLINTON: And you know, that's often the case. I mean, people always say to me, 'You look better in person,' which--I never know quite how to take. But the building has already won some architectural awards and just won an international environmental award, because one of the things Bill wanted to do was to cut energy use. And that's achieved that.

SMITH: So it's a green building, too.

Sen. CLINTON: It's a green building as well as a beautiful, transparent, glass building.

SMITH: Right. But what about the insides? What about your insides as you're preparing for this day?

Sen. CLINTON: When I walked through the exhibits yesterday, there were moments when I was brought to tears and moments when I was laughing hysterically. I walked through with the head archivist, and I said, 'You know, I just can't believe what an incredible job you have done,' because it's not just dry history: Well, this happened then and you go from this to that. It really evokes the emotions--the highs, the lows, the accomplishments, and it lays out in very accessible form what Bill accomplished as our president, you know, the years of peace and prosperity, putting people first, that extraordinary campaign. You know, there are statistics about what happened when he started and what happened when he left; the number of people lifted out of poverty, the number of people with jobs, the number of children with health care. I think it's an extraordinary historical event, because it's really the first museum of the 21st century, the way it uses technology.

SMITH: Yeah, yeah.

Sen. CLINTON: You can go in and you can punch a screen, and you can find out what happened on June 1st, 1997.

SMITH: Yeah.

Sen. CLINTON: It's just extraordinary.

SMITH: It's interesting, because in this--we're coming out of an election where people were very polarized in the country. Your husband is viewed as a very polarizing figure. This is a day when partisanship is put aside for a bit, but can this building, can an event like this literally build a bridge between people, do you think?

Sen. CLINTON: We hope so. I mean, one of the reasons why I'm delighted that former presidents Carter and Bush will be here, along with President and Mrs. Bush, is because it's important for our nation to have these symbolic rituals, to show that we can put aside our differences, that we are united on behalf of our nation. I hope we can do more of that in the country, and I hope that this library and the foundation that Bill has started can be a bridge to bring people together from, you know, different points of view in our nation. We really have to have a conversation as a country again about the fact that we have so much more in common than separates us.

SMITH: I've been thinking, really this has been a road down memory lane for all of us, especially some of us who have been covering you all for a while, and I'm thinking about you sitting in the kitchen of what was the Arkansas Governor's Mansion with the Coke-bottle glasses on, now the senator from New York, and many people say perhaps a presidential candidate in another couple of years.

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I'm going to look forward to running for re-election. I have loved representing New York. I feel like I'm one of the most blessed people that you could ever meet. And I want to do the work that is important to New Yorkers and Americans. We're going to have a lot of big decisions. I mean, I will work wherever I can with the Republicans, but I think we need to stand our ground on issues like Social Security and the budget and other important matters. So I'm looking forward to getting back to work after the first of the year.

SMITH: Now I know you won't say whether or not you're going to run, but you can at least tell me whether or not you've thought about it.

Sen. CLINTON: You know, I've only thought about being the best senator I can be!

SMITH: You never seen...

Sen. CLINTON: There is a lot of good lessons to be learned.

SMITH: You've never seen a reporter actually choke a former first lady on television. OK.

Sen. CLINTON: There's a lot of lessons for anybody who does want to run for president, right back here in that building.

SMITH: Right in that building. There you go.

Thank you so much. We so appreciate it.

Sen. CLINTON: Oh, it's great to see you, Harry. Thanks.

SMITH: Great being with you.

We'll be right back.

"Live From," CNN, 11/18/2004

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Thank you so much.

And thank you for your forbearance and your extraordinary patience today as we celebrate the dedication of this extraordinary institution.

UNIDENTIFIED MALE: We love you.

H. CLINTON: Thank you.

Well, I'm going to cut my remarks short, and you can read them all on the clintonfoundation.org Web site.

But what I want to make is just three points.

First, I'm thrilled to have everyone here on this stage who represents the past, the present and the future of our country. And this is a special moment where people come together and make it clear that we are unified as Americans.

And I'm grateful for this moment, and I thank the former presidents and President Bush and the first ladies for being here.

Secondly, I want to thank all of you and millions more who have been so kind in supporting us during the recent weeks following Bill's surgery.

I thank you for your prayers and your good wishes. And I think you can see that he's back and strong and going forward.

But all of that support meant the world to Chelsea and me and I'm grateful to you.

Finally, I cannot wait for you to see this and to tour this museum.

The building is like my husband. It's open, it's expansive, it's welcoming. It's filled with light.

And the exhibits tell a story of someone who loves his fellow man, who cares deeply about the future of all of our children, who recognizes our common humanity.

And for all those reasons and many, many more, I'm so proud to introduce the 42nd president of the United States, William Jefferson Clinton.

"American Morning," CNN, 11/18/2004

O'BRIEN: The stars of the Democratic Party are celebrating today in Little Rock, Arkansas at the dedication of Bill Clinton's $165 million presidential library. Former first lady turned senator from New York, Hillary Rodham Clinton, is at the library this morning. She joins us.

Nice to see you, senator. Thanks for being with us.

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Thank you, Soledad. It's good to talk to you.

O'BRIEN: Thank you. We got lots to cover, in fact. not only the library, of course, but politics as well. But we'll start with the library this morning. I heard reports that the president himself was involved in the very details about the architecture, things like that. Is that accurate?

CLINTON: Absolutely. This was a real labor of love for Bill, and he started working with the architects about, oh, I guess, six years ago and was involved in every step of the way, giving his ideas about not only how it should be designed, but what it would look like, what the meaning of it would be. And it is just like Bill Clinton. I mean, it's open, it's expansive, it's welcoming, it's spirited, and it is a bridge to the 21st century. That is the whole sense of it.

O'BRIEN: Some people have described it as a shrine as well. Do you think that's a fair description?

CLINTON: Well, I think if you've been to any presidential library, it tells the story of that president's life. I have been to, I guess, all of them, and they are all trying to portray to Americans what that particular president believed, what he did when he was president. But it's more of a historical and really a creative way of having people look at the exhibits, look at the gifts that were given when a president was in office. And I really think that it's smart, because most Americans will never visit the White House, and this presidential library will have an actual replica of the Oval Office when Bill was president. So people, thousands of people, will be able to bring their children and able to see that, or the cabinet room, or one of the limousines that drove the president around. And, I think that's important in our government that we have as much connection with people, and that's one of the reasons why Bill wanted it to be literally a transparent building, because he believes that government and a Democracy like ours should be transparent and open to people.

O'BRIEN: There are some critics, though, who say that the museum itself, the library, minimizes the role your husband had in the impeachment process, in the Monica Lewinsky scandal. What do you make of that criticism?

CLINTON: You know, I think that the library presents a full and accurate picture of the Clinton administration. There were a lot of things that went on during those eight years, a lot of great accomplishments for our country and for the world. So everything is put into context. And people can come and judge for themselves. And in addition to that, you know, Bill will be opening up his records for his library much sooner than the law requires so that scholars and researchers, historians will be able to get in and look at all of the documents and start writing about what happened during the Clinton presidency.

O'BRIEN: Let's talk a moment about politics now. There are reports that Karl Rove has approached the Democratic Senator Ben Nelson of Nebraska to be the secretary of agriculture. There are some cynics who would say it's less of an endorsement of the senator than trying to remove another Democrat from the Senate. Where do you stand on that?

CLINTON: Well, I have no, you know, inside information about any of that. The president has been re-elected. He has a right to ask anyone to be in his cabinet. And then of course who ever's asked has a right to decide whether that's what he or she wants to do.

Ben Nelson is a terrific senator from Nebraska. We love having him in the Senate and as part of the Democratic caucus. He's really a funny, wonderful guy with a great sense of humor. And you know, I hope he stays in the Senate, but obviously, that's up to him.

O'BRIEN: Another thing we're talking about in the news today, of course, is the House Republicans changing the rules to essentially inoculate Tom Delay if he is indeed indicted. No, don't laugh before I finish my question here. What do you make of that this morning? We're hearing lots from Capitol Hill about this.

CLINTON: Well, what can I say? It's just so typical. I mean, they're running the House of Representatives like a fiefdom with Tom Delay, you know, in charge of the plantation. I think it's kind of a sad commentary. I don't think it's good for Democracy. I don't think it's good for the Republican Party. But again, I don't have a vote in the Republican caucus in the House; they'll decide what they want to do, but one would hope that they would not be so quick to change the rules when it affects their leader. They certainly wanted to apply the harshest of rules to Democratic leaders for so many years.

I think we need to call a truce to all of this back and forth, and you know, let's have rules that apply to everybody. It's like the idea that some want to change the filibuster, which has been a time-honored tradition in the Senate. You know, absolute power corrupts absolutely, and I think that we have an administration and Republican leadership that, you know, is very powerful. And power should be handled carefully in a democracy.

So, again, I don't have a vote in any of this, but I hope that, you know, more thoughtful minds prevail over what should be done going forward.

O'BRIEN: Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton joining us this morning. Nice to see you. Thanks for being with us this morning.

CLINTON: Thank you, Soledad. Come and see the library.

O'BRIEN: You know, if I get a day off, I would love to do that. Thank you.

CLINTON: Great. Thank you.

O'BRIEN: That was Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. We chatted with her a little bit earlier today.

"Today," NBC, 11/18/2004

On CLOSE UP this morning, the opening of Bill Clinton's presidential library. Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton will take part in today's dedication ceremony.

Senator Clinton, good morning.

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York): Good morning, Katie.

COURIC: I know a little less than four years ago you and President Clinton left the White House. Do you think it's too close to his administration to be starting to look at his legacy without the benefit of more time and perhaps perspective?

Sen. CLINTON: Oh, I think that's right. But what this library and the museum will do is, you know, to give a first draft of history to not only the many, many people who will come to visit, but to scholars and researchers. Bill will open up his records earlier than the law requires because, just as the library behind us is open and transparent, he wants historians as well as the general public to see the facts, draw their own conclusions. And it is just such a stunning building, Katie. I hope you get to see it sometime. I--I was just overwhelmed when I saw it for the first time totally completed yesterday.

COURIC: Meanwhile, I know it will house the largest presidential document collection, some 80 million pages. And there is an area even dedicated to what happened during your husband's impeachment. That said, some of his detractors are actually planning a counter-library in Little Rock with a satellite office in Washington, DC. What do you make of that? And is it disappointing for both you and your husband that his detractors and critics continue to pursue him?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, I have--I have really no idea why the obsession continues, but that's fine. It'll just create even more commercial activity and interest here in Little Rock, which is part of the reason Bill wanted to place the library here. But the real story of this library is about the peace and prosperity of the eight years of the Clinton administration, about a president who was always thinking about putting people first. And as you go through the exhibits and you see and are reminded of the incredible progress we made as a nation--the number of people who, you know, were lifted out of poverty, the number of people who got jobs, the work that was done to ensure children for health care--on and on. It is a reminder of what we can do when we have the kind of leadership that really does think about tomorrow and put us on a course for a better future that lifts everybody up.

COURIC: I'm just curious, do you have a favorite exhibit at the library yourself?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, I have just been overwhelmed. I--I like all of the exhibits, but I have to say there's a--on the second floor of the exhibit space there's some wonderful photographs behind the scenes of, you know, Christmases at the White House. My inaugural gown is there. Another beautiful dress my friend Vera Wang made for one of the state dinners is there. And there are all these funny pictures and gifts that people from around the world have given. As I walked through the library yesterday, I mean, there were moments when I teared up and then there were moments when I was just laughing hysterically. It--it is just an extraordinary capturing of everything about those eight years. And, like my husband, it is energetic and spirited and expansive and open and welcoming. And, as you can tell, I am so excited about this day finally coming.

COURIC: Let me ask you about the Democratic Party, if I could, Senator Clinton, because I know a lot of Democratic leaders will be there for the dedication, and certainly there will be a lot of discussion about what happened in the last presidential election. How do you think the Democrats miscalculated, if they did? And how can the party be retooled, in your estimation?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I think we have to get back to basics, Katie. I think that we didn't do as good a job as we should have in, you know, making clear that we had new ideas, that we had better ideas on everything from homeland security to health care. That we had, you know, strong values that are in keeping with what really made America great over 215 years. I think we need a conversation because I--I don't believe that we should be a divided country between red and blue and any other divisiveness. You know, people in red states and blue states love their children. They get up every morning and go to work. They--they go to church, or they pursue their, you know, recreational interests and they care about what's important in their lives. And they want to be good Americans and good citizens. And we ought to start having a conversation where we really get people to talk across those divides.

COURIC: Meanwhile, I know you've announced your desire to run for Senate in 2006, but you haven't ruled out a run for the White House in 2008. When do you think you'll be able to make a decision on that?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, I'm not thinking about that. I'm thinking about running for re-election. I love being in the Senate. I think the work that we're going to have to do is, you know, rather daunting. You know, not only what the president's put on his agenda--issues like tax reform and Social Security, which I believe we need a vigorous debate about and I intend to be right in the middle of it--but, you know, the best way to fight the war on terrorism and whether we're doing enough on homeland security. So I'm--I'm looking forward to getting back into the work of the Senate and then campaigning for re-election.

COURIC: Do you think the Republican Party would be celebrating if you were the Democratic nominee because you are such a polarizing figure, and perhaps they're hoping that--that you will get the nod?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, I'm not thinking about that. But of course we have a president who's quite polarizing and very successful, I might add. I think what's important is what you stand for, what your convictions and values are, what your plans and priorities are, and how well you connect with the American people. And I'm not thinking about anything other than being a--you know, the best Senator I can be for New York, but also thinking about what we know of the legacy of the Clinton administration. We got a lot of things right in the 1990s, and I'd like to get back to Clinton economics, for example, which I think were smarter and better for everybody in the country. Get away from the deficits that I think are going to...

COURIC: Mm-hmm.

Sen. CLINTON: ...slowly but surely strangle economic growth. All of those things. So I'm looking forward to today. We're going to have President Bush here, former President Bush, former President Carter, and about 30,000 people. And I hope that you and everybody watching this morning will make a trip. Come to see Little Rock and Arkansas. They're wonderful places. And come to see the Clinton library.

COURIC: Senator Clinton also working for the Arkansas Chamber of Commerce this morning. Before we go, how is your husband feeling--we only have a few seconds left--following his bypass surgery? I know he's lost a lot of weight. You told me at one point he was still tired. How's he doing?

Sen. CLINTON: Right. Well, one of the reasons I'm doing this this morning is because he is conserving his strength. He does get more tired than he ever used to. But he's doing fine, and I think, you know, a few more months he'll be better than ever. But today's a pretty excited and emotional day for him, and he's up for it. And I'm--I'm looking forward to the entire celebration.

COURIC: All right. Well, Senator Hillary Clinton.

Senator, as always, thanks so much. And enjoy the day.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you, Katie.

COURIC: It's coming up on 7:14. Now here's Matt.

MATT LAUER, co-host:

All right, Katie. Thanks.

"Larry King Live," CNN, 11/18/2004

LARRY KING, HOST: Tonight, Hillary Clinton. Her first live, primetime interview since the election. It's in Little Rock, Arkansas. We're here for the William Jefferson Clinton Presidential Center which opens tomorrow.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton next on LARRY KING LIVE.

After we deplaned this afternoon and came up that little road from the airport and see that center lit up tonight, what a -- and we had a little private tour. You must be flipped.

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, (D) NEW YORK: I am so proud, Larry. And my husband's worked on this now for, oh, about 6 years. And he's been involved in every aspect of the design and planning. And it exceeded my highest expectations.

KING: It's beautiful. Hands-on, right?

H. CLINTON: Very hands-on. What you know, what is so important about it is that, No. 1, it's a beautiful building, as you saw. And it's a metaphor. It is the bridge to the 21st Century, which of course was his great slogan when he was running.

And it also is open and airy and light. And it kind of conveys the sense of openness in our government. And then inside, someone said today it was the first museum of the 21st Century. It's so technologically advanced. Literally you can go, as you saw today...

KING: Push buttons and get everything.

H. CLINTON: Get everything. I mean, if you want to know what happened June 1, 1997, you punch the button. If you want to know if Larry King is in the library...

KING: I'm in, interviews, dates and schedules.

H. CLINTON: They're all there. It tells the story. The full comprehensive history of the Clinton administration. And it's both moving and exciting and informative. And I just could not be happier.

KING: You're going to have some opening here tomorrow. You've got President Bush, former President Bush, President Carter, Gerald Ford a little under the weather.

H. CLINTON: Right. Unfortunately.

KING: Two former presidents -- 3 former presidents with your husband. The current president. You're going to have ceremonies.

H. CLINTON: Right. We're going to have heads of state, former heads of state. Oh, it is just an overwhelming event.

But I think that tomorrow is especially important, because it's one of those rituals in American politics. You know, we just went through a very difficult and divisive election, but we're all going to be there together. Two Democrats, 2 Republicans, talking about the future.

KING: Almost half the Congress.

H. CLINTON: There's a huge number of senators and Congressmembers coming. And what I like is the symbolic aspect of it, because I remember when Bill was president and we went to former President Bush's library opening in Texas. There's just something very reassuring that despite our differences, no matter how partisan times can be, that we all remember that we're all part of this history. We have to do the best we can.

KING: We're going to back to it a little later.

First, how is the president?

H. CLINTON: Well, he is doing fine.

KING: We're in the same club.

H. CLINTON: I know you are. And you remember that you gain your strength steadily, but slowly. So I think he'd be the first to say he's not back up to 100 percent.

But his doctors say he's doing fine. He certainly is feeling well. But he just doesn't yet have that incredible Clinton tirelessness that I've known for 31 years.

KING: Is he revved up for this?

H. CLINTON: Oh, he's so excited. And he's just really gratified. I mean, so many people contributed. There were over 100,000 contributors to the library. There are people who are coming from all over the world to be here. And it is his effort to try to really keep the conversation going about what sort of country we want to have. That's what he believes in. That's what he loves.

KING: He saves everything, right. Because I think every letter ever written to President Clinton is here.

H. CLINTON: I think it's darn close. In part, because he became president at the very beginning of the information age -- e-mail.

KING: Cell phones boom.

H. CLINTON: Exactly. When bill was elected there were I think 50 sites on the world wide web. By the time he left there were, 50 million sites. And so the explosion in information, and the archives, which is the formal repository of all of the documents and the artifacts is just overwhelmed by everything there. So we're going to have a lot of rotating exhibits.

KING: You toured it with Chelsea today. What does his daughter think?

H. CLINTON: She loves it. She is much more attuned than I am to the technology. So she thought the way that the exhibits were presented -- well, you saw some of the almost ticker tape descriptions of what was happening, the videos everywhere.

KING: It's very 21st Century.

H. CLINTON: Very 21st Century.

KING: When everything's covered, the impeachment is covered, Lewinski is covered. I mean, they don't -- you get a full history of Clinton, warts and all.

H. CLINTON: I like to think, all of the good progress that was made in those 8 years. What he really stood for, the peace and the prosperity, putting people first. What everyone wants to say about my husband, everybody knows that he really deeply cared about the American people and he did try to do what he could to improve their chances in life.

KING: We'll get back to the library in a while.

Major story today in the New York Times. saying, in essence, Senator Clinton has decided to run for re-election in 2006 and a lot of key advisers are saying don't do that, because if you run for Senate in 2006, you can't run for the presidency in 2008, it's too close together. What will you tell the people of New York? So let's hear it from the horse's mouth.

H. CLINTON: Well, I have said I'm looking forward to and intending to run for re-election. I do provide a lot of copy, Larry, as you know. People are constantly speculating about me and my life.

KING: So, help us.

H. CLINTON: I love being the senator from New York. You know, it's the greatest place in the world. There's no place like New York.

And I have enjoyed the work there. I now think we're going to have some very difficult decisions ahead of us. I want to be part of making those decisions.

KING: So, you want to go back to the Senate?

H. CLINTON: I love being in the Senate.

KING: Would you like to be president? I mean, that's a fair question. You could say, I don't want to be. I think about it. H. CLINTON: You know, I'm not focused on that. I'm focused on what I'm doing and how well I can do it. That will take care of itself sometime.

KING: This is a good if question.

H. CLINTON: A good if.

KING: Assuming now you're going to run for the Senate, would you tell the people of New York you'll serve 6 years?

H. CLINTON: You know, I haven't gotten that far. I don't have any plans other than running for the United States Senate. And I'm looking forward to getting out there and talking about my record.

KING: When does that campaign start?

H. CLINTON: Well, in these kind of days...

KING: Next week?

H. CLINTON: Yes. I have to raise a lot of money. I'm fortunate in that I have wonderful supporters throughout New York and around the country. So they'll be helping me. But I have a lot of money to raise. I want to be in a position to withstand whatever challenge might come my way.

KING: Do you have any idea who might the opponent be?

H. CLINTON: I don't, Larry. You know, that's something -- I don't have any control over, so I don't think about it. That's up to the other side.

KING: You don't think, Giuliani, Pataki?

H. CLINTON: I don't have any inside information. That's not something that they share with me. So, I'll just wait and see who files against me.

KING: How devastated were you by the Kerry defeat?

H. CLINTON: I was very disappointed. I really believed that John was going to do it. He ran a strong campaign. He worked so hard throughout the country. I did everything I could to help him, as so many others did.

We came up short in the White House and in the Senate. And I think that means we've got to take a hard look at what we stand for as a party and how we present to the American people both the values and the priorities that Democrats are willing to fight for.

KING: When did we become a red and blue nation?

H. CLINTON: Well, I regret that we are. I don't like to see it that way. You know, we're sitting here in Little Rock, Arkansas. And I have so many friends here, so many wonderful experiences. KING: A red state.

H. CLINTON: Now it is. It didn't used to be. It's gone back and forth in the last 8 elections. Five times for the Republicans, 3 times for the Democrats.

I think so much of it depends upon the candidate and the message, the campaign that's put together. Whether you connect with the American people. And that cuts across all the lines.

There should be an effort to try to bring the country together again. I don't accept the fact that it's red versus blue. You know, in New York, we have red counties, 40 counties in New York voted for President Bush this time. You know, I work as hard as I can in every single county in the state. I try to represent everybody to the best of my ability.

And I think that's what we should do when we run for office. I don't think we should write off or ignore any part of the state. I don't think we should do that in the country.

So I'm hoping that maybe we can get back in the years to come to nationwide elections where we talk to the entire nation, where we travel through the entire country, and where we have a conversation about what matters.

You know people in red states and blue states love their children, care about their futures, worry about their jobs, wonder about their health care and definitely are concerned about the values that surround us. So I think we ought to have an open national conversation about this.

KING: Would you abandon the electoral college?

H. CLINTON: Well, you know, I think the electoral college is running afoul of our one person, one vote. I think realistically, it's unlikely ever to be abandoned. But...

KING: If you could wave a wand, would you?

H. CLINTON: You know, I'm inclined to think it may have outlived its usefulness at this point.

KING: We'll take a break and be back with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton. We're at the beautiful -- and the only way you could term it, it's a magnificent structure, the William Jefferson Clinton library in Little Rock, Arkansas on the banks of the river, right next to the -- we're broadcasting from the old train station that was the Rock Island line. It's a mighty good line. That was a song once. Big hook. Do you remember that song?

CLINTON: I do.

KING: The Rock Island Line is a mighty good line. We'll be right back, don't go away.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BILL CLINTON, FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I wanted to make a contribution to the development of this city that I love so much. I also wanted the library to be in the middle of America, where people from all walks of life and all states passing through on the interstate, landing on the highway, coming here to conventions, doing whatever, could see what it is like to be president.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

KING: He could have chosen other places, right? there were offers?

CLINTON: A lot of offers. But there wasn't any real choice in his mind, other than Arkansas. You know, this is a place that nurtured him and helped to raise him. It's a place that let him be their governor for all those years. And he couldn't have become president without the people of Arkansas standing behind him. I was thrilled when he decided to come here. And it's a beautiful location, as you've seen, right along the banks of the Arkansas River. And what I am especially pleased about is that I heard today, you know, that somewhere between $800 million to $900 million in economic development has already resulted because of Bill's decision to put the library here. And it's just -- I was at a big event today with all the former first ladies of the state of Arkansas who are still living. And you know, there are such wonderful memories. This is where we were married, this is where our daughter was born.

KING: You drove a car here.

CLINTON: I did. I used to drive a car here, I shopped here, I was sort a normal person, hard to believe.

KING: You have never voted in the Senate for a Supreme Court nominee.

CLINTON: That's right.

KING: We would imagine the next four years, you may have a few.

CLINTON: It may be.

KING: What will be your parameter? Must they be pro-choice? Is there a litmus, as you would vote?

CLINTON: I am going to take them as they come, each individual person. That's what I've tried to do with all of President Bush's nominees. I've voted on, my goodness, you know, more than 200. And we've confirmed more than 200. We have turned back a relative handful, I think maybe 10 of the nominees. So I think that the percentage is very much in favor of the process. There are those who want everything, but that's not the way the system should work. I mean, this is a system of compromise, where people have to be assured that we're within the bounds of whatever the mainstream is. And so I have voted in the last four years for judges who are certainly not in agreement with me on a lot of major issues but who I thought would be fair and judicious, would not allow whatever their personal opinions were to interfere with the kind of decision-making that will inspire confidence in the judiciary.

KING: You'll vote that same way for...

CLINTON: I will certainly vote that same way. And I will look at each individual nominee and weigh that person on the merits and then make a decision.

KING: Would you participate in a filibuster if that occurred?

CLINTON: I have. I have already. Because I think it's the duty of a senator -- you know, what happened in my husband's eight years was that the Republican Majority often wouldn't even let a well-qualified nominee come to the floor of the Senate. And so they would keep them bottled up in committee, they would never give them a hearing, they would never give them a vote in the committee, which I thought was very unfortunate. But unfortunately for us, we have very few tools at our disposal to make sure that everything is fully debated and the views are heard. And oftentimes, a filibuster is there for a purpose, which is to have the minority exercise its right to have a very strong view about what advise and consent means under our constitution.

KING: What do you make of what's going on with cabinet replacements?

Let's start with Rice for Powell.

CLINTON: Well, it's the president's prerogative. He has won his second term and, he gets to choose the people he wants. I think that Secretary Powell was a very significant influence within the administration during the first term. And although he didn't win very many arguments, at least counterpoints were heard in the highest level of debate. I don't know that that will happen now. I have a great deal of respect for Dr. Rice. She's an incredibly intelligent, devoted public servant. But it's very clear that she's not going to be disagreeing with the president or the vice president or the secretary of defense.

And I think debate and even dissent is very healthy in an administration. Otherwise, you do develop group think. We got into problems with that around the weapons of mass destruction and the Iraq war, where group think took over. And I don't think that's the way that you arrive at the best decisions.

KING: What do you think about General Ashcroft leaving?

CLINTON: Well, I think that that was probably an important step. Because he certainly did not have the confidence of a lot of people in the country on important issues that concerned civil liberties, individual freedoms. And I'll look forward to hearing more about what Mr. Gonzalez will bring to that job.

KING: What committees do you sit on?

CLINTON: On the Environment and Public Works Committee, on one that's called Health, Education, Labor and Pensions, and the Armed Services Committee. So I have my hands full with three very significant assignments.

KING: Armed Services being the most?

CLINTON: Well, it has taken up most of my time, because the work has been overwhelming. We have not only had the usual hearings you have to have with respect to what's going on in the Defense Department, but because of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, and certainly the prison scandal at Abu Ghraib, we've had a lot of extra hearings and the work has been intense.

KING: What do you make of that shooting in Iraq?

CLINTON: I don't want to jump to any conclusions. I think it's appropriate there is an investigation, as there well should be. You know, it's easy to either jump to someone's defense or to the side of prosecution. But I like to see what the facts are and I'm going to wait until the report's finished.

KING: And your committee will be involved in testimony? Will it?

CLINTON: We'll see. I think that there's an ongoing investigation. We certainly will hear the results of that investigation. But it would probably not be appropriate to have any hearings about it until we get the facts.

KING: We'll be right back with Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York, on the occasion of her husband's library opening officially tomorrow.

We took a tour of it earlier. There you see it. By the way it's lit so that ultraviolet rays during the day of the sun do not get through. That's why it is very brightly lit. Architects have praised it widely, except one critic in the "London Economist" who said it looked like a recreational vehicle. Well, even that ain't bad. We'll be right back. Don't go away.

KING: Here's this library. Official opening is tomorrow. William Jefferson Clinton. We're looking forward to his return to this program. He was on the night he went into the hospital.

H. CLINTON: That's right, I remember. I was sitting there when he called you. And I so appreciate the work that you do through your foundation. And one of the reasons why Bill's not here and I am is because he still just doesn't have his full strength back and he wants to sort of conserve his strength for tomorrow, which is such a big day. But you and I were talking before we went on the air about how you just really have to work through this. Then eventually you get back to your full energy. KING: You feel better every day if things go right.

H. CLINTON: You do, every day you feel better. But I think he wants to do some work on behalf of heart disease too.

KING: I want to get back to the library but one other thing, it was printed -- that could be wrong -- that you, using your heavy clout, convinced Chuck Schumer to not run for governor, getting him better posts in committees so that Eliot Spitzer could run for governor. True? You don't even have to give me a long answer.

H. CLINTON: No. Chuck made up his own mind. I'm delighted he's going to stay in the Senate. He's doing a great job. He has for years.

KING: You didn't work behind the scenes at keeping him...

H. CLINTON: Well, I tried to persuade him that it would be great for the Senate. But he made his own decision.

KING: You're going to support Eliot Spitzer?

H. CLINTON: Well, I don't support anybody in a primary. But if there's no primary, I will be an enthusiastic supporter.

KING: You have a place in this library. What do you think of the Hillary part?

H. CLINTON: Well, I'm thrilled. It's very gratifying to have the work I did on behalf of health care and women and children and education and adoption, all the things that I cared about, highlighted in the library. And it is also exciting to see the second floor of exhibition space, about some of the behind the scenes of the White House. The little stories about our time at Christmas. Or the place settings of the china that I helped to design for the millennium, my inaugural gown from 1997. The kind of personal touches that people love to see.

And the oval office in this library is the exact replica. It's the first time they've ever had it exact size. So people who have never been to Washington, would never get to go to the Oval Office, will get a chance to see it.

KING: How about students?

H. CLINTON: I can't wait for students to be in this library. Because there's something for every age. There's a wonderful series of just the exhibits that are funny, the kind of gifts, the swords that come from different heads of state around the world to people who can really delve into it for research papers.

So every age of student is going to learn something in this library.

KING: What didn't you like about it?

H. CLINTON: You know, having been through it today, there is absolutely nothing I've found that I don't like.

KING: Really? Did you sign off on this by the way?

H. CLINTON: I certainly offered my suggestions. But this was such a labor of love for Bill. He labored over it. He offered so many ideas to the architects and to the designers. And he knew every nook and cranny about what was going to be in the library. I didn't have that level of involvement.

So when I saw it today, obviously I had an idea of what I was going to see. But it was so much more. It was -- it had a vitality to it, an energy that I just found infectious. I was walking through it, and I had tears in my eyes in some places, and I was bursting out laughing in other places. It just came alive for me again.

KING: What does a library do for, if anything, for a legacy?

H. CLINTON: I think that for Bill, it gives him a chance to do the official part of it, which is to turn his papers and artifacts over to the country, to take possession of them through the National Archives.

KING: And the country takes possession tomorrow. It belongs to the United States tomorrow.

H. CLINTON: Absolutely. Now he had to raise the money privately to build the museum part of it. And it really stands for what he cares about in governing and in politics. And it talks about the issues that he thought were important to the country and the way he kept score. The way he kept score is, were more people working when he left than when he started? Were we in better financial shape when he left than when we started? Did more people find their way out of poverty than when he started? All the things that really matter to improving the lives. That's what he thinks politics is about.

But this is only part of his legacy. Because he's so young. And this is also not only the place where the library and the museum are situated, but as you say, right here we're in the Clinton school of public policy. We're going to be giving degrees to people who want to become better public servants. He's going to be running his foundation out of the library here and out of his office in Harlem in New York. He's going to continue the work on HIV/AIDS prevention and treatment around the world, and racial and religious reconciliation, and economic empowerment.

So I don't think that this captures his entire legacy. It takes time, both for history to look back, but also he's got a lot of work he still wants to do. He's going to remain very active here at home and around the world.

KING: What does he want to do more than that, more than a foundation and an office in Harlem? Does he have larger plans?

H. CLINTON: I think, Larry, he really wants to make a difference in the world. He wants to continue the work he did in Northern Ireland, in the Balkans, in the Middle East. He's already met with some former and present government officials, heads of state and others just in the last two days here in Little Rock. Talking about what they can do together. Because people come to him and they ask him for advice. They ask him for his ideas about solving problems. He wants to save lives with diseases like HIV/AIDS. He really cares passionately about the work of the foundation.

KING: When President Bush was on this show a couple of months ago, we talked about how gracious he was when the official portrait was unveiled in the White House. And he said that he has terrific admiration for president Clinton, his personality and his verve. Do you think that he might be called upon to key areas maybe help this administration at times? And would he take it?

During the campaign, President Bush said that he would like to think of ways to call on Bill. And I know Bill would be more than willing to help. Both because he thinks that when your president asks you to help, you say yes. And secondly, because he'd like to provide whatever assistance because he knows more than the rest of us what that job is like. Really, the pressures on whoever the president is are so enormous. They are almost unimaginable for most Americans. I've seen it up close. You've seen it closer than most people. You know what a toll this job takes on any person. So if he were asked, I know he would be more than willing to help.

KING: We'll take a break, come back with our remaining moments with Senator Clinton. And then Mack McLarty, the former White House chief of staff, only went to kindergarten with Bill Clinton, will be with us. Ann Richards, the former governor of Texas. And historian Michael Beschloss will look at the life and times of the former president. Right back with more moments with Senator Clinton after this.

KING: We're back on LARRY KING LIVE. We're in Little Rock. Another shot of the President Clinton Library which opens officially tomorrow. They're forecasting rain by the way.

H. CLINTON: Oh, no, can't rain.

KING: Well, make a call as I said. Do you think the impeachment thing was handled tastefully and well?

H. CLINTON: I do. I do. I've told everyone that the history was going to be full and accurate. Nothing's left out. Obviously, not everything can be shown. But there's going to be access to all of the documents. In fact, Bill is going to be making his documents accessible even earlier than legally required.

KING: He is?

H. CLINTON: He is. Because he really thinks it's important. That's one of the things the library really stands for. It physically stands for openness with all the glass and the light. But he wants it to be a place where people come and really study. And everything's going to be available. KING: A couple of other things. Senator Harry Reid. What do you think about him?

H. CLINTON: Wonderful guy. I adore him.

KING: He's your new head.

H. CLINTON: He is. And I'm an enthusiastic supporter. Obviously I'm so sad for Tom Daschle, who's a wonderful, wonderful man and a great public servant. I only wish the best for him and his family. Harry Reid will be a tough competitor. He's fair. He listens. He'll get along wherever possible with the White House and the Republicans on the other side of the aisle. But he'll stand his ground. He's a wonderful human being.

KING: The death of Arafat. Make you hopeful?

H. CLINTON: I have to be hopeful. I cannot afford not to be hopeful. We have to hope that the Palestinian people will make a transition to new leadership and will look for a way to adopt a two- state solution so that the people of Palestine, particularly the children, have a brighter future. The Palestinian people are such an intelligent, creative, entrepreneurial people when they...

KING: Poets of the Middle East.

H. CLINTON: And when they leave the region and come to the United States or Europe, they're successful in every walk of life. They should be able to do that in the area where they are now living, without having to leave. But that's going to require new leadership. It's going to require the United States becoming engaged and making clear that we're looking for some resolution that guarantees security for Israel and peace for the people.

KING: Do you know why Arafat turned that deal down that your husband brokered with him and Barak?

H. CLINTON: I do not, Larry. I think that when the time came to be a statesman, he couldn't do it. He was stuck in a time warp that had passed him by. But he wanted to hang on to what was familiar. He did a great disservice to his people, in my opinion.

KING: Are you hopeful about the elections in Iraq?

H. CLINTON: I am. We have a long way to go before we can hold secure elections. And we need to hold elections simultaneously in all parts of the country. It would be very troubling if we left certain parts of the country out. So therefore, we have to provide sufficient security so that the Sunni population is able to vote along with the Shia and the Kurds. It is certainly conceivable that with the capture of Falluja and driving out the insurgents there we are closer to making that happen. But we still have a lot of work to do.

KING: What are you going to do tomorrow?

H. CLINTON: I am so excited. I'm going to enjoy every minute of the dedication. And I have the great pleasure of introducing my husband. And we will have an incredible ceremony with the former presidents, along with President Bush speaking.

KING: Will President Bush speak?

H. CLINTON: Absolutely. He will speak. And I remember very fondly when Bill and I went to the dedication of former President Bush's library. It was a wonderful occasion. There's a camaraderie, a collegiality among former presidents and present presidents and first ladies that I'm really looking forward to tomorrow. I'm looking forward to welcoming the Bushes to the library. There will be a lot of presidential family children. I've already seen Susan Eisenhower and Linda and Lucy Johnson, Caroline Kennedy will be there. I think one or both of the Nixon daughters will be here. There's a real sense of identity with one another. We've been through an experience as members of a presidential family that is unlike any in the world. And it's a great privilege. It's often hard. But the honor is just overwhelming.

KING: And of course you like the collegiality of the Senate.

H. CLINTON: I do. I like...

KING: It's a club, isn't it?

H. CLINTON: It is. And even though we have people with very strong opinions, and I would include myself in that category, we find ways to work together.

KING: Always good seeing you, Senator. Send our best to Bill. We look forward to seeing him soon.

H. CLINTON: Thank you, Larry. Thanks for coming.

U.S. SENATOR GORDON SMITH (R-OR) HOLDS HEARING ON INTER-NET DRUGS IMPORTATION, 1/26/2005

CLINTON: Well, thank you so much, Chairman Smith, but I would just ask unanimous consent to submit my opening statement.

SMITH: Without objection.

CLINTON: I have to express my delight on joining this committee and serving with you and Senator Kohl. And I look forward to the work of this committee.

I must confess that with the low height of the chair and the lights going off, I thought maybe I was in a test about how quickly I'm aging...

(LAUGHTER)

... you know, whether I can get up out of a low chair and see what's going on, which is something that, you know, I guess if that goes with committee membership, I'll do my best.

(LAUGHTER)

(UNKNOWN): It does.

CLINTON: It does?

(LAUGHTER)

And I guess I would also ask unanimous consent that I, too, have a chair pillow next time too, Senator Craig. I've changed chairs, so I'm fine.

SMITH: We need to add some pillows next time.

CLINTON: I want to thank both Senators Smith and Kohl for convening this hearing, because it is such an important topic. And the issues it raises really do go to the heart of the expectation, as Senator Craig eloquently stated, that Americans will be able to trust their prescription drugs.

On the other hand, it also goes to the point that Senator Nelson was making, which I think Secretary Thompson, in a sense, conceded last year when he said that legislation for drug reimportation was inevitable. And it will happen either under our control or out of our control, after a lot of damage has been done because of the breakdown in the system, because of Internet purchases and the like.

So I really commend you for holding this hearing, because we need to shed a lot more light on this matter and try to come to a consensus about how we intend to proceed.

I appreciate the surgeon general being here and also for your leadership on the HHS Task Force. As I read the task force report, I think that it clearly states the issue.

And the conclusion of the task force members is that the task force believes that access to drugs that are safe and effective, as well as affordable, is a critical policy goal and that all approaches to achieving this challenging goal should be explored thoroughly. And I very much agree with that.

Now, I have worked, with several of my colleagues, in introducing a framework for implementing safe importation of prescription drugs. Senators Dorgan and Snowe have taken the lead on this.

Does the task force or does HHS have a position on the Dorgan- Snowe reimportation bill?

CARMONA: Senator, from the standpoint of our task force, we took no position on any bills. Our goal was to answer the questions and provide you the best information for you to make your decisions.

But I think the statement that you read truly reflects the task force in a unanimous way, that, you know, we really understand the dynamics here and the complexity of this issue. But every and all opportunities need to be explored.

CLINTON: Well, General, I would appreciate your reviewing the Dorgan-Snowe legislation. Because what we attempted to do -- and, really, Senators Dorgan and Snowe deserve the credit for this -- was to deal with the concerns outlined in Secretary Shalala's letter that you referenced earlier.

Because when the Congress did pass legislation asking that reimportation take place, President Clinton tasked Secretary Shalala with responding to that.

CARMONA: OK.

CLINTON: And her December 26, 2000, letter reflects some of the difficulties that tied up the negotiations. There were a lot of concerns on the part of different members of Congress, with different stakeholders at the table.

And what the Dorgan-Snowe legislation tries to do is to deal with the labeling issue by requiring that commercial shipments of drugs to importers be labeled with FDA-approved labeling; dealing with the discrimination issue by making discrimination against foreign distributors and pharmacies illegal, and imposing trouble damages; dealing with the timing issue without having a sunset.

Because one of Secretary Shalala's biggest problems with the legislation that was being proposed back in 2000 is that it was sunsetted. So that doesn't provide certainty to anyone. I mean, part of our job legally, legislatively, regulatorily is to look at legislation, figure out how it's working and make improvements or solve problems if necessary. But if you put a sunset on it from the very beginning, that doesn't provide much of an incentive.

And finally, providing sufficient funding, an issue that is a critical one, as to how we would police such a system. And in the Dorgan-Snowe legislation, there is a requirement that each importer and exporter pay a one-time registration fee of $10,000 and semiannual inspection fees, capped at 1 percent of the total price of drugs, so that we can use those dollars to enhance the inspection process, hire the necessary people.

We're going to spend the money one of two ways: We're going to spend the money going after counterfeiters, trying to deal with Internet problems, as Senator Wyden pointed out, or we're going to spend the money trying to get a system in place that we then can regulate.

So I would appreciate very much, General, that you provide a response with respect to the Dorgan-Snowe bill. And I look forward to the new secretary of Health and Human Services also working on this issue, because the inevitability of it is clear to all of us, the problems are clear to all of us. I think that there are enough people of good faith and intelligence to figure on how to deal with this.

So I thank you for taking on this task force, but we need now to move beyond the inevitability and the belief of the task force members to actually find some solutions.

CARMONA: Thank you, Ma'am.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON DEATH BENEFITS FOR SURVIVORS OF MILITARY PERSONNEL, 2/1/2005

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

And I want to thank the chairman for holding this hearing. I think it's a subject that is, not only very important, but needs to be addressed. And I'm delighted we are doing so.

Last week, I joined with Senator Chuck Hagel in introducing legislation to raise the survivor benefit from $12,000 to $100,000. And I'm delighted the administration will be making such recommendations.

The legislation we introduced would have been retroactive to November 2001. And I think that it is very important that it be so.

I've also joined the efforts led by Senators Sessions and Lieberman.

These are reforms that, I think, send the right signal about the sustainability of service and the respect and regard we have for those who do serve.

Several other issues have been raised in this hearing. And I appreciate very much Chairman Warner's concern that we address all of them. Because I think that this gives us an opportunity to do so.

General Cody, I appreciate your comments about following up on the soldiers who have been injured.

I recently had occasion to write to the secretary of the Army with respect to a case that came to my attention in New York, of specialist Loria (ph), who is an amputee, who was at Walter Reed and was presented with a significant bill and was going to have his pay docked.

And in our efforts to look into this, we discovered that there were at least, I think, 19 other soldiers in a similar situation.

And I understand a task force was crated at Fort Hood.

I have not yet received an answer to my letter to the secretary. And I would very much appreciate receiving that, to look at this issue of payment and debt arising out of service and service-connected disabilities and how we best treat those.

CLINTON: Another issue that I think is significant, which has been alluded to today, is this question about military insurance. There was a series of articles in the New York Times last year detailing how many servicemembers were being taken advantage of by unscrupulous insurance agents, who were selling soldiers insurance that offered high costs but little return.

And, Mr. Chairman, I'd ask unanimous consent to place those articles in the record.

SESSIONS: Without objection, they will be made a part of the record.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Often these agents were able to get on bases with the tacit approval of base commanders. And often the insurance companies employed retired military officers who conveyed a real sense of authority.

And the service members were convinced to sign up for policies that required large payments to be taken out of their paychecks.

Last Congress, Senator Enzi and I introduced legislation to ban periodic payment plans, which were the most egregious of these policies and to require better record-keeping and a registry of unscrupulous agents.

Our companion legislation did pass the Congress before adjournment. And we planned to reintroduce that legislation this Congress. And I would commend that both to the committee and also to our witnesses, because I think it's an important piece of the puzzle. Because if the insurance is going to be available, then we owe it to the service members and their families that it be insurance of the highest integrity.

Another piece of this is the financial education issue. And I think that this is a concern, because although there are programs which you have detailed about educating some of our servicemembers about insurance policies, about car insurance and the like, it is important that we make sure we have uniform education across all services and all bases.

Because from our checking on this, it's quite uneven. Some commanders take it more seriously than others. Some feel that well, you know, you're old enough to be in the military, look out for yourself. But when you're 17 or 18 or 19, there is still a lot to learn.

And I think that part of our obligation, not only to our servicemembers, but to their families, is to make sure that, as they are becoming acclimated, getting used to being in the service, getting, maybe for the first time, used to being away from home, that they are not taken advantage of at the very moment they have signed up to serve our country.

I'm also concerned about the payday lending abuses that are going on around our bases.

CLINTON: Another issue that I'd like to have included in this overall look that we are taking -- and, Chairman Warner, I'd be very interested in working with Senator Collins in looking at this broader range of insurance abuses, payday lending abuses, just so we have a handle on what's going on and what we might do to try to prevent that.

WARNER: Senator, that will be done. You two are a great team. I'm very conscious of that. It's just a continuation of that you've been doing since the first day you joined the committee.

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

And finally, we have in the audience, representatives of the Gold Star Wives of America. I have been privileged to develop a very close working relationship with both the Gold Star Wives and the Gold Star Mothers.

And with respect to some of these issues that we're asking that you look into, and particularly, Secretary Chu, with respect to the charge that the chairman gave to you, I think it would be useful to include the observations and experiences of the Gold Star Wives and Mothers.

Some of the concerns about the casualty assistance officers that have been raised with me by the Gold Star Wives and Mothers really need to be brought to your attention. Because I think this is a wonderful opportunity to improve what we're already doing and to remedy any of the problems that are seen firsthand by those who are really on the front lines of survivors, because they are the ones who receive that knock on the door.

And, Mr. Chairman, I'd ask unanimous consent to submit the statement of Gold Star Wives of America also for the record.

SESSIONS: Without objection, it will be made a part of the record.

CLINTON: Thank you.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON IRAQ/AFGHANISTAN MILITARY ACTIVITIES, 2/3/2005

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I apologize for not being able to be here in person for the testimony of the witnesses, and I thank them for appearing before the committee.

I, too, want to express my profound admiration for the Iraqi people and their desire to have their voices heard through the ballot box. I think no one could see the pictures coming out of Sunday's election without being very moved by the notion of ordinary Iraqis braving threats, risking lives, even losing their lives, in order to vote.

And there is no doubt it could not have happened without our men and women in uniform being there to guarantee that vote going forward.

CLINTON: And they deserve our equal support, respect and gratitude.

And I don't think that there's any argument about the extraordinary display of freedom and the move toward democracy being in the short-, medium- and long-term interests of humanity and the United States. But, as is clear from the questioning, there are lots of concerns about the direction that we have headed and some of the decisions that have been made.

And there has been relatively little oversight. This committee, I think, is notable in the Congress for performing more oversight than anyone else and in a bipartisan way, thanks to our chairman and our ranking member.

But I think vigorous oversight and hard questions are, you know, par of democracy. So I hope that we can keep focused on what are the real issues that we need to address going forward.

To that end, I just have a couple of questions and then I'd like to ask unanimous consent to submit others for the record.

SESSIONS: Yes.

CLINTON: Mr. Secretary, we are going to be receiving a supplemental and many of us have argued, as you know, that we need a larger Army. And, indeed, the Army is currently using temporary measures paid for through supplementals to pay for a larger force in order to meet our needs in Iraq.

We obviously have a strain on our active-duty as well as our reserve components. That's an issue that is not going away. Every day we wait to deal with it means it's going to take longer and be more expensive if the decision is made to permanently expand the size of the standing Army.

Is the Defense Department considering making the larger Army a permanent part of the defense budget? And will DOD be looking at the size of the overall force during its quadrennial defense review this year?

WOLFOWITZ: I think the answer to both questions is yes.

In fact, in the five-year defense plan that will come with the '06 budget, you will see that we will bring the cost of this larger Army into what we call the top line in our regular budget starting in fiscal year '07 and that we've had to make some very considerable adjustments in the rest of the defense program in order to pay for that.

We need to fund it through supplementals in this fiscal year, next fiscal year, because that's not the kind of change you can -- it's like trying to turn a tanker on an dime. But we're not trying to hide the cost, either.

One of the reasons we're very pleased that we've put out the FY '05 supplemental number along with the '06 budget request is so the Congress can see that those costs will be going forward.

WOLFOWITZ: But, yes, we think the only prudent thing at this point is to plan for that as a permanent change. Permanent changes, of course, mean permanent bills, and that's how we have to adjust the defense program.

And definitely, I think, in the quarterly annual defense review the question of whether this increase is the right one is one of the questions that we'll be addressing.

General Myers, do you want to add to that at all?

MYERS: I would only say it's -- and I think Senator Clinton knows this well -- it's more than just the people. There's equipment needs as well. And that's why, as you'll see in the budget submission, that the Army needs additional resources to do what they need to do in the future. And that's all wrapped in there.

CLINTON: Well, I think it is a very difficult decision. I grant that. But it's also a very important one for this Congress and the American public to grasp.

The budget implications, given the extraordinary deficit situation we're facing, are ones that have, in my view, very serious consequences for our long-term ability to sustain any kind of aggressive defense posture. So we need to start this conversation now and not do it in a piecemeal way.

Let me ask you, too, Mr. Secretary, can you clarify once and for all, is there any consideration being given to extending reserve component deployments?

WOLFOWITZ: I think you're referring to this issue of whether or not -- I mean, this question of I think a narrow interpretation of the law, this is the question of the two years.

CLINTON: Right.

WOLFOWITZ: And I think our very strong view is there's enough burden on reservists as it is, with the prospect of 24 cumulative months, and nobody should start saying, "Well, it's consecutive in the law." I think our policy is very clear.

CLINTON: So that is -- I can take that as a clear policy statement?

WOLFOWITZ: Yes.

CLINTON: All right.

WOLFOWITZ: And if I could add, too, on your point about the Army, it is important, as I think both you and General Myers noted. It's not just more people, but a major reorganization of how those people operate.

And we have a, I guess, typically opaque bureaucratic term called modularity. And what it really means is restructuring the Army so it's deployable in more small units.

And one of the things that does is it spreads the burden of these difficult deployments over a much larger portion of the force and makes it, I think, considerably less stressful on everyone.

MYERS: And the discussion includes the reserve component as well. I mean, it's going to be -- it's one total piece.

CLINTON: Well, I appreciate that and my time is up, but, you know, and I think -- you know, perhaps this is something for the chairman and the ranking member to consider -- but running parallel with these decisions, moving from supplemental to top-line budgeting, looking at the quadrennial review, it may be time to consider, perhaps, the Congress taking a look in a, sort of, Goldwater-Nichols, but it would be perhaps Warner-Levin, approach toward acquisition and purchasing rules in the Pentagon.

I think that, you know, we have so many tough decisions ahead of us. And I, for one, am not convinced that we've really done all we need to do legally to set forth a road map and, working with the Defense Department, to have a new approach, some new thinking, some 21st-century, on-time inventory kinds of thinking that we've done sort of from the back end, but in a more forward-looking way.

And that -- because we're going to face a lot of very tough decisions on this budget with respect to some of the reports we hear about decisions that have been made with respect to certain weapon systems. Taken out of context, they'll be great fodder for political battles; put into a broader context of what we're trying achieve that might or might not be the case.

But I think we need a new look at that.

"Wolf Blitzer Reports," CNN, 2/9/2005

BLITZER: She's a former first lady, northeast senator and Democrat. He's an Air Force veteran, southern senator and Republican. He also helped lead the fight in the U.S. House of Representatives to impeach her husband. But this political odd couple is now coming together to fight for benefits for the National Guard and Reserves. I spoke about that and much more with Senators Hillary Clinton and Lindsey Graham earlier today.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Senator Clinton, Senator Graham, thanks very much for joining us here in the Russell Rotunda. Let's talk a little bit about the second class citizenship that you feel is now in effect for U.S. military personnel who are National Guard and Reserve troops.

SEN. HILLARY CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, Wolf, about two years ago, Lindsey and I teamed up to try to do something about the conditions confronting a lot of our Guard and reserve members. We were concerned because so many of them didn't have health insurance so that when they showed up after being activated, they were not ready to be deployed because of health problems.

That the extra tempo requirements of service for our Guard and Reserve was putting a lot of strain and stress on them and their families. And so they were actually doing much more active duty work but the retirement age hadn't been adjusted.

So we've been making progress on that. And we're going to continue to push -- to try to make it a fairer situation for Guard and reserve members.

BLITZER: So Senator Graham, what specifically do you want, because a lot people hear the words "health care," "Hillary," "Senator Graham," and they're saying, what's going on over here?

(LAUGHTER)

SEN. LINDSEY GRAHAM (R), SOUTH CAROLINA: Well, I think Senator Clinton and myself want to make sure those who are fighting for this country are taken care of in a very reasonable, efficient manner. If you're a member of the Guard or the reserve, most Americans don't know this, you have absolutely no access to military health care.

A temporary employee working in our office has access to federal health care. Every part time employee of the federal government has access to federal health care except Guard and reserve members. Twenty percent of the Guard and reserve has no health care in the private sector. So what happens when you activate these people, a lot of them are unable to be deployed because they're not medically fit.

So we're saying allow Guard and reserve members to sign up for military health care. Let them pay a premium when they're in reserve and Guard status, like a retiree, so when they're called to active duty, they'll be ready to go to the fight.

And number two, to help these families, these families have suffered a lot for our country. And to provide them year-round health care I think would be the least we could do.

BLITZER: You have a bipartisan group of cosponsors, a wide spectrum. But does the Pentagon -- does the Bush administration support this, let's ask Senator Graham.

GRAHAM: They have actually come around, but they have followed us. They are worried about personnel cost, and we all should be worried about personnel cost. But let me tell you this. You can't do this war on the cheap.

If you're a Guard or reserve member working in the private sector and you're called up for a year or two years, your income goes down more times than not. You have two health care systems. Your family would be in one health care system. You're called to active duty, they're bounced to another. Let's stop this bouncing around, give them access to full time health care. It would help recruiting and retention. And I hope the Bush administration will come on board for full time access to military health care for the Guard and reserve.

BLITZER: Like Senator Graham, you're a member of the Armed Services Committee. What else do you think needs to be done to make sure the National Guard troops, the reserve troops, 40 percent of the U.S. troops in Iraq right now are from the National Guard and the reserve, what else do you believe needs to be done to make sure they are not second class citizens in the U.S. military?

CLINTON: Well, there is a lot. And one of the other aspects of the legislation we originally introduced was to lower the retirement age so that there was more credit gained toward retirement by Guard and reserve members.

We also have to make sure they have the same top flight equipment and training, especially because now they are on the front lines.

BLITZER: You don't think they do?

CLINTON: Well, originally they did not. In many instances, I had a lot of complaints, not only from New York but from elsewhere in the country, where some of the Guard and reserve units that were being called up had not been given the kind of equipment and training that active duty military forces...

BLITZER: Were they rummaging through the junkyards in Kuwait, looking for armor?

CLINTON: I don't have any personal knowledge of that. We all remember the very pointed question that Secretary Rumsfeld was asked. You know, we've made progress on these fronts. But I think it's clear, we have some big questions in front of us as to what we're going to do with the size of our military, particularly the Army, how we're going to utilize Guard and reserve units.

We made a decision at the end of the Cold War to kind of move certain functions into Guard and reserve. And they were thought to be kind of non-combat, supportive functions, things like civil affairs and military police and the like. And we have found out that those people are essential in the kinds of wars that we fight today.

BLITZER: Are you satisfied with the role that has been carved out for the Guard and the reserve as part of a fighting force for the U.S. military?

GRAHAM: It's being over-utilized and underserved. The Guard and reserve is an indispensable part of the war on terror, 40 percent of the people, as Senator Clinton said. By the end of the year, there will be Guard and reservists in Afghanistan and Iraq. Every member serving in Bosnia -- and we're still in Bosnia, for a reason, is a member of the Guard.

So we're going to break the back of our Guard and reserve forces. We have some people in specialties like she has described that are in Iraq on their second tour. Some are going to go back for the third time. It makes it very hard to maintain a civilian job.

A lot of times when you're called to active duty, you have a pay cut. We really don't address that issue. You can't retire until you're 60 as a member of the Guard or reserve. What we're saying is if you'll serve the 30, retire at 55, for every two years you serve past 20, you can retire a year earlier, to keep the best and the brightest in the system.

I'm still a member of the reserves. And I can tell you anecdotally I hear more complaints than I've ever heard. These are the most patriotic people in the world. Their health care network is not working so that they'll be ready to go to the fight. If you want to recruit and retain these people, you need to sweeten the pot. And that's where Republicans and Democrats should find some common ground.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: We'll have more of the interview with Senators Clinton and Graham. That's coming up just ahead including talk of a White House run in 2008. Does the senator from New York State have presidential ambitions? I'll ask her.

Plus, an infant without an identity in the aftermath of the tsunami. DNA tests taken to find the true parents of Baby 81.

And later, controversy surrounding a former White House reporter and the questions he recently asked President Bush.

ANNOUNCER: From our studios in Washington again, Wolf Blitzer.

BLITZER: Welcome back. Who will be the Democratic front runner in 2008? A new CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll has just been released and Senator Hillary Clinton weighs in on the results. That's coming up.

First, though, a quick check of other stories "Now in the News."

You're looking at a live picture in Florida. A massive manhunt under way for a suspected cop killer is over. A police dispatcher says 29-year-old Jason Wheeler is in police custody. Our affiliate WFTV tell us the police you're seeing in this picture down below have him in custody. Officials say he shot three Lake County sheriff deputies earlier this morning when he responded to what was described as a domestic violence call. One of the deputies died from his injuries.

The Food and Drug administration is backing off its tough warning that antidepressants can cause suicidal actions among children. The FDA now says short-term studies indicate antidepressants such as Zoloft, Paxil and Prozac increase the risk of suicidal thinking and behavior in children with depression and other psychiatric disorders.

Media organizations are asking an appeals court to end some of the secrecy surrounding the Michael Jackson child molestation case. Some key aspects remain hidden by gag orders, including the grand jury indictment describing Jackson's alleged crimes.

Let's get back to our interview now with Democratic Senator and Republican Senator Lindsey Graham. This political odd couple is working together on benefits for the National Guard and Reserves. We also talked to them about Iran, Iraq and when U.S. troops might be coming home.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Let's talk about the situation in Iraq for a moment. You've been there.

And I assume you've been there as well, Senator Graham?

GRAHAM: Yes, I have, twice.

BLITZER: Are you encouraged by the aftermath of the elections?

CLINTON: Well, I was very encouraged by the elections. I put out a statement the Friday before the elections because I thought it was important that all Americans be united behind this experiment in democracy and that we wish the Iraqi people well.

The elections did go off, I think, surprisingly well. But there are still so many problems. I mean, the election is the beginning. It's not the end of anything. And...

BLITZER: Are you concerned that this election could result in an Islamist theocracy emerging democratically in Iraq?

CLINTON: Of course I am.

I'm concerned about it both for the people of Iraq, particularly the women of Iraq. And I'm concerned about the role that Iran might play in such a government. And I'm concerned about the ongoing relationship then that a new government in Iraq would have, not just with the United States, but with the rest of the world. So, I have a lot of concerns.

And I think it comes down to the quality of the leadership, the Shiite leadership in Iraq that will emerge from this election. Will they be open-minded and statesmanlike to reach out to the Sunnis? Will they continue to give the Kurds the kind of autonomy that the Kurds deserve to have? Will they recognize that civil authority is separate from religious authority? These are the big questions. And I think all of us are sort of holding our breath hoping that this works out well.

BLITZER: Some of your fellow Republicans, including Senator McCain, a man that you supported, you like a lot, have expressed a lack of confidence in Secretary of Defense Rumsfeld.

GRAHAM: Well, rather than being -- have personal differences, here's what I think is a fair criticism.

The elections were a sea change in the Mideast. It was a turning point. But look what we did to secure the elections. We added troops. We focused on security like we have never focused on security before. We made sure the resource were there to make the election successful. If we think we've turned the corner, this is a misreading of what happened.

The attacks are going to continue. The constitution will be written this year. The theocracy side of the story could unfold. We need more resources, not less. We need not to consider that this fight is over. An American footprint in Iraq is going to be significant for a long time to come, because the challenges of this country are significant.

I think it's fair to say that, in the past, we underestimated the insurgency. We didn't have the right skill mix. We've overrelied on the Guard and Reserves. We've adjusted for the election. That adjustment needs to continue. It's a long way before we can come home with honor.

BLITZER: So reducing the number from 150,000 right now, as they're planning on doing, to around 135,000, at least for the balance of the year, you think that's a mistake?

GRAHAM: The theory is that Iraqis will replace those 15,000 troops. I believe in the Powell doctrine. I would rather have an overwhelming presence during these tenuous times than try to bring one person home too early, because the constitution hasn't been written. There's two more elections to come.

It's very -- we are a long way from a stable Iraq. So, rather than trying to come home early, stay there with force, just like we did for the election, so that we can win this thing. Please do not underestimate what the Iraqi people face.

BLITZER: It sounds, though -- and you're a member of the Armed Services Committee -- as if the U.S. military is already overstretched. If you want to add troops to the situation in Iraq, it looks like it is going to be a difficult ordeal for the Pentagon.

GRAHAM: Right.

CLINTON: Well, that's absolutely true.

And I have so many questions and disagreements with the way that the administration, particularly the Pentagon, has pursued the mission in Iraq. And there are no easy answers. And what I worry about, to echo some of what Lindsey said, is that we can't act as though this election is some kind of determining point. It isn't. It is a beginning.

And, obviously, we are now going to be there at the pleasure of the Iraqi government. I think it makes sense for the United States to do everything possible to expedite the military training of the Iraqis. But we have to stay with enough presence to try to not only to stabilize the security situation, but to continue to demonstrate to those Iraqis taking authority the kind of government that is in the long-term interest of the Iraqi people. BLITZER: Let's stay in the region briefly. We don't have a lot of time.

Iran. Based on what you know, is there a viable military option, precision strikes to take out Iran's nuclear facilities, if diplomacy fails?

GRAHAM: The honest answer is, I don't know the military portfolio, what it would take to engage Iran. I hope diplomatic means work.

But back to the question she just asked. If we do not dramatically increase the number of troops in the Army and the Marine Corps, we will have made a mistake, because the stress on the current active force over time is unbearable. Let's increase the number of men and women in uniform. That takes pressure off the Guard and Reserves.

The one thing I want us to learn from this war is the commitments that we have throughout the world cannot be maintained with this number of people doing this many deployments.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: A new CNN/"USA Today"/Gallup poll is certain to renew speculation about a run for the White House for Hillary Clinton. Among Democrats, 40 percent said they would support Senator Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008. That's well ahead at this stage, well ahead of John Kerry and John Edwards.

I asked Senator Clinton about this earlier today. Here's what she had to say.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CLINTON: Well, Wolf, I'm running for reelection to the Senate.

I have more than I can say grace over right now. There's just so much work to be done. And I just have to say that this budget debate is not just about numbers. It's about values. It's about whether it's more important for us to continue cutting taxes and even to continue to make some of these tax cuts permanent or to try to keep all children who are in working families without insurance covered for their health needs, whether we are going to eliminate support for important programs in the environment, in housing and so much else.

And that's what I'm focused on right now.

BLITZER: So between now and 2006 -- and you're up for reelection in 2006.

CLINTON: Yes, I am.

BLITZER: Will you take any steps, beginning steps, to look at 2008?

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: I am focused on 2006. Well, actually, I'm focused on today and tomorrow. I have a very simple idea that I get up, I try to do the best I can every day, and get up and do the next day as well.

BLITZER: But you remember, the last time we did a major interview at the State University of New York at Buffalo, when you were running...

CLINTON: Oh, my goodness. I was.

BLITZER: And, at that time, you ruled out running for president. You wanted to be senator from New York state. Remember that?

CLINTON: Right.

BLITZER: What about now? Are you saying you want to be senator from New York state forever? Or are you ruling out a presidential run?

CLINTON: You are good. You are so good.

BLITZER: Well, go ahead.

CLINTON: That's because you're from Buffalo.

BLITZER: That's right.

CLINTON: You're a Buffalonian.

BLITZER: I remember that day.

CLINTON: And I know how to filibuster, too.

BLITZER: But you don't rule out, rule in...

CLINTON: I'll tell you what. I am running for reelection. I want everybody to know that. I'm focused on it. That's what I'm working on. That's what I care about. I'm doing the best I can to earn the votes of a majority of New Yorkers.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And much more coming up on the interview with Senators Clinton and Graham tomorrow, including their comments on President Bush's budget cuts. Senator Clinton, by the way, will also clarify her recent comments, somewhat controversial, on abortion rights for women. That's coming up on this program tomorrow, more of the interview.

NEWS CONFERENCE ON IMPROVING BENEFITS FOR MEMBERS OF THE NATIONAL GUARD AND RESERVES, 2/9/2005

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

Well, I'm delighted to be part of this bipartisan, bicameral effort. It really is an important issue. It's something that Senator Graham and I started working on about two years ago. And we've made progress, but we have a ways to go.

So the introduction of the National Guard and Reserve Readiness and Retention Act of 2005 is the next step on this road that we're traveling together.

And I'd like, personally, to thank Senator Graham. When we joined together at the Reserve Officers Association building to announce the first version of this legislation, he has been the leader, he speaks from experience and passion as a member of the Reserves.

And I'd also like to thank and note his long-lasting contribution to Guard and Reserve issues. My dear friend, Senator Leahy, he's the Democratic co-chair of the National Guard caucus, and he has worked tirelessly on behalf of the men and women in the National Guard and has been a very effective advocate.

Now, Senator Graham and I both serve on the Armed Services Committee, and we have heard countless stories from the people we represent, as well as through the work of the committee, about the strain being placed on our Guard and Reserve forces.

I don't think anyone can doubt the major role that the Guard and Reserve forces played in Afghanistan, in Iraq, and continue to play today.

Since September 11th, our reservists and National Guard members have been called upon with increasing frequency. In New York, we have over 30,000 members of the Guard and Reserves, and over 4,000 are currently deployed in support of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

When I have visited activated reservists and National Guard across New York, I'm impressed by their high morale, their eagerness to serve -- often at great sacrifice. It's not only leaving the employer and the job, but sometimes they're the only self-employed person in the family.

We've had so many problems with, you know, a single veterinarian going off for six or eight months and not finding anybody to cover his practice. You know, a self-employed accountant going off and not having anybody there to back him up.

CLINTON: Just issue after issue. And yet, time and time again, I've heard that this is something that these patriotic men and women are proud to do for all of us.

This legislation is needed now more than ever, and I'm hoping that we will be successful in addressing these two important elements.

First, to allow Guard and Reserve members the option of enrolling full-time in TRICARE. This is so important. It's a little bit shocking. And, you know, Lindsey and I have had numerous press conferences and we've appeared together -- much to everybody's surprise -- in the media from time to time, and we've talked about the fact that 20 percent of our Guard and Reserve who were activated showed up and were not medically ready to serve.

Now why would that happen? How could that happen?

Well, because they didn't have health insurance in their private employment, often because they were self...

(AUDIO GAP)

CLINTON: ... or who lose their coverage when a family member is called to active duty.

Secondly, we address the issue of retirement, and it adjusts the retirement structure to more accurately reflect the needs and the service of our troops.

For every two years a member serves, after 20 years of honorable service, that individual's eligible retirement age will be reduced by one year.

We're very hopeful that we're back this year in strength of numbers and resolve and that we will be successful in addressing two issues that are really critical to our Guard, Reserve members and their families.

And again, I thank Senator Graham and all of my colleagues for making this a priority.

GRAHAM: Now we'll hear from the bicameral parts. Congressman Latham has taken this on as his project over in the House. Congressman Wilson from South Carolina has a son serving -- been in Iraq in the Guard. And I'd like to hear from him please.

LATHAM: Thank you very much, Senator. And I just -- after what's been said, I'm not sure how much is left to be said other than last Saturday I had the honor to be at a ceremony to send off 80 additional National Guard personnel to Iraq. And I will assure you that the homecoming parties are much more fun.

But to see that 700 people there, and their families, to show the sacrifice that those people are making for our country, it is, as Lindsey talked about, just a matter of simple fairness, that we treat these people as they should be treated.

LATHAM: Many of the problems they have with their families are interruption of health care. Oftentimes they'll have coverage of a condition. They'll go off and serve on active duty, come back, get back on health care, and that previous condition is excluded.

There are real problems for these families. And I think we have to recognize the sacrifice that they make for our country, for freedom, and this war on global terrorism.

And that's why I think it is so important that we move this type of legislation to recognize their sacrifice. Like Lindsey had talked about, you know, 20 percent of the guards people nationwide do not have health insurance.

In the Midwest, where I live, it's about 40 percent, much higher there because most of them are self-employed or employed by small businesses.

We also have to recognize the sacrifice they make as to cutting off their contributions to their pension plans, their 401(k)s, the IRAs, the costs that are incurred in their long-term security because of their service to our country.

So this is an extraordinarily important piece of legislation, one that I'm very proud to work with senators on, and also on a very bipartisan basis, both in the House and the Senate. We've received tremendous support from across the political spectrum and we're just very proud to go forward with this legislation and we're hopeful that we can bring this a conclusion very, very quickly this year.

GRAHAM: The dean of the Guard Caucus, Senator Leahy?

LEAHY: Thank you very much.

The Congressman stated it very, very well when he said this goes beyond any kind of partisan politics. This is a cost of war. The Guard Caucus -- I have the honor of co-chairing it along with Senator Bond of Missouri -- is made up of most members of the Senate. We cover every political base there is. I think you're going to find very, very strong support from that as you did earlier when we first did this.

Talk about send-offs. In my little state of Vermont, which is the size of one congressional district, just over 600,000 people, I was at another send-off a couple of weeks ago with another 300 of our Guard. And if you look at the front page of The Washington Post today, they have an article about Vermont.

LEAHY: Vermont and Hawaii have given the most on a per capita basis of any state in the (AUDIO GAP).

LEAHY: These are very brave people. I talked with one, and the impact on our little state like ours is enormous. We have a small town near where I live in Vermont. They have one store, one general store. It's run by a mother and her son. The son was called up. The store had to close. There was no other way to keep it open.

The town loses a store. The family loses an income. And nobody knows when he'll come back. So it just made more sense to close it up.

We all know that we're going to have more and more of these farewell parties. And you look into the eyes of those who are leaving or their families, you realize they go across all ages. They cut across all spectra in society.

One man told me that he's going off, the tank group, he said, "I appreciate the fact that you took time to talk with my grandchildren before I left."

I mean, this covers everybody here. It's why we are here. We have, again, my little state 1,200 overseas. More, of course, in the larger states.

The very least we can do when they're serving -- it's impossible if you're over there in Iraq or anywhere else and look at the people serving, you can't say, "Well, this one's regular, this one's guard, this one's reserve." They're all alike. They're all doing the same.

So they ought to have the same health care. We can do that with TRICARE. A healthier force is going to be a better force. It's going to make them safer. It's going to make us safer. But it's also the just thing to do.

And then to allow the members of the Guard and Reserve to access their well-earned retirement benefits earlier than the current age of 60, which is five years after the age when active duty forces can receive their retirement pay, they ought to be able to do that.

So this is a case -- this is not political. This is not partisan. It's not Republican or Democratic. It's not House or Senate.

LEAHY: It's a matter of justice. They're serving us, they're protecting us. We ought to do our best to protect them.

Thank you.

GRAHAM: Thanks, Senator.

And one of the original authors of the bill, Senator DeWine from Ohio.

DEWINE: Thanks, Lindsey.

This bill is about taking care of and protecting the families of our Guard and Reserve members. Behind each member of the Guard or Reserve, many times are the unseen children and spouses.

We have a moral obligation to provide medical care for them, to make sure they have good medical care. As Lindsey has pointed out, and others have pointed out, many times the real problem is the continuity of care and the fact that you may have a spouse who is pregnant, and the concern about changing doctors in the middle of that pregnancy, changing doctors in the middle of an illness.

That's something that people just don't want to have to deal with, and they should not have to deal with. This bill will help to alleviate that problem.

So this is the compassionate thing to do, but it's also the right thing to do. And we really do, I think, have a moral obligation to pass this bill.

It's a continuation of what was begun in the last session of Congress. But it's really to continue that work, and really to do right by the men and women who are serving us, and to do right by their families.

GRAHAM: Now, Senator Allen, who's been working on a series of issues for the Guard and Reserve.

ALLEN: Thank you, Lindsey, and I very much appreciate your leadership. You're the leader of the whole Senate on this.

GRAHAM: Yes, right.

ALLEN: You really are, on this issue, because we look at you as one who obviously has the right ideas, but also the experience. And it's good to see that this is bipartisan and bicameral, in an effort to help out our Guard and Reserve.

I'll not repeat everything that everyone else has said. I'll give you my perspective, though, particularly of the Guard, having served as governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and seeing what the Guard men and women do, and (AUDIO GAP).

ALLEN: And in recent years, the Guard's been, as well as the Reserve, being called up.

I remember sending off Guard troops to Bosnia, going and visiting them in Bosnia. And these people are not all from big cities. They're from small towns, they're from rural areas. Their families are left back at home. They've left a job. As Senator Clinton was saying, some may be a sole proprietor. Others may be just one of five people working for some company.

And they've lost, let's say, a quarter of their work force, and hold those jobs open. Those employers are great patriots too.

But the families also have the same expenses, the same costs. And there's a substantial number of Guard and Reserve members who just to serve this patriotic duty for our country are actually losing money. They're getting paid less. There's a pay gap.

There are a variety of things that Lindsey and those of us have been trying to do over the last few years to make sure that the benefits are good for those individuals, and also their families.

Health care is clearly a main concern of any family. And that's why this is such a salient and beneficial assistance to those who are serving part time, so to speak, although it seems full time these days.

ALLEN: The same with what we did last year, by the way, on the issue of tuition assistance and making sure that, if they want to get college tuition assistance, that's done.

The pay gap is something that's always going to be a challenge for us. But this is something that clearly will be beneficial. It will help us with the retention, help us with recruitment.

And most of all, as a family's back home wringing their hands, worrying, praying that their loved one will come home safely, it's really, as Senator DeWine said, "This is for the families."

And I'll simply close with the cautions that George Washington gave our country in the beginning of our republic, where he said the willingness -- and I'll paraphrase it -- the willingness of future generations to fight for their country, no matter how just the cause, will be proportionate to how they perceive the treatment of previous veterans.

That applies to this matter. It applies to a lot of other issues that we're all going to work on, because we are the land of the free because of these brave men and women.

Thank you, Lindsey, and my colleagues.

GRAHAM: All those guys from Virginia are very eloquent.

Now, you know, to put this in perspective, all of us are here to help families. But there are some members of Congress that have a different family perspective of the war on Iraq and the needs of the Guard and Reserve. Congressman Wilson will tell you about his perspective.

WILSON: Thank you, Senator.

And, ladies and gentlemen, it's an honor to be here today. And I want to thank Tom Latham for his leadership in the House on this particular legislation. Look forward to working with him.

And, indeed, I do have a unique perspective as a veteran and a parent. I've just completed 31 years service with the Army National Guard. I had the distinction of serving as the staff judge advocate for the Army, working with the Air Force staff judge advocate, Lindsey Graham.

And so I know what a stalwart he is for the Guard and Reserve, and it was an exciting experience for both of us.

Additionally, as a parent, I'm very grateful that my oldest son, who's a young attorney in the Army National Guard, has exited Iraq. He's currently on his way home. A year of service. He's so grateful for having the opportunity to protect the American people in Iraq.

Additionally, I have another son, just two weeks ago, who began officer basic course, Army National Guard, at Fort Gordon in Georgia. So our family really appreciates what the Guard means to our state and our country.

And I know that this particular legislation is exactly what is needed that is real world, it's common sense, it can be understood by members of the Guard. It's a reflection of our appreciation for their sacrifices. And then it's also supportive of families.

That's the key point that we need to make, it's been made so well today, that families have been so supportive.

Another addition to this that's so helpful, particularly with the health insurance, the retirement, are with employers.

WILSON: They've been so dedicated in providing for their employees to serve. And this bill has it all as a means of promoting, recruiting and retention.

Thank you very much.

GRAHAM: Any questions?

QUESTION: A question for either of the main co-sponsors: What are the budgetary implications of this bill? Is that likely to be a stumbling block for passage? And also, what is the Bush administration's attitude?

GRAHAM: Well, the budget implications for the bill, if you include the retirement, reducing retirement age from 60 to 55 for those who serve from 20 to 30, plus full-time eligibility for TRICARE, is a little over a billion dollars a year. For a five-year period, you're looking at about $7 billion.

Now, in fairness to the Pentagon, personnel costs are growing greatly and we have to be sensitive to that.

But what's the budgetary impact of destroying the Guard and Reserve? It's not about the budget. It's about our national security.

Recruitment and retention is down in the Guard and Reserves. General Blum has told us we're about to destroy, if we don't watch it with this tempo level and service commitment level, one of the greatest fighting forces we've ever known: our active duty forces, our Guard and Reserve.

What's the cost to the public of having 20 percent of those called to active duty unable to serve?

We have found that our current military health care system has a hole in it. It does not cover people who are going to go off to war. It does take care of their families.

I would argue that a billion dollars a year of taxpayer money will be spent happily by the American public to take care of those who are making sure the American public stays free.

To me this is not about the economics. This is about retention and recruiting and the hope the Pentagon will come on board.

LEAHY: I explained it back home to an old farmer who asked me about the costs. I said, "Think of the roof on your barn. You do a little preventive maintenance on that roof, it's going to last forever. You don't, the next big storm we have here, you're going to lose half the roof and it's going to cost you a lot more."

We're doing preventive maintenance here, preventive maintenance that carries a real human benefit to it.

GRAHAM: Senator Clinton?

CLINTON: Well, with respect to that last part of your question about the Pentagon's attitude, I don't think it's any surprise to anyone who follows this issue, as all of you do, that we've been engaged in a constant conversation to try to convince the Department of Defense to support this or, at least, at the very least, not oppose it. And we've made some progress, as you know.

We're hoping that, given the preventive maintenance approach -- which I think Senator Leahy's absolutely right about -- this is a good commitment, you know, for us to make at this time. It sends exactly the right signal that should be sent.

So that as people are coming out of the active duty forces, which is where the bulk of the recruits for Guard and Reserves come from, they're going to know that we're looking out for them, that we really care about them and their families.

I just think that it is a very sensible approach budgetarily as well as for all of the moral, family and other reasons we've talked about.

GRAHAM: If I may, I'd like the associations to speak, and we'll take more questions.

But simply stated, how much longer are you going to ask Americans to -- half of them get a reduction in pay -- George Allen's absolutely right. Most people don't realize that, one, the Guard and the Reserves are not eligible for any type of health care, number two, that half of those who are called to active duty from the civilian sector have a cut in pay; 50 percent lose money, and your reward is you get to go off to places like Iraq.

I think all of us feel an obligation to ameliorate that the best we can, being fiscally sensitive.

GRAHAM: But the idea that this package is too expensive, in light of the obligations that we're putting on these people, to me, makes no sense.

The Military Officers Association will now come forward and tell us about their position.

RYAN: Well, thank you, senators and congressmen.

I'm Norb Ryan, president of the Military Officers Association. (inaudible) critical this year that we get this done, for three reasons. Number one, as some of the members of Congress addressed, it takes generations to build a strong army. It only takes a few short years to destroy it.

Number two: We've heard about the long deployments, the too- frequent deployments. We know that we call our Guard and Reserve citizen-soldiers. They are becoming soldiers and part-time citizens.

And finally, because of this, the enormous sacrifice that they and their families are under, we need to send a much clearer signal to these men and women that their service and sacrifice is deeply appreciated.

Our position on this is that many times our elected officials have a much better feel for the importance of an issue like this to our nation's defense than those that are too close to the war and the issues that are going on there.

And so our military association and our 370,000 members are prepared to go to the mat with the rest of the coalition here and the leaders that you have before you to get this bill through the Congress this year. It is that critical to our nation's defense.

Thank you.

GRAHAM: And now the Reserve Officers Association.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you, everyone.

Guard and Reserve members really want one thing, and that's to serve their country. It's that simple.

The members of the House and Senate here today understand that in order for that to happen, problems have to be solved. And, boy, are we glad they get it.

These issues were identified over a decade ago, during Desert Shield and Desert Storm. Hopefully, we've passed that magic amount of time that it takes for a bill to go through, and this year we'll see it finished.

We support wholeheartedly this effort, and we hope that you'll be behind us with it also.

GRAHAM: You were really good...

(CROSSTALK)

(LAUGHTER)

GRAHAM: Now, the Guard Association.

(UNKNOWN): Senator Graham, we thank you and all of you folks for the support.

Five years ago, the Adjutant Generals Association identified, through their strategic planning process, the fact that the Guard and the Reserve would ultimately be in the position they are today; that breakage was a possibility.

They began an initiative under the guidance of Major General John Smith of Ohio, came to Washington and recruited some of the early supporters. And so AGAUS passed that torch to the National Guard Association of the United States. We've been at it a long time.

They began by determining with extensive surveying in the field, with soldiers and airmen, what was it that would keep them in. Universally, the answer to all of those surveys was, "Health care for me and my family."

They felt so strongly about it, that they came up with a concept that has survived to this day as a part of this legislation, and that is they were willing to help pay the bill.

That's a little unusual for a benefit program coming out of the federal government, and that speaks volumes as to how important this is.

The National Guard Association of the United States will be there to be counted. We'll be hammering on doors.

Thanks very much for the opportunity.

QUESTION: A question for Senator Clinton and Senator Leahy: I'm just wondering your reaction to the Medicare prescription drug numbers that came out this morning.

LEAHY: I haven't seen them. And I'd, kind of, like to see them first, and then I'll be glad to react.

Plus, it's an irrelevant question. And the judge here objected to it. His objection is sustained.

(LAUGHTER)

QUESTION: You were really nice to the administration, but the fact is, they threatened to veto the defense bill last year if these provisions were in it.

And can we get a little better answer from you about how they're going to oppose them?

(UNKNOWN): A whole lot of members.

(LAUGHTER)

GRAHAM: Well, the reason I'm nice to the administration is because they reached across the divide and we found a compromise last year.

Do not dismiss the idea that personnel costs are really growing in the military. We're having a $40 billion expenditure for military health care, and it's going to increasingly take resources away from war-fighting.

But the ultimate war-fighting requires people to be physically able to go to the war. This is taking care of the barn. This is preventive health care in a smart way.

And this is my message to the administration: 70 senators have seen this the same three times. You've gotten a conservative like Joe Wilson and Tom Latham from the House willing to spend $1.5 billion a year more, if necessary, to take care of the families serving the country.

You'll have an $80 billion supplemental come over -- and I will vote for it gladly, but they need to understand that it's going to get amended in the Senate. We're going to fix this problem this year.

And my counsel to the Pentagon is to come over here and help us make health care more efficient, but don't deny it to the Guard and Reserves who need it, because you're going to lose that fight.

(APPLAUSE)

U.S. SENATOR JAMES M. INHOFE (R-OK) HOLDS HEARING ON EPA BUDGET, 2/9/2005

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to begin by saying that there are a few bright spots in this budget. I'm pleased, for example, that funding for building- decontamination research has been restored. That had been zeroed out last year.

The request for the Clean School Bus USA program is up from the FY '05 enacted levels, and I think that's a very good sign, because this program does help school districts retrofit old buses or purchase new ones in order to reduce children's exposure to harmful particulates.

But from a macro perspective I have to say this budget is disappointing and inadequate. Like my colleagues, I'm dismayed about the very deep cuts for the clean water state revolving fund by $360 million from the FY '05 enacted levels to $730 million.

If Congress passes this amount it would be a cut of more than $600 million from the average historical funding level of $1.37 billion per year for the program.

Now, for New York alone this reduction would mean a cut of $40 million. We know that the water infrastructure gap for the next 20 years is in the hundreds of billions.

In New York we have an aging infrastructure. From the 1990 to 2000 census we had an increase in population in New York City. This is an incredibly shortsighted cut.

And on the other end of our state we have problems with the decision to zero out funding for the rural water programs which are critical to hundreds and hundreds of small rural systems in New York and certainly thousands across the country, to help these small communities comply with the law and protect their drinking water. So we have to find a way to provide that assistance as well.

I join my colleagues' concerns about some of the policy decisions embedded in this budget document because after all budgets are value statements as well as including numbers and statistics.

I join my colleague, Senator Boxer, with concerns about the Superfund. I join my colleague, Senator Carper, with concerns about mercury.

It really, I have to say, is shocking that the EPA inspector general's report that was requested by Senator Jeffords, I and others, concerning the mercury proposal found that EPA management ignored the Clean Air Act's requirements.

Now, we do not have any other law at this time. There are lots of proposals floating around, but the law is the law and that's the Clean Air Act.

And the direction by the EPA management to the staff to essentially game the mercury analysis so that the reductions would mesh with the expected co-benefits of the clean air interstate rule is absolutely outrageous. It's a slap in the face to Congress. It's a slap in the face to the American public. And it is a real detriment to the one in 12 American women who already have dangerous levels of mercury in their bloodstream.

It's very troubling because we need unbiased analyses. We can have arguments about what the best thing to do is. And, obviously, the chairman and I don't agree about what we should do to clean our air. But we cannot permit government agencies to provide false and misleading information. And if there were any oversight in this Congress, which there is very little of, we would get answers to this. But it is wrong and it is unacceptable.

Let me just mention two other issues very quickly.

I worked with the White House in the fall of 2003 to secure an agreement to establish the World Trade Center expert technical review panel to address continuing concerns about contamination resulting from the collapse of the World Trade Center on September 11. I then worked very successfully with Governor Leavitt to implement that agreement.

The panel got under way last March under the chairmanship of Dr. Paul Gilman of the Office of Research and Development. Dr. Gilman did an excellent job, but he has left the agency and the panel has been without a chairman. And I hope, Mr. Johnson, that you will name a new chair of this panel expeditiously, because this is a success story. This is one of those issues where everybody's worked together.

Finally with respect to the Deutsche Bank demolition, I want to thank the EPA for stepping in and making clear that there were aspects of this demolition that were totally unacceptable. And I would hope that the EPA has followed up with the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation to ensure that the suggested changes are made and that you will continue to work to ensure that any demolition going on in Lower Manhattan is done to the highest standards.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[GAP - FROM LATER IN HEARING]

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, just two points to clarify the record. Every Clinton budget post-'95 assumed the reinstatement of the polluter-pay tax, and, in fact, the administration consistently supported reinstating the polluter-pay tax. Unfortunately, there was not much appetite for doing that in the Congress.

Secondly, with respect to Senator Isakson's point, it's my understanding that EPA does control mercury coming out of incinerators. We've had recognition of the control of mercury for quite some time. We've just never taken it to the stage it needs to be moved toward, which is to control the emissions from dirty power plants.

Now, Mr. Johnson, let me ask you specifically, when do you think a new chair will be named for the World Trade Center panel?

JOHNSON: Senator Clinton, first of all, thank you for your kind remarks with regard to the effort by Dr. Gilman and others on the World Trade Center, an important topic for all of us, and to do what we all need to do to address that situation.

Since we are in the midst of -- the president is looking for an administrator for EPA, and also there are several key positions that we are actively looking for highly qualified individuals, including the assistant administrator for our Office of Research and Development.

While that process is going on, I have asked Tim Oppelt, who is the director of our Cincinnati lab who oversees all of our research in homeland security, if he would serve as an interim chair for this upcoming meeting and then report back to me directly so that the important progress that we've made thus far will continue.

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

JOHNSON: And I also made a conscious decision that rather than waiting for people to be in positions, that I thought it was important for us to move forward with having our next panel meeting. And so, we have announced that we are having our next panel meeting on February the 23rd.

So Mr. Oppelt will be filling in to chair that for me, reporting directly back to me, so that we can move forward with the important progress.

CLINTON: Thank you very much. I know that my constituents appreciate that as well.

Mr. Johnson, with respect to the Deutsche Bank building, has the EPA followed up with the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation to ensure that the suggested changes that EPA made with respect to the technical considerations about the demolition -- has that been followed up with the Lower Manhattan Development Corporation?

JOHNSON: Our Region 2 office out of New York, as you're well aware, was following this, and, in fact, were the ones who were instrumental in achieving what you had said. I'm not sure whether that follow-up has or has not occurred.

CLINTON: Could you get back to me on that?

JOHNSON: I'd be happy to get back to you for the record.

CLINTON: I think it's important. I mean, there was a great cheer that went up from Lower Manhattan when the EPA set forth its concerns, and I'd like to, you know, keep getting you good press in Manhattan.

Last August I wrote to the EPA to ask for attention to a Title 6 claim that had been filed by the Syracuse University Public Interest Law Firm on behalf of a group called the Partnership for Onondaga Creek, a grassroots community group, including neighborhood residents from blocks where Onondaga County plans to build an above-ground sewage plant.

I was very pleased to learn after I sent my letter that EPA contacted the claimants to indicate that a review of the claim had begun.

Can you tell me when the review of this claim will be completed or can you get back to me with that information? I see someone nodding who looks very knowledgeable back there.

JOHNSON: We have Ann Klee, who is our general counsel, since she was the one who was nodding, come up to the table.

Ann?

KLEE: To show a little knowledge is dangerous.

Senator Clinton, we are reviewing the document. We just received it, and we expect to have it finalized, I would say, shortly, probably within a month. I think the deadline is March 17th.

CLINTON: Great.

KLEE: But I could be wrong on that.

CLINTON: Thank you. Well, that will also be good news to my constituents.

Mr. Johnson, usually we have expected in the Congress every four years a report on the reduction in deposition rates of acid rain, the National Acid Precipitation Assessment program report. The last report was in 1998. When can we expect this report to be delivered to the Congress?

JOHNSON: Senator, let me ask Jeff Holmstead, who is our assistant administrator for air programs.

HOLMSTEAD: Senator, what I can tell you is that there is a draft of that report that is undergoing review right now. I think it's actually produced by the Office of Science and Technology, and we've been one of the agencies that have been reviewing that. It's actually the subject of pretty intense scrutiny by a lot of science agencies.

So what I can say is it is undergoing review. I don't know exactly what the time frame is because it's not our document, but I do know that folks in my office have been looking at it. So I would assume it would be out relatively soon.

CLINTON: It would be, I think, helpful to have it on a fast-track since it's somewhat overdue, if we were to keep the four-year schedule. So I appreciate that.

Finally, Mr. Johnson, last week, when CEQ Chairman Connaughton testified before this committee about Clear Skies, he said at that time that the administration had not taken a position with respect to S. 131. You've made several references in your testimony today to Clear Skies. Are you indicating that the administration has made a decision to endorse and support S. 131?

JOHNSON: No. Don't misunderstand from my comments. Is that obviously the president submitted Clear Skies legislation -- now two years ago? Two years ago. And that we know that, through Chairman Inhofe's leadership, that there is -- markup is next week.

CLINTON: Well, so you were using that as sort of generic...

JOHNSON: No, I was using that as a generic that certainly we support Clear Skies legislation. The president put a proposal on the table. I know that there will be a markup next week, and we look forward to the results.

CLINTON: Could I ask you specifically, with respect to the fact that we are having a markup next week, Section 407(j) of S. 131 includes a provision that carves out exemptions from current Clean Air Act requirements for four entire source categories, more than 70,000 units. This removes these units from Clean Air Act regulations for hazardous air pollutants, including carcinogens like benzene, probable carcinogens like formaldehyde, and other nasty things like arsenic.

I asked Mr. Connaughton whether the administration specifically supported that provision and whether the EPA had produced estimates of how many facilities would qualify for exemptions under this provision, and whether there had been any modeling about potential health impacts of those exemptions.

Mr. Connaughton said he would get back to me with answers, which he has not yet done. But I think the committee needs answers to those questions. I don't see how we can proceed with a markup next week on a piece of legislation that creates such a big carve out that could have deleterious health impacts.

So could we expect to get answers before our markup next week?

JOHNSON: I will have an answer for you, yes.

CLINTON: Thank you.

JOHNSON: I will also point out that the analyses for the air program activities, particularly as we get into modeling particulate and all the rest, are very, very intensive and, in fact, take weeks to accomplish.

CLINTON: Thank you.

“Wolf Blitzer Reports,” CNN, 2/10/2005

BLITZER: Let's talk briefly about the budget. I assume you're upset, like a lot of Democrats, as far as the president's budget cuts are concerned. What are you going to do about it?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (D), NEW YORK: Well, I'm upset as an American. I think that we are in this huge deficit hole. We are dependent on foreign lenders, like the governments of China and others, to keep bailing us out every month. It's an unsustainable situation...

BLITZER: But the country's at war.

CLINTON: Well, this is the first time we've ever had a president take us to war and cut taxes at the same time. It doesn't add up and it's really undermining our long-term economic viability. The budget has a lot of specific problems with it that I think are not -- you know, we're going to debate them and I don't think that eventually they will be enacted.

But the bigger question is we don't have Iraq in there. We don't have the real cost of Social Security in terms of the plan the president wants to present. You know, at some point, we've got to say, look, everybody, we have not repealed the laws of economics and arithmetic. This does not add up and we need to do a better job.

BLITZER: You disagree or you agree?

SEN. LINDSEY GRAHAM (R), SOUTH CAROLINA: Well, there is going to be bipartisan buy-in to the idea that we need to control our spending like we did in 1997 when President Clinton was president. We had a balanced budget agreement. We were able to find a way to control the growth of spending. I hope we can do that. Some specific programs to be rejected by Republicans in terms of budget austerity.

But the idea of controlling spending -- cutting taxes has helped the economy, I think. I think we can have some more tax cuts. But we can't borrow our way out of every problem. With Social Security I propose not borrowing all the money you need to fix Social Security, actually raising the cap on earnings, I know as a Republican that's heresy.

BLITZER: Sounds like a tax cut -- a tax raise, an increase in taxes.

GRAHAM: Well, for some people, by raising the cap, they'll have to make a higher contribution to Social Security for the common good. What I'm trying to generate in this debate is that our problems are real for all demographics, Republican or Democrat. Our country is really in a bad way when it comes to budget matters.

Fiscal austerity with a compassionate heart, I think, is the key to this. Entitlement reform -- two-thirds of the budget is entitlement spending, if we can fix Social Security in a bipartisan way, it gives us hope. If we fail here, I don't know what we do with Medicare.

BLITZER: We are out of time. One quick question. Just clarify briefly for us the abortion issue because some abortion...

CLINTON: Briefly?

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: Some abortion supporters -- abortion rights supporters among women's groups were a little concerned by those recent comments you made. So just explain to our viewers what is your stance right now?

CLINTON: Well, I have tried to make clear over many, many years that I believe that this is a very difficult issue, morally and in every other way. I don't see how the government can enter into this matter and criminalize the behavior of women and their doctors. Therefore my hope is that we can find common ground, to deal with the underlying problem which happens to be unplanned, unwanted pregnancies.

The more we can work together to try to decrease those numbers, the less this will be a pressing issue in the hearts and minds of so many Americans.

BLITZER: But fundamentally you still support a women's right to have an abortion?

CLINTON: Absolutely. As I said in my speech in Albany, I've been to countries that forced women to have abortions and be sterilized, like China, where they had a one-child policy.

I've been to countries like Romania that forced women to bear children. They wanted every woman to have five children for the state. They used to physically examine women every month to make sure that if they were pregnant they would be followed by the secret police. And we ended up with orphans and abandoned children and a terrible AIDS crisis in the Rumanian orphanages.

I've been to Brazil, a place where abortion is illegal. And I've been to a hospital where half the women were thrilled because they were having babies and half were being treated because they had terrible, botched, illegal abortions.

So I know that in this world of ours there are many places where abortion is illegal and half the abortions in the world happen in those countries. This is a problem that needs to be dealt with from the beginning in helping young women and young men understand responsible decision-making, in providing good moral values and upbringing, hopefully religious -- we underpin so that people know what is right and wrong.

I also believe in comprehensive sex education because I think that -- although I favor and spoke years ago about abstinence, I think that it's the parents that -- going to be in our saturated culture of consumerism, materialism and sex selling everything, a problem that we can't deal with in just one way.

So I think there is common ground here. And I would, for example, hope that the administration would rethink its decision about making it recommended to provide emergency contraception after a woman has been raped, because these are areas where I think people on all sides can find some common ground. And that's what I'm hoping to achieve.

BLITZER: You want to just weigh in briefly or...

GRAHAM: I'm proudly pro-life and I agree totally with her that our men and women in the Guard and reserve need full time health care now.

BLITZER: I think everybody will agree with you on that. Senator Graham, thanks very much.

GRAHAM: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: Senator Clinton...

CLINTON: Thanks, thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: ... appreciate it very much. Good luck to both of you.

CLINTON: Thank you very much, Wolf. (END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: We spoke yesterday on Capitol Hill.

U.S. SENATORS BYRON DORGAN (D-ND) AND HILLARY CLINTON (D-NY) HOLD A NEWS CONFERENCE ON CAPPING THE NATIONAL TRADE DEFICIT, 2/10/2005

CLINTON: Well, I want to thank Senator Dorgan. He has been a tremendous leader on this and so many other issues.

And I think what we can take from Senator Dorgan's briefing is a disarmingly simple concept: When we run a trade deficit, we pay for that deficit by selling U.S. assets to foreigners. Now, there's nothing wrong with that. That's the way global trade works. But after a certain point, like anything else, it becomes a problem.

You know, there's nothing wrong with eating ice cream occasionally, but if you're gorging yourself on a gallon or two a day, it becomes a problem.

But because that trade and budget deficit has gone unchecked for the last three years, we're now in a position where foreigners hold 41 percent of the debts that our Treasury issues, nearly $3 trillion.

Now, we are not here to claim that the sky is falling or to tell the American people to, you know, head for the hills, but the simple fact that we're trying to get across with this legislation is that there is no precedent in American history for an economy as large as ours to be as heavily in debt to our trading partners as we are today.

Moreover, with today's announcement, we now have the largest trade deficit in history, a near 25 percent increase over last year's record deficit.

As the head of the Federal Reserve in New York recently said, and I quote him, we are significantly more dependent today on the confidence of the rest of the world in U.S. economic policy.

Now, we do benefit -- and we're fortunate to -- from the fact that we have a deep and flexible economy that can absorb crises and disorders that would cripple any other economy.

But we should not mistake our strength for invulnerability.

At some point, we have to ask ourselves, how much is too much? How long will we be able to sustain a trade deficit exceeding 5 percent of our GDP which many economists and the chairman of the Federal Reserve have said are unsustainable? How long can we depend on the confidence of foreign investors to keep propping up our currency and covering our debt?

Now, these are important questions that should be asked, and that's what our bill is attempting to do. We're trying to address these questions to the Congress, the president and the American public.

Some years ago, Congress had the wisdom to create a debt ceiling in order to sound the alarm and to try to rein in budget deficits and ensure that, you know, we didn't go too far in the amount of debt we owed.

Now, it's arguable as to whether that concept has been effective, given that the debt ceiling has been raised so many times in order to accommodate the fiscal policies that were at work at the time. But at least it forced people to take notice of our government's fiscal condition. And it made members of Congress accountable whenever they voted to increase the debt limit. We think that concept of accountability is a good thing.

And if a debt ceiling helps make the public aware of how much borrowing their government is doing, then a trade deficit ceiling would go far in making the American people aware of how precarious a position we're in in our economy because of our increasing trade deficit.

You know, there are a lot of really -- there are lot of really smart people about money and the economy in our country.

CLINTON: And I think, average Americans would probably agree that Warren Buffet and Bill Gates are pretty smart about how you make money. And they are both investing in positions that anticipate future dollar declines as a result of this administration's budget policies and our trade deficit.

And it certainly is disconcerting to see people taking positions against their own economy's performance. But that's how they read the economic tea leaves. And I don't think they're far off.

So let's not forget that this is a real problem. It has a drag on economic growth. It impedes job creation. It negatively affects wage growth and if left unchecked, it will directly affect Americans' pocketbooks.

It also falls directly on our children and our children's children. It is hard for Byron and Ben and I to sort of reconcile the president going around talking about a crisis of Social Security, ignoring the crisis in our budget deficit, the crisis in Medicare, the crisis in the trade deficit and debt. And it's a real sign of this administration's indifference toward the long-term economic health of our economy.

So I want to thank Senator Dorgan once again for stepping up and pointing out the problems that we are facing, that are really on our doorstep, and coming up with a good idea that hopefully will get us back on track.

DORGAN: Hillary, thank you very much.

Ben Cardin has joined us, and Ben is someone with whom I served on the House Ways and Means Committee some many years ago. He's also in a key position on the Trade Subcommittee, and we're really pleased that he's going to introduce similar legislation in the U.S. House.

Ben?

CARDIN: Thank you. Senator Dorgan, let me first thank you for your leadership on trade issues, for your leadership in bringing forward this very important issue, a $600-plus billion deficit this year alone.

Senator Clinton, I want to thank you for your leadership on trade, your leadership on health issues, your leadership on economic issues and for your effort here to alert the American people of this desperate need that we have.

CARDIN: In the last four years, we've accumulated as much trade debt as we did in the first 220 years of our nation's history.

This is a matter of economic security, but it's also a matter of the security of our country. When you look at who holds our debt, these countries aren't always in agreement with us on our foreign policy. And we shouldn't be so dependent as we have become. It is a matter of national security.

I'm proud to represent the Port of Baltimore. Trade's very important to my economy, it's very important to the economy of this nation. But five out of six ships that come into our ports from China will leave empty -- leave empty. And that one ship that goes back to China is most likely to contain waste products or scrap metal. It's not going to be manufactured goods.

We used to have a major trade surplus on advanced technology products. Today we have a deficit. And the list goes on and on and on.

Well, it is time for a wake-up call, and that's exactly what this legislation does. It says enough's enough. It's time to have a plan to get us out of this debt. It's time to have a plan that will protect American workers and businesses, that will help our manufacturers, our farmers and our producers. And that's exactly what this legislation does.

I'm proud to be associated with this. I can tell you we're going to fight in the House to get this bill passed this year.

Thank you.

DORGAN: Ben, thank you very much.

Let me underscore again, this is not about some theory. This is about whether this country will be able to expand, provide economic opportunity, and create new jobs in the future. I think this is really very important, and I'm pleased to be joined by my colleagues.

We'd be happy to answer questions.

QUESTION: Two related questions. One, what you propose as the initial trade deficit ceiling to start (OFF-MIKE)?

And number two, the meat of the bill seems to be this (OFF-MIKE) requirement. Don't you sort of run the risk of in some ways (OFF- MIKE) and they can say, "We're trying, we're trying" (OFF-MIKE)?

DORGAN: Well, we've established the limits. It would be 5 percent of gross domestic product with respect to the total aggregated current accounts deficit that comes from the trade deficit. And the other is 25 -- excuse me, it's exactly the opposite -- 25 percent and 5 percent of GDP, both with respect to the current year deficit or the aggregate deficit.

DORGAN: Look, our point is it simply requires some action. At this point, nothing's happening.

I guarantee you, the people who are responsible for this, and the people who ought to looking after this issue and paying attention to it are snoring through the day once again, not concerned, not worried, not paying much mind to any need to be doing anything different, thinking that this is just fine. We'll just keep chanting about our trade policies and chanting about future economic growth, even as we sink deeper and deeper into the abyss of red ink.

QUESTION: Once they stop snoring and wake up, what should they do? Your bill calls on the administration to come up with a plan.

What do you think should be in that plan? What should (inaudible)

CLINTON: Well, there are a number of things that can be done. There isn't any one answer. What we're trying to do is sound the alarm.

If people wake up after they hear the alarm, we need to put our own fiscal house in order, which would be a very good step in making sure that we could have more strength on our own economic front.

We need to have policies that promote, new technologies that are going to make us richer in the future, like environmental and energy technologies, where there's a tremendous opportunity for a market and we are just sitting by and letting the Europeans and the Asians seize that market. We're not doing anything like our fair share of it.

We need to really have an investment in education and training, not just paying lip-service to it, so that people are able to be competitive in the global economy.

We need to take the legacy costs and the current costs of health and retirement off the backs of American business, so that they can be competitive. Right now we have them in a pincer movement, where basically they lose either way. They compete with countries and companies that don't expect an individual business to have to pay for health care and pension. Or they compete with companies and countries that don't provide benefits.

You know, for the first time in our history, more cars are being made in the province of Ottawa, in Canada, than are being made in the state of Michigan.

And so all the pieces of our economic pie have to be rethought, about how we're going to be competitive in the global economy. And, you know, right now we're not doing anything.

And this administration actually talks favorably about losing more jobs. You know, I'm not against global trade. We all think we have to be competitive and have a good, strong global trading system. But I don't want to cede the field of competition. And that's what we're doing right now.

CARDIN: This administration has spent a lot of time on bilateral agreements that have meant very little, collectively, to our economy.

They need to spend time with the WTO and fight for fair trading partnerships, so that we have a level playing field. They've brought 12 cases in the last four years. The previous administration brought 11 cases a year. They just haven't been aggressive in fighting for our rights in the WTO. We have to do a much better job.

DORGAN: Let me just say that there is no trade vaccine here that's going to make you well. You do this piece-by-piece.

And I can give you a dozen examples. Let me just give you one, with Korea. In the last year, we will have imported about 700,000 Korean cars into the United States.

Do you know how many cars we got from the U.S., into the Korean market? Fewer than 4,000.

DORGAN: So almost 700,000 coming this way, fewer than 4,000 going that way. Do you know why? Because they don't want to sell American cars in Korea.

Our country has to say to countries like Korea, "Look, fair is fair. Reciprocal trade. You don't want to open your market to us. Then sell your cars in Zambia, and see how quick they sell."

But the fact is, we have to have a backbone and some will and some nerve to say to other countries, "We demand and insist on fair trade treatment," whether it's wheat or cars or any number of things.

And I don't think this is rocket science. It's a matter of our country paying attention to it and demanding on behalf of our economic interest that we have fair trade rules.

QUESTION: Back in 1986 when you had this same debate, economists with Reagan argued that the way to reduce the deficit was to lower the value of the dollar, to cut the budget deficit at home and to encourage Americans to save more (inaudible). Republicans can argue today that they are doing those same things. So how does your bill affect (OFF-MIKE)

DORGAN: Well, I would just ask you to observe the following: The dollar is declining in value. And our trade deficit is at a record high.

CLINTON: I just can't help but add, in addition to that, that I know that the administration and the Republican majority want to turn Washington into an evidence-free zone. And it's something that has tremendous consequences for all of us.

But the idea that, you know, they could respond to the trade deficit by saying, "Look what we are trying to do," and list those items, when everybody knows that their plan for Social Security would make workers more insecure, that it would have a huge increase of federal borrowing, which would make our economic position even worse.

I mean, it just doesn't add up. And I know that's what they say. But look at what they do. Don't look at what they say.

QUESTION: Or put another way, Lloyd Bentsen who was a senator at the time. He was promoting a Democratic bill, which I think ran to about 1,000 pages, the final bill. He said, "I'm looking for a remedy, not an issue."

Your bill, you can argue, might be looking for an issue, because there is no remedy. Where is the remedy in this?

CLINTON: But I think the remedy starts with public awareness. I mean, this is not exactly a conversation around the water cooler. These figures come and go.

CLINTON: And people just kind of yawn, because they don't see the connection between the job loss that we've had in upstate New York of 180,000 jobs in the last several years and the fact that we're not being competitive in selling anything to people around the world. And they don't really understand the security implication of being so dependent upon foreign lenders that we are losing maneuverability when it comes to matters of great strategic security interest to us.

So we have to raise the visibility of this. That's the first step toward solving a problem.

And you're right, this has been talked about. But to be fair to everybody in the past, the problem was not as acute and as serious as it is now, with no end in sight. So I think that what our first step is is to let the people start talking about it. Let's get the president asked about it at news conferences. Let's get the Republican leadership asked about it when they show up for stakeouts.

This is a serious problem. Let's put it on the national agenda.

DORGAN: Let me make one final point. There won't be a remedy until it is an issue. As long as it is not an issue, no one's even looking for a remedy.

But all you have to do is look at this chart to ask yourself, are things getting worse or much worse? The answer is yes, of course.

And do you see anybody scurrying around to decide this is important for our country? The answer is no.

That's why this has to become an issue, not a partisan issue, but an issue about are we going to stand up for the economic interests of this country? When are we going to take some action?

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, President Clinton with the help of the Congress passed a PNTR with China in 2000. And now, more than 50 House members, including many, many Democrats, are saying it's time to repeal PNTR with China. What's your position on that?

CLINTON: I believe in trade, but I don't believe being the only country in the world that truly practices free trade. I am thrilled that people in China and India and elsewhere in the world are seeing their living standards rise and that they're having a better future. I think that's good for everybody.

But it is somewhat discouraging to hear what both Byron and Ben said. Ben talked about how our own government doesn't even stand up for American business and American workers. And as Byron pointed out, there are lots of situations where just very frankly we don't get a fair shake.

The entire global economy, if you looked at it as an inverted triangle, is resting on the shoulders of the American consumer.

CLINTON: If the American consumer stops buying, the whole world goes into a recession. If our living standards and our wages continue to decrease, you know, slowly but surely, we're not going to be able to prop up the global economy.

So just as I think it's in the interests of the United States for the Chinese people to have more economic opportunity, it is the interests of the Chinese government and people to recognize that they have to be fair, along with everybody else, to the United States when it comes to agreements and open borders and all the other things that will enable us, once again, to be competitive on a more equal basis.

QUESTION: So again, is it time to repeal PNTR?

CLINTON: You know, I don't think it's time to repeal. I think it's time for us to say, though -- let me just say this, that the Chinese government, every other government, has to take seriously what we are saying today. We may not be at a remedy level yet, but unless governments in the rest of the world and the international trading framework, like the WTO, recognize that we are just not going to sit and be disadvantaged year after year after year, then perhaps more drastic action will have to be taken.

So it is in the interests of everybody for the United States to stand up for itself and to have some positive responses that will move us out of a deficit position.

DORGAN: Let me just make a point about this. I wasn't going to, but I think it's important.

With respect to the PNTR, it needs to be fixed. Bilateral automobile trade, do you know what was agreed to? That any automobiles we would sell in China could have a 25 percent tariff applied by the Chinese. Any automobile sold in the U.S. by the Chinese could have a 2.5 percent tariff. So our negotiator agreed that they could charge a tariff that is 10 times higher than the U.S. tariff on bilateral auto trade. I'm still trying to figure out who made that agreement, because I think that person ought to be named somehow.

But my point is this: When we make these kind of agreements with that kind of a policy -- and, incidentally, the Chinese are now racheting up an auto export industry to export into this country -- when we make that, it reminds me of what Will Rogers said back in the '30s.

He said, "The United States of America has never lost a war and never won a conference." And he clearly could have been talking about our trade negotiators.

He said, "We can't go to Costa Rica to negotiate and come back with our shirts on." And that's embedded in the bilateral with China and a dozen other agreements in the last decade that the three of us have watched.

This country needs to do better with these trade agreements.

QUESTION: Senator Clinton, let me ask you specifically about China. The big issue here, obviously, is Chinese currency manipulation. The administration has been jawboning the Chinese leadership (OFF-MIKE). What else could they do here?

CLINTON: Let me just answer it this way: Our government is dependent upon the Chinese government buying our debt every single month. So just take that leap of imagination. How much jawboning can a government which has run up the biggest fiscal deficit we've ever had plus has presided over the biggest trade deficit we've ever had, how much real authority or power does it have to negotiate anything with the Chinese government?

We are basically going hat in hand every single month.

So I just don't take their comments seriously at all. From my perspective, we were on the right track -- this will not surprise you -- we were on the right track at the end of the Clinton administration. We were moving into balance and surplus. We had enough funding to be able to deal with some of our long-term entitlement programs.

And this administration cares about one thing more than anything else, and that is preserving the tax cuts for the richest of Americans. That's more important than deficits, whether they're fiscal or trade. That's more important than currency manipulation and dealing effectively with the Chinese. It is their number one priority. I think that's a misplaced priority. And I think we're paying a price for it.

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON THE FY 2006 DEFENSE BUDGET, 2/10/2005

COMMITTEE: SENATE ARMED SERVICES COMMITTEE

CLINTON: Thank you very much.

And, General Schoomaker, thank you for bringing the three soldiers you brought with you today. There couldn't be a better illustration of the jointness between active duty, Guard and Reserve sitting in the front row there. And I appreciate that.

General Schoomaker, just because I'm afraid I might have missed it, what was your number about the up-armored Humvees that we now have in the theater?

SCHOOMAKER: I believe the up-armored Humvees themselves were in excess of 6,000.

CLINTON: Then the other vehicles, altogether...

SCHOOMAKER: Total, we're in excess of 26,000, approaching 30,000.

CLINTON: I was recently up at Watervliet Arsenal, the oldest arsenal in our country, going back to the War of 1812. And they're very proud of the work they're doing to help armor the trucks that are now a major priority.

General Schoomaker, help me understand a sequence of events. Last week, at our hearing, I asked Deputy Secretary Wolfowitz about increasing the size of the Army.

At that time he told me, and I quote, "In fact, in the five-year defense plan that will come with the '06 budget, you will see that we will bring the cost of this larger army into what we call the top line in our regular budget, starting in fiscal year '07, and that we've had to make some very considerable adjustments in the rest of the defense program in order to pay for that.

"We need to fund it through supplementals in this fiscal year, next fiscal year, because that's not the kind of change you can -- it's like turning a tank around a dime. But we're not trying to hide the cost, either."

And that is what Secretary Wolfowitz said.

Shortly after he answered my question, it appeared as though the Defense Department was backing away from even that level of commitment. But I just want to understand from your testimony, with respect to this 30,000-person increase being made permanent -- we are funding it out of the supplemental now, but is there a plan, as Secretary Wolfowitz seemed to suggest, that we would start trying to move toward putting that into the baseline in '07?

SCHOOMAKER: There are three components of this if I might.

My requirement for this year is $110 billion, in '06. The base budget has $98.5 billion in it. There's a delta of about $12 billion. We have a request in for the supplemental for that $12 billion: $3 billion for manpower, $4 billion for resetting the forces that we're using and $5 billion for the modular transformation for the Army that we're sending.

If you then look at 2007, you will see that the core budget is $110 billion. It was just moved in 2007. And as you look out all the way out to '11 you will see that the Army modular costs have migrated inside of our top line.

What is not in the top line, because it's unknown, is what our reset costs will be in the out-years, to fix equipment and replace equipment that's used. And as you can see, there are still personnel costs that we will require supplemental funding for in the out-years.

CLINTON: And this is primarily a budgeting decision at this point, that, for whatever reason, the Defense Department doesn't want to move into the budget in the top line number, any sooner than next year? Is that fair to say?

SCHOOMAKER: I assume that's what it is.

I've stated what my requirement is. I'm satisfied that I have a commitment that that requirement's going to be met. And as I say, as you take a look out through the out-years you'll see that our core budget grows because more of it is being pulled into it.

CLINTON: I share Senator Levin's concern about the use of supplementals for what are anticipated to be continuing expenses that are in the baseline. And I don't know how we get a handle on this, but it's very, very troubling to me.

Because I think -- I mean, I think that it's difficult -- you've done what you're supposed to do. I'm just really talking to us. We need to do what we're supposed to do in conjunction with the Department of Defense to more accurately describe what our defense needs are going forward and not be, you know, pushing things into supplementals, and trying to do it on a year-to-year basis.

I just don't think that is an appropriate way to deal with the basic needs that we face.

General Schoomaker, also last week I had a chance to talk with General Cody about the specific case of Specialist Robert Loria from Middletown, New York, who lost an arm in Iraq.

And he had some problems getting his paycheck worked out. He was expecting a final paycheck of about $4,500.

CLINTON: Instead, he was told by the Army that he owed money. And he was caught up in this bureaucratic red tape.

In the course of intervening on behalf of Specialist Loria, I was told that the Army had identified 19 more soldiers who were treated the same way. And then my office -- because that got some press -- began getting additional concerns brought to our attention.

And so I wrote the secretary of the Army and asked him to examine whether this was a systemic problem. And I brought that to General Cody's attention last week, and he very efficiently got me an answer, which I appreciate very much.

And so on Friday, he sent me a letter saying the Army had identified 129 soldiers with payment and debt issues, but that the Army had put into place systems that would rectify the problem.

And, General Schoomaker, I really appreciate this. I appreciate the Army's willingness to correct this.

Obviously, I think we all agree that one soldier who faces this situation is one too many; 129 is absolutely beyond the pale.

But is the Army taking a big-picture look at how wounded soldiers are handled from the moment they're wounded to the moment they are either restored to duty or discharged?

And let me, also, perhaps, ask whether General Hagee can respond to that, as well.

SCHOOMAKER: The answer to your question is, absolutely.

I might remind you that the system that pays soldiers is the Defense Finance and Accounting System. It's a big, huge consolidated bureaucracy that is getting better. But it will not get totally better until we transfer this whole system to -- What is it? DMRS (ph) -- that will tie the personnel system and the finance system together more closely.

And so I'm afraid that it's going to continue to take a lot of attention on the part of leadership, a lot of anticipation to fix these kinds of problems.

And I don't mean to be facetious here, but I think you'll remember me testifying in the past that, as chief of staff for the Army, it took a while to get paid out of this system, which I assume that means privates have a lot harder problem down there.

And, oh, by the way, they sent my spouse a note saying I had died when I was brought back on active duty.

(LAUGHTER)

CLINTON: Was she surprised to hear that?

SCHOOMAKER: So almost nothing you tell me will surprise me with it. And it will require attention to do this.

So I can't give you a better answer than that.

CLINTON: Thank you.

HAGEE: Yes, ma'am. We are working also very aggressively in this area.

In fact, I have been out and I have talked with the former secretary of veterans affairs, Secretary Principi. We are actually assigning a major out to his office this month to identify those seams that might exist between the Department of Defense and Veterans Affairs.

And as I testified, or mentioned earlier, we have set up this Injured Marine Program which is going to follow an individual Marine while he or she is on active duty, and then actually follow -- if the Marine decides to leave active duty, he will have a contact or she will have a contact on the outside to assure that we continue to address these problems that might come up.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Thank you very much.

SCHOOMAKER: Can I have an alibi very quickly, Senator -- I'm sorry -- because I wanted to mention the same thing?

As you know, the Army has a disabled soldier support system that we are doing precisely what the commandant has talked about with the Marines and follow our soldiers five years into their (inaudible). And we're doing it in conjunction over and above what the V.A. does. And Secretary Principi previously had been very, very helpful in helping us do this.

So when we talk about a holistic approach to what you just touched on, a little piece of it here, it is a very big process. But we very much understand our responsibilities to return these great people that serve in our Army back to wherever they decide to go, whether they're going to stay with us or whether they're going to go back into civilian life. We have a responsibility to return them as whole as possible.

CLINTON: I thank you for that.

Thank you very much.

WARNER: Thank you very much, Senator.

Senator Talent?

U.S. SENATOR JOHN W. WARNER (R-VA) HOLDS HEARING ON FISCAL YEAR 2006 DEFENSE BUDGET, 2/17/2005

CLINTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I think that the hearing this morning is somewhat instructive. There is no specific money for Iraq and Afghanistan in the budget, but most of the questions are about Iraq and Afghanistan.

And I think that it is difficult to cover all of the issues that are important that are in this budget. But let me just go to two other areas.

Secretary Rumsfeld, the last time there was a successful intercept test of the National Missile Defense System was October 2002 and that was using immature, surrogate components in a highly choreographed and unrealistic test.

Now, President Bush decided, in December 2002, to begin fielding the system by the end of 2004, before any operational tests were planned or conducted. Since the president's decision, there have only been failed intercept flight tests of the system. And the new interceptor has not even left the silo during the tests.

It seems to me that before we commit to buying dozens of these interceptors, it would be important to have some operationally realistic tests that can demonstrate whether the system will work effectively.

Would you agree that realistic operational tests could give us confidence in whether the system works effectively, and that if the system does not work effectively, we should not be spending billions of dollars on it?

RUMSFELD: Senator Clinton, we, as you know, reduced the missile defense program budget from what we had projected last year, I believe $8.8 billion down to $7.8 billion.

The program has been generally successful. It is, of course, a complicated forward-looking technology program that, as with any program of that nature, is going to have to proceed along and have some successes and some failures.

RUMSFELD: The last two failures have clearly thus far inhibited us from conducting a system test for all its capabilities.

But we are in the early stage of engineering this complex and unprecedented capability.

The failure did not, according to people in the activity, undermine their confidence in the technology or the ability to integrate the geographically dispersed elements of the components. And we remain committed to produce and deploy a missile defense capability. And the program director has assured us that the key aspects of the program are on track.

Each time there's a success, you learn something; each time there's a failure, obviously, we learn something, as well.

And the failures in this instance were not systemic in any way.

Dick, you want to comment on it; you've been in this business.

MYERS: The specific failure in this case was not due to the missile itself, but due to the hardware that had to get out of the way so the missile could launch out of the silo. And there was a microswitch that didn't close when the hardware came up as part of the silo mechanism. And that'll have to be corrected.

But as the secretary said, they don't think that is systemic.

CLINTON: But, General, I know that the decision was made by the president to deploy, to begin fielding the system, by the end of 2004. So it's basically the position of the administration that we're deploying regardless of whether we have any successful tests, for whatever reason -- whether it was computer errors in getting the silo open or other more serious errors -- we're still committed to deploying a system that has not proven it can work.

And as I understand the theory behind that, that just by deploying a system, it serves a deterrent value. It strikes me a little odd that we would deploy a system that hasn't succeeded and expect that to serve a deterrent value.

So I don't understand the sequencing of this.

RUMSFELD: I agree with that point, that there's no deterrent if something is known to not work.

CLINTON: Yes, I think that's right.

RUMSFELD: That's fair enough.

I think the word "deploying" needs to be calibrated. What's being done here is not a pure test and not a pure deployment, but deploying the pieces of the capability that will evolve into an early missile defense capability.

And the way to do that, according to the people who are working on this -- and I agree and subscribe to the concept -- is to get it in the ground in a modest way, work the problems, keep testing, and as that capability evolves, you will begin to have the early stages of a missile defense capability.

If you didn't do anything until you could do everything, you probably wouldn't do anything.

And this is the way airplanes evolved. It's the way most -- certainly the way our satellite systems evolved.

And it seems to me that they're proceeding on a -- not a hell- bent for leather approach -- but a measured approach to a complicated problem which, frankly, given what we read about Iran and what we read about North Korea, ought to be reassuring to us that we're doing what we're doing and that we're at least on a track to have that capability in the period ahead, assuming we can continue to work out the kinks and the difficulties.

CLINTON: Mr. Secretary, I think it appears -- at least to me, maybe some others -- that our policy toward trying to create an operational missile defense system has heavily influenced our policy toward North Korea.

CLINTON: And that we are now at a point where the North Koreans are claiming that they've reprocessed the 8,000 fuel rods that had been frozen from '94 to 2003, which means that, over the last four years, they have potentially produced up to six more nuclear weapons on top of the one to two devices that the intelligence community assumed they had. In addition, they have restarted their reactor and continue to produce plutonium.

And the reason I raise that is, you know, it struck me, from the very beginning of this administration, that the commitment to missile defense colored the approach toward North Korea and now, to a lesser degree, Iran.

So I think it's important that we have an idea of exactly what DOD's intelligence estimate is regarding the number of nuclear devices or weapons North Korea currently possesses.

And I know my time is up, but if you could, also elaborate on whether DOD believes the 8,000 plutonium fuel rods have been reprocessed, and how solid our intelligence really is about North Korea's nuclear capabilities and intentions.

RUMSFELD: Senator, it had never crossed my mind that our missile defense program affected the policy toward North Korea. And I've never seen any manifestation of that in National Security Council meetings or principals meetings or discussions that I've had.

The track we are on with North Korea is very similar to the track that the government has been on for some time. It's been a diplomatic track, an attempt to work out with them some arrangements whereby their behavior would be appropriate instead of inappropriate for that part of the world.

Second, you said a Department of Defense estimate on North Korea's capabilities. We rely on the intelligence community broadly for intelligence assessments.

And there's a lot that the rest of the world doesn't know about what their capabilities are. They do a great deal of what they do underground. They are not uniformly straightforward in their public pronouncements. It's hard to know if you should believe what they say -- at least it's hard for me to know.

I have seen a variety of estimates and I'm sure we'd be happy to make available to you the intelligence community's assessments as to what's going on there. But I don't know what else I could add in this meeting.

CLINTON: Thank you.

"CNN Live Event/Special," CNN, 2/19/2005

Delegation of Senators hold live Press Conference in Iraq

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, (D) NEW YORK: Thank you very much for giving us this opportunity for publicly state both our appreciation and pride in American military forces that have been here and are here now. And also our support for the people of Iraq and their elections, which will lead to a new government. I think that the impression that I take away from just this short visit after talking with not only government officials but some of our military and civilian leaders here in Iraq, is cautious optimism.

Cautious, because there are so many challenges ahead; cautious, because there are neighbors of Iraq that are not necessarily enthusiastic about the success of the Iraqi people in creating and sustaining a multi-ethnic, multi-religious democracy.

But optimistic, because the results of the election are a strong rebuke to those who did not believe that the Iraqi people would take this opportunity to demonstrate their commitment to their own future. And our hope is, with the formation of a new government, that all groups within Iraq will be included and that the establishment of this new government will be firmly rooted in the hopes and aspirations of the Iraqi people. I think it is fair to say that not only the administration of our country but the Congress of the United States have committed ourselves to doing what we can to help achieve that objective.

SEN. RUSS FEINGOLD, (D) WISCONSIN: I want to join everyone in the delegation in congratulating the Iraqi people on the successful election results and thank Senator McCain for including me in this congressional delegation. It is such an important time in the history of Iraq.

My particular focus is on a number of things. Are our troops getting what they need to be safe and to be able to do their job? Are American taxpayer dollars that are being spent here, being spent carefully? Is there an ability to monitor that, on the part of our government and our people here? So that we can make sure that the American people can have confidence in that?

And from a broader point of view, I am very interested in following up on the fact that our CIA director the other day said that Iraq has now become, instead of Afghanistan, the leading place of training of international terrorists. And what implications that has for Iraq and for our own safety and what we can do together with the officials here and in other parts of the world to make sure that what we're doing here, not only ensures that the people of Iraq have democracy but that this is consistent with the number one issue in America, which is making sure we deter the people that attacked us on September 11.

SEN. LINDSEY GRAHAM, (R) SOUTH CAROLINA: I'm Senator Graham from South Carolina. This is my third trip to Iraq and I'd like to echo what my colleagues have said, to those men and women who are serving over here and who have served, this election is a direct result of your efforts and sacrifice.

And not only just your efforts but coalition partners. There are other countries that have been involved in this effort and they've lost people. And we need to recognize them. And I see some heads nodding, from our American military folks out there.

But the thing that I'm most encouraged about is I think the American people saw the Iraq people do something that was very hard; go to a polling station and on the way you saw graffiti that says, if you vote, you die. So, what I would like to say is that the people who are helping over in Iraq, they deserve it. And whatever sacrifice lies ahead for our country, I hope we will continue to make that sacrifice because it is in our best interest that Iraq be free stable and democratic.

And the one thing that I've learned from this trip, is that we're a long way away from being able to leave. That if the Iraqi people want us to stay, we're going to be here for awhile, in large numbers; but it is worth it, we cannot leave too soon. This country faces many problems, many struggles, but they have convince me, and I hope they have convinced you, that their desire to be free, with help, will overcome the people who are trying to take them back into the darkness.

MCCAIN: Questions? Sir.

QUESTION: (OFF MIC).

FEINGOLD: I think there is a very good faith effort being made to try to spend the dollars wisely. There are challenges in terms of trying to review projects that are in areas that are not easy to be secure. And so this is something that I'm looking forward to the report that we get from the inspector general, next. The first report was a frankly disturbing report that had to do with some issues concerning Iraqi dollars and that needs to be fixed up.

But the next report will be about American dollars and I've urged people here, and they're already on the job, to try to figure out a way to make sure that we have some accountability with regard to this spending. And I look forward to the results of those reports.

MCCAIN: Ma'am.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE (speaking in Arabic, translator inaudible): ... For the liberation of Iraq, but the election lead to the election of a religious group that are known have loyalty to Iraq.

MCCAIN: Well, we have no indication that the people who are elected have an allegiance to anything other than the Iraqi people and the formation of a free and democratic government. The fact that they may be of the same religious faith does not necessarily mean that they are in any way inclined to cede Iraqi sovereignty to Iran or any other nation.

CLINTON: Well, obviously, we expressed some concern about that. And the future will demonstrate whether that concern is well founded or not. At this point, I share Senator McCain's opinion that it appears there is a good faith effort underway to form a government that is reflective of the aspirations of the Iraqi people. And I think some of the checks and balances that were written into the law, will help to create the best possible circumstances for that to occur. And it is something that we will continue to watch and hope that it does not cause any problem, that there is no divided loyalty whatsoever, within the Iraqi government.

COLLINS: Each of the Iraqi leaders with whom we met stress the need for a coalition government that reached out to all parties, to all ethnic groups. I think that is very impressive. We have just come through an Iraqi election where the Sunnis population's participation was very low, which was regrettable. And yet, the leaders with whom we've talked with all talked about their efforts to reach out to the Sunnis as they put together a new government.

I think that demonstrates an understanding on the part of these Iraqi leaders that the government must have Kurdish and Sunni representation as well as Shiite.

MCCAIN: Sir?

QUESTION: Dexter Filkins with "The New York Times".

I was just wondering if you could walk us through what you did when you were here and just let us know if you were able to get outside the Green Zone at all?

MCCAIN: The second answer is, no. We would obviously like to -- tomorrow, we are going -- excuse me, I'm not allowed to reveal our itinerary, I guess. But we will be going to several other places throughout the country. And today we spent most of our time with the Iraqi leaders and although we also had a long briefing with General Petraeus (ph), but tomorrow we will be spending most of our time with the American military in various places, at least three outside of the Green Zone.

You're first question was?

QUESTION: Just who you met when you were here, today, then?

MCCAIN: Today, we met with General Petraeus (ph), and then, we met with the prime minister, the deputy prime minister, and the finance minister. And also had a briefing at the embassy where the food was far superior to that of the Senate dining room.

Sir?

QUESTION: Tomash Ashzlov (ph), CNN.

Senator Collins, you mentioned that you were here in 2003, in the summer, and you have seen a lot of progress. You know, I was here in 2003, in the summer also. At that time I was able to travel around the country. I see many of American soldiers having lunches in the restaurants, you know, this is suicidal today. Big chunks of the country, especially Baghdad, are still without electricity. There is a terrible security situation, terrible unemployment. How do you define success or progress? What did you see? COLLINS: First, let me say, that I didn't mean to imply that all of what I have seen represented progress. When I was here that summer, it was much easier for us to move around. We visited several cities around Baghdad. We were able to move more freely through Baghdad. And one impression I have is how much more fortified Baghdad is than it was during that summer.

But on the other hand, at that point it was clearly the coalition forces who were making every decision and who were running the country. That clearly is not the case today. We've seen a true transition of power. We've seen the Iraqi people begin to control their own destiny, to chart their own future, and to make the basic governing decisions.

One of the leaders with whom we met today said that back when the CPA was in charge that the Iraqi people could blame the Americans for everything. If the electricity went off, it was the Americans' fault; he said, now we're making the decisions and shouldering the blame, as well as the credit.

Although, it is disappointing to see that the violence that has ensued since my last visit has resulted in an Iraq where it is more difficult to move around, there is no doubt in my mind that the long-term future of the Iraqi people is far brighter and that the transition to power -- in the hands of the Iraqi people has, and is, occurring.

MCCAIN: We believe, hope and pray, that the dynamic has changed from Iraqi insurgents versus the U.S. and our troops, to Iraqi insurgents versus the Iraqi government. Under the second scenario, if it applies, then I think we have an opportunity to succeed. And I want to emphasize again, there are none of us who have visited here who wish to understate or under appreciate the enormity of the task that lies ahead of us.

Ma'am, yes. We'll go to you, too. Go ahead.

QUESTION: This is Fanas Fausti (ph) with "The Wall Street Journal".

Senator Clinton, can you elaborate on some of your concerns about neighboring countries and what specifically concerns you? And which countries, please? Thanks.

CLINTON: Well, I think that the concerns center on Iran and Syria. Iran, because of the size and influence of Iran in this region; because of some of the policies that Iran has followed; and, of course, because of some of the linkages that go back many, many years when Iran was not only fighting a war against Iraq, under Saddam Hussein, but was helping to support opposition to Saddam Hussein.

With respect to Syria, it is an ongoing concern heightened by the assassination of Mr. Hariri (ph), in Beirut, that Syria has a agenda that has not only resulted in its failure to control borders, perhaps providing refuge to insurgents or leaders, Ba'athist leaders who have sought sanctuary there, but it tends to take a more aggressive posture in the region.

So, I think that may not be the only set of concerns, but those are the two at the top of the list.

MCCAIN: (UNINTELLIGIBLE):

QUESTION: Senator Graham, two questions. One is you said that you feel that the troops are going to have to be here for a while, do you feel like that is five years, 10 years, if you can give a timetable.

And the second question is one for back at the States: Since the president has left the door open for raising the cap on Social Security payroll taxes...

(LAUGHTER)

...is it a good idea for Republicans to raise taxes to help solve the Social Security problem?

GRAHAM: I thought surely 5,000 miles away you would avoid that question.

MCCAIN: Aren't you glad we had one more question?

GRAHAM: Yes. Thanks, John.

As to how long? The answer is, until the job's done. Not one minute longer, not one minute less. And what is the job? The ability of this country to have the capacity to maintain its freedom. That just doesn't mean numbers with guns, that means institutions that work; judges and courtrooms that work for all Iraqis, regardless of your ethnic background or your religious differences. A finance ministry that can collect taxes and pay the bills. When you look at what is ahead for this country, there is reason to be very hopeful it could change the whole region. But as John said, to underestimate what lies ahead is a mistake.

How long? I don't know, but to leave too soon would be devastating. To stay too long would be unnecessary. The Iraqi people have their fate in their hands but we're essential partners in that process. And I ask the American people to have patience because what happens here directly affects our security at home.

Now, as to Social Security, speaking of our security. There is no Social Security without national security. But we have a challenge domestically as well as internationally. It is time for the country, as a whole, to make sacrifices for the common good.

We're here sacrificing to make the world safer in light of people who want to take us back to the darkness, extremists who would have no role for a woman, other than to just be seen and not heard, and barely be seen.

We have a chance, at home, in a bi-partisan way to address Social Security and permanently fix it. I'm a Republican. I am telling you right now that you cannot fix the Social Security System at home as a Republican Party. And the idea of asking people who make over $90,000 to pay extra for a permanent solution, I think would be well accepted by the country as a whole.

I support that, and I will as my Democratic colleagues to reject rigid ideology and work with the president to find a solution that will save Social Security, sacrifice will be required.

MCCAIN: On the issue of withdrawal, let me just point out, I think it is a false argument. The key to our continue presence here is not how long we stay, it is the U.S. casualties. We've been in South Korea for more than 50 years. Americans are perfectly happy with that. We've been in Bosnia, we've been in all over the world, but we don't have casualties. If we can bring American casualties down as the Iraqis take over military and law enforcement responsibilities, then I think the American people will be satisfied to see significant progress. I think that is the key to it, rather whether we withdraw or not.

GRAHAM: Can I add one last thing?

MCCAIN: Yes, go ahead.

GRAHAM: Ronald Reagan was a pretty good conservative. Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neil sat down together, going back to Social Security, and Ronald Reagan agreed to raise tax rates. Tip O'Neil changed the age limit from 65 to 67. They part their ideology and the focus on the common good. That is what we need to do now to save Social Security in a permanent fashion.

MCCAIN: Two great Americans.

Finally, quick.

QUESTION: John Burns (ph), "New York Times", for Senator Clinton and for you Senator McCain.

Many people who come here after a absence of some time are shocked at the deterioration in security. Although, you have not been outside the Green Zone, you will have noticed the enormous elaborate security that is required, even to move you around within the Green Zone.

MCCAIN: We paid attention to your reporting, as well.

QUESTION: So, I wonder if you could both give us your sense, what that means to you to come here? What are you going to be telling people -- not at news conferences, but what are you going to be telling the 42nd president of the United States -- in terms of Clinton -- when you get home, in your kitchen? What is your feeling about this?

CLINTON: Well, it is mixed. Because I was last here at the end of 2003. And I was able to drive from the airport into Baghdad, for example. It is regrettable that the security needs have increased so much. On the other hand, I think you can look at the country as a whole and see that there are many parts of Iraq that are functioning quite well. There might be occasional problems but it is not the steady drumbeat. In addition, the concerted effort to disrupt the elections was an abject failure. Not one polling place was shutdown or overrun. And the fact that you have these suicide bombers, now wreaking such hatred and violence, while people pray, is to me an indication of their failure.

So, while yes, it is somewhat disheartening that there is so much more security, that we ourselves are subjected to. On the other hand, I think that the election and the desperation of this so-called insurgency is becoming clearer by the day. And I'm hoping that the Iraqi government and the Iraqi security forces will continue to get stronger in the face of that challenge.

MCCAIN: I've said many times that we have made serious mistakes and we've paid a heavy price for those mistakes. And I have pointed them out a long time ago. But the fact is that the elections have taken place. The fact is, as Senator Clinton pointed out, there are many parts of this country that are functioning very well and very safely. And the consequences of failure are devastating and the prospects of success, not only here but in the entire Middle East are intoxicating.

So, we have a long, hard, difficult struggle ahead of us, but I am far more optimistic than I was before the election, because the Iraqi people proved that they would brave the risk of their very lives in order to choose their government. To me that's very encouraging. Thanks very much.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: Thank you all invest. Very much.

BETTY NGUYEN, CNN ANCHOR: You have been listening to a U.S. Senate delegation which has arrived in Iraq. That delegation made up of Senators, McCain, Clinton, Feingold, Collins and Graham. While there they are going to be focusing on a number of different issues, including are, U.S. getting the necessary information and equipment needed to stay safe in Iraq. A lot of other issues as well, we'll be talking about within the next half hour.

“Face the Nation,” CBS, 2/20/2005

Senator HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON (Democrat, New York; Senate Committee on Armed Services): Bob, I think that the election was a very positive step for the Iraqi people and also for the United States and our involvement here in Iraq. The violence that preceded the election was about 50 to 60 incidents a day. Leading up to the election, it rose all the way to 300, and now it has subsided again to, unfortunately, about 50 or 60 a day. But what was important about the election is that for the first time, the Iraqi security forces did most of the perimeter support for security around polling places.

And there were some heroic actions by some of the Iraqis, Bob. We had some very significant efforts and even some Iraqi security force members who literally died protecting the polling places and voters. So although the violence has continued, the fact that there will be an Iraqi government, that it will be responsible for dealing with these insurgents and terrorists is, I think, a big step forward.

SCHIEFFER: Senator Graham, how do you assess the situation right now?

Senator LINDSEY GRAHAM (Republican, South Carolina; Senate Committee on Armed Services): Well, Bob, I've been here three time, and it's more dangerous than it's ever been, but I agree with Senator Clinton very much, that the elections were an important sea change. I think it proved to the American people that the Iraqi people deserve our support. If you're willing to go vote, and the graffiti on the wall greeting you to the polling place says ‘Vote or Die,’ that is a huge commitment on the part of the Iraqi people. And I think the international community should respond in a more aggressive fashion. But security-wise, this is a very dangerous place, but the Iraqis are in the fight.

But one thing I don't want us to misunderstand: the elections were huge. They were important. They made me proud, they made us all proud as Americans. It should not mask the long road ahead. We're far from a rule-of-law nation in Iraq. We're far from an economy that can sustain itself. The Iraqi people want to be free, but they're nowhere near having the capacity to be free. So on my third visit, I can tell you this: We need to be patient in America, because our footprint here will be large for a long time. We're years away from leaving with honor.

SCHIEFFER: Well, what do you mean 'long time'? Do you mean years?

Sen. GRAHAM: Well, just think about it, Bob. It's not the number of people that carry guns and wear an Iraqi uniform that's exclusively important. You've got to leave a court system behind. You've got to leave the capacity to maintain freedom and to have a market economy. These people lived under a brutal dictator. There is no legal system in place. There is no market economy. I don't want the elections to mask the long road ahead. It's important we win. Our security is tied to how well things turn out in Iraq, but it's time for American politicians and I think the world to understand that this is a long, hard road that lies ahead to give these people capacity to maintain their freedom.

Sen. CLINTON: If I could just add to what Senator Graham said, because I think it's really important we underscore this. Senator McCain made the point earlier today, which I agree with, and that is, it's not so much a question of time when it comes to American military presence for the average American; I include myself in this. But it is a question of casualties. We don't want to see our young men and women dying and suffering these grievous injuries that so many of them have. We've been in South Korea for 50-plus years. We've been in Europe for 50-plus. We're still in Okinawa with respect to protection there coming out of World War II.

You know, we have been in places for very long periods of time. And in recent history, we've made a commitment to Bosnia and Kosovo, and I think what is different is the feeling that we're on a track that is getting better and that we can see how the Iraqi government will begin to assume greater and greater responsibility. The elections were key to that. The training, equipment, equipping and motivating of the Iraqi security forces is key to that. But so is our understanding that if we were to artificially set a deadline of some sort, that would be like a green light to the terrorists, and we can't afford to do that.

And the second point that I would make is that, you know, this is not only just about Iraq. This is about a breeding ground for terrorism. No matter what anyone's opinion is about how we got here, whether we should get here, we can have that debate back at home, but when you meet, as we have today, with Iraqi officials, and I just came from a brief meeting with a lot of the Iraqi women leaders, they thanked me and they asked me to thank our government and particularly to thank the American people. And they know that they have a lot riding on this, and I think we do, too.

SCHIEFFER: Well, Senator Clinton, that was the question I was going to ask you. Would it be a mistake to set a deadline as some in your party have done? And you say, obviously, you do think that. Do you think we're coming to a situation where we will have permanent bases in Iraq?

Sen. CLINTON: No, but I think that we should take this sort of one step at a time. I really do understand the, you know, deeply felt feelings on the part of many Americans as to how we got into this situation, whether we should have, and a very strong concern that we don't want any more American casualties and we should be trying to get out as soon as possible. Well, I think everyone agrees that we should get out as soon as we can, but we can't get out any sooner than it is feasible in terms of what we have to accomplish and in terms of what the Iraqi government needs to accomplish. So I don't know that setting a deadline, a public deadline, is the best way to achieve that goal.

Secondly, though, if you look at what we are trying to achieve, I don't know that we can talk about anything we might do. We are going to be negotiating with the new Iraqi government. The Iraqi government could turn around any time and say, 'We want you to leave.' I don't see any indication of that, but it could happen. The Iraqi government could say, 'We want you to be here with a certain kind of footprint.' But until the Iraqi government is stood up and operating, I think it's a little premature for us to be talking about what they and we may decide to do together.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me ask you, Senator Graham. I know you all got a briefing, I believe, from General Petraeus, who's in charge of training these new Iraqi troops. Did he give you any indication when he'll have a sizable force, up and trained and ready to take on some of the combat responsibilities that the US troops are handling at this point?

Sen. GRAHAM: He said he thought with the end of the year that the combat capability of the Iraqi police and army would dramatically improve. Training is going a lot better. This is my third visit, and that's the good news, that the Iraqi troops are better trained. They performed well during the elections and right after the elections there was a flood of people that came in that wanted to join the army. These people literally risked their lives to vote so that was a strong statement that should make us all feel good.

General Petraeus outlined progress in that area, but one thing we need not forget here is that this operation is very important to our own security. If we get it right here, we've turned the tide on terrorism. If we lose, it's a giant setback.

But the stress on our troops is what I would like to talk about for a second. Senator Clinton and I represent different spectrums of the political ideology on many occasions, but we have Guard and Reservists from New York and South Carolina who are making up about 40 percent of this operation, and I really do believe we're going to be here for a while because the Iraqis are nowhere near having the capacity to maintain a democracy. And our Guard and Reservists need better benefits. They do not receive health care while they're a Guard or Reservist. Only when they're activated do they receive military health care. Twenty percent of them coming into the active duty are unable to go to the fight because they're not medically ready. So we're proposing that we provide full-time health care to our Guard and Reserves through military health care called TRICARE. We need to adjust and we need to make sure that our troops are well taken care of as we train the Iraqi forces.

SCHIEFFER: I know that both of you are working very hard on that. Let me just ask you this, Senator Clinton. Are we putting too much reliance on these Guard and Reserve forces. Do we take--should we take another look at what the Guard and Reserve ought to be responsible for and what they ought to be doing?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, we certainly have put a tremendous responsibility on our Guard and Reserve forces. As Lindsey said, 40 percent of our force here in Iraq are Guard and Reserve. And just today, we've seen Guard and Reserve forces from all over our country. I was happy to shake hands with a group from Rochester and elsewhere through New York. And we know that they are doing a tremendous job. But the fact is that they were never really intended to be quite so significant a part of a mission like this, and that's why I've teamed up with Senator Graham to try to give them the benefits that they need.

We're going to have to look at the role that the Guard and Reserve plays as we look at the future of the military. There are a number of us who think we need a bigger standing Army, that we're going to have to increase the Marines, we're going to have to figure out what missions should be inside active duty and what should be in Guard and Reserve. So we have a lot of work ahead of us, but I don't want to lose really the human beings who are the ones, you know, leaving their jobs, leaving their families. I met somebody who is on his third tour here in Iraq.

Sen. GRAHAM: Yes.

Sen. CLINTON: And, you know, 20 percent of our Guard and Reserve members don't have health care. And we found that when they were activated, a number of them were not medically ready to serve. We want to provide more security, health care, and retirement security for Guard and Reserves and their families because in this new world of global terrorism and the challenges we face, we need these young men and women. We need them to join. We need them to be recruited and retained, and we've got to do right by them.

Sen. GRAHAM: There's one thing that we need desperately here. We need a bigger international presence in Iraq. After the elections, we have momentum. People really do sense that they can be free. They're working together in a productive fashion. They're working under conditions that we can't even imagine at home, trying to find a consensus as a nation to be free and maintain their freedom. The UN is being requested to have a larger presence by the Iraqi people. The UN needs to be here in a larger presence. NATO could provide security for the UN. We're being stretched. So I hope the international community, international organizations, like NATO and the UN, will come help the Iraqi people because this really is about the world being free, not just the United States and Iraq.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me just ask you this. Do you believe the administration shares your view on that? Will there be an outreach to NATO? And what do you need NATO to do because as I look around, I don't see any NATO nations volunteering to send troops over there?

Sen. GRAHAM: Well, the truth is that NATO nations are sending armaments; they're doing some training. But the UN presence needs to grow. And the Iraqi people through their government are going to ask for a larger UN presence. It seems to me that a good mission for NATO would be to provide security for a larger UN footprint. This is not about legitimizing an American mistake any longer, this is about the future of Iraq, their desire to be free and changing the region. So I hope NATO will be open-minded to come to Iraq to help the United Nations. And that would be a turning point in this whole fight to maintain freedom.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Let's take a break right here. We'll come back in just a minute.

(Announcements)

SCHIEFFER: We're back now with Senators Hillary Clinton and Lindsey Graham.

Let's shift just quickly to domestic subjects. Senator Graham, the Republicans in the House say they're not interested in increasing the limit on the amount of income that can be taxed for payrolls, security tax, and that, of course, is your plan to make Social Security solvent. What do you think is going to happen on Social Security here?

Sen. GRAHAM: I hope what will happen this time is what Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill did. Ronald Reagan agreed to increase tax rates to save Social Security. Tip O'Neill agreed to increase the age from 65 to 67. The president has been very brave. He's been a good leader. He's putting options on the table, including raising the cap for people over $90,000 to contribute more to save Social Security. We need to do this in a bipartisan way, park our ideology, find common ground, like Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill. I'm hopeful we can do that with presidential leadership and the Congress stepping up to the plate.

SCHIEFFER: Is the president going to have to buck his own party to get Social Security reform passed, Senator Graham?

Sen. GRAHAM: We're going to have to come together as Americans and do what Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill did. The Republican Party cannot fix this by themselves. Ideology will not fix this. This is going to take--give and take and sacrifice by both parties will be essential. If we ever save Social Security now or tomorrow or 20 years from now, you can't do it be being stuck with rigid ideology. Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill taught us that. I think this president understands the lessons of 1983.

SCHIEFFER: Senator Clinton, would you be willing to increase the amount of income that can be taxed under Social Security as part of a package for Social Security reform?

Sen. CLINTON: Well, Bob, I'm waiting to see what the president proposes. We don't have a plan yet. I want to wait and see what the specifics are, and my goal is to, you know, do whatever we can do together to try to make sure that Social Security is there and not do any harm to it in the process.

SCHIEFFER: Well, I mean, do you--would you think that would be a tax increase, as some Republicans are saying?

Sen. CLINTON: You know, I'm not going to get into the specifics until we see a plan. I think that Senator Graham has come forward with a very specific proposal that would not, you know, lead to increasing the debt, which is one of my givens. I'm not interested in making us an even more indebted nation, especially when we have obligations like I see right here around me in Baghdad. But I'm going to wait and see what the president proposes.

SCHIEFFER: Senator Graham, would that be a tax increase, in your view?

Sen. GRAHAM: In my opinion, it would be a higher contribution for people who can afford to make it, because you literally get some of your money back. You're paying into the system at a higher amount. You could actually lower the rate from 12-4 to a little bit less for those who make under $90,000. The key--the point I'm trying to make is I'm willing to sacrifice. I make over $90,000. I'm willing to ask people like myself to give more for the common good. Social Security's going to fail down the road, and people who need it the most are going to be hurt the most. If we come together now and make some sacrifice, we can solve this problem. And the president's put options on the table. Congress needs to also meet him halfway.

SCHIEFFER: I want to thank both of you for being with us this morning.

Sen. CLINTON: Bob, thank you. We're being...

SCHIEFFER: I know you're in a rush.

Sen. CLINTON: ...told we've got to leave now.

SCHIEFFER: Thank you very much.

Sen. CLINTON: But we'll see you back in Washington.

SCHIEFFER: OK.

Sen. CLINTON: Thank you.

Sen. GRAHAM: When you travel with Senator Clinton and McCain, you're 'the other senator.'

SCHIEFFER: For security and scheduling reasons, we recorded that interview yesterday.

"Meet the Press," NBC, 2/20/2005

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Clinton, how would you describe the scope of the insurgency?

SEN. HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON, (D-NY): Well, Tim, this is an issue that Senator McCain and the rest of the delegation and I have been probing because it is something that concerns us. When I was here last at the end of 2003, at least with respect to Baghdad, I was not under as severe security restrictions as we are at this time. So obviously, the number of attacks average about 50 a day, we're told. But there are parts of the country that are fairly secure and stable. I think the important thing is to recognize that the Iraqi security forces are now more engaged, and have to be, and the new Iraqi government, as it takes hold, will assume greater and greater responsibility for dealing with the insurgency. So we are watching this and trying to gather as much information as possible, but it's really now going to be largely up to the Iraqi people and their new government to determine how effective this insurgency is in the future.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator McCain, the director of the CIA, Porter Goss, said this week that Iraq has replaced Afghanistan as the new breeding ground for international terrorists. Have you learned anything about that during your trip so far?

SEN. McCAIN: I don't think that there's anything illogical about that. Iraq has attracted people from all over the Middle East to come and fight, and they are being financed at least to some degree, by the same people that financed al-Qaeda, including some who didn't. And I think it's a major challenge, and it argues for success. If we fail, then this place would become the breeding ground, and I think we all understand that we're not going to win the war on terror inside the borders of the United States of America. That, I think, indicates how much is at stake here.

MR. RUSSERT: Do you believe we have enough American troops on the ground right now?

SEN. MCCAIN: I think we have in numbers probably enough. I would very much like to see more Marines, more Special Forces, more civil affairs people, more linguists, but the critical time was about two years ago at the beginning when we didn't have enough troops here to stop the looting, to bring about a reasonable environment in places like Fallujah, Ramadi, Mosul and other places in the, in the Sunni triangle. I think we're paying a very heavy price for the mistakes we made. But having said that, we cannot afford to lose, and I have to be "guardedly"--and I emphasize that--optimistic about what has happened mainly because the Iraqi people took such great risks to go and vote in risking their own lives so that they can choose their own government. I think it showed a determination on the part of the Iraqi people, which surprised many and pleased most of us.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Clinton, what should the American people know about the number of American troops that will have to remain in Iraq for a considerable period of time?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, Tim, we have just finished meeting with the current prime minister, the deputy prime minister and the finance minister, and in our meetings, we posed the question to each of them as to whether they believed that we should set a firm deadline for the withdrawal of American troops. To a person, and they are of different political parties in this election, but each of them said that would be a big mistake, that we needed to make clear that there is a transition now going on to the Iraqi government. When it is formed, which we hope will be shortly, it will assume responsibility for much of the security, with the assistance and cooperation of the coalition forces, primarily U.S. forces.

So I think that what the American people need to know is, number one, we are very proud of our young men and women who are here, active duty, Guard and Reserve. We've seen many of them today, and we'll see more of them tomorrow. And so we all can be very grateful for their service and also very admiring of their sacrifice for other people's freedom. But secondly, we need to make sure that this new government in Iraq can succeed. There are lots of debates about, you know, whether we should have, how we should have, the decisions that were made along the way with respect to our involvement here. But where we stand right now, there can be no doubt that it is not in America's interests for the Iraqi government, the experiment in freedom and democracy, to fail. So I hope that Americans understand that and that we will have as united a front as is possible in our country at this time to keep our troops safe, make sure they have everything they need and try to support this new Iraqi government.

MR. RUSSERT: Then you would disagree with any call for immediate withdrawal of some troops or a specific timetable?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, Tim, I understand the feelings behind that call. I mean, there is a lot of reason when we're back at home to argue about this policy. But at this point in time, I think that would be a mistake. I don't believe we should tie our hands or the hands of the new Iraqi government. Now obviously, as this government is stood up and takes responsibility, there may come a time when it decides for its own internal reasons that we should set such a deadline and withdrawal agenda. But right now I think it would be a mistake.

We don't want to send a signal to the insurgents, to the terrorists that we are going to be out of here at some, you know, date certain. I think that would be like a green light to go ahead and just bide your time. We want to send a message of solidarity. And in addition, I would hope that at this point now, we could get more international support. It is not in anyone's interests, not, you know, the people in this region, in Europe or elsewhere around the world, for the Iraqi government to be brought down before it even can get itself together by violent insurgents. So it's not only U.S. commitment, I think and hope that there should be commitment from others as well.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator McCain, the exit strategy that is the most obvious to all is that the Iraqis train 200,000 men and women who are willing to shed blood for their new government. Realistically, straight talk express, how long will that take?

SEN. MCCAIN: Years, to do it completely. I'm hopeful that within a year or so that we will see the transfer of these responsibilities being passed over to Iraqi military and police. As Senator Clinton pointed out, in the south in Basra, and in the north in the Kurdish areas, it's very stable. But the Sunni triangle is still incredibly volatile. And could I just add one point to what--in response to the question you just asked Senator Clinton. It is in everybody's interest to see democracy succeed. And our European friends can help us in a thousand ways. These people need computers. They need paper. They need training in setting up bureaucracies and institutions of government. We plead with our European friends, take part in this. It's in your interest to see it succeed as well as ours. And for the life of me, I do not understand why the Europeans haven't been more forthcoming.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn to the results of the election. It appears that Ibrahim Jafari may emerge as the Shiite candidate for prime minister. He has spent considerable time in Iran. His party, the Dawa Party, has had terrorist connections in the past. Senator McCain, what do we know about this potentially new prime minister?

SEN. MCCAIN: Well, I think we know that he is the--probably going to be the prime minister. But let me also point out, the Shias were split, number one. And two, they got less than 50 percent of the vote, which means they are not the majority party. And they do want to work with Sunnis. They do want to work with the Kurds. And even if they didn't want to, they could not, according to the rules of the adoption of the constitution, act unilaterally.

And by the way, everyone that we've talked said they understand that they have to welcome the Sunnis into the government. They have to respect the rights of the Sunnis, and there is a significant number of Sunnis that want to be part of the process. Now, there's a lot that aren't.

Iran is certainly a threat. When I say that, Iran has had designs on this, this country, they've fought a couple of wars, as you know. But I do not believe that Persians are going to be that popular with Arabs, number one. Number two is that just because they share the same religious ideals does not necessarily mean that they want the Iranians to have an inordinate influence on Iraq. I think they are nationalists first and Shias second, at least that's my hope.

But I also want to emphasize again, this is going to be long, hard, tough, difficult. These people have never had this experience. And we're asking them to set up a very delicate process, and it's going to be extremely tough. We're going have setbacks, is what I'm trying to say.

MR. RUSSERT: Senator Clinton, are you concerned that the new prime minister of Iraq, Mr. Jafari may, in fact, have strong connections with Iran, and what do we know about his background? Who is he?

SEN. CLINTON: Well, Tim, I think that there, there are grounds both for concern and for, you know, vigilance about this. But again, I am willing to look at the situation and, you know, not yet jump to any conclusions. First, it is a historical fact that he, along with the Dawa Party, have had connections with Iran. Now, part of that was because, you know, the enemy of my enemy is my friend and there was an effort in the opposition to Saddam Hussein to get support from anywhere you could. So naturally, given Saddam Hussein's attitude toward Iran and toward the Shias and the Kurds, people were looking for help and support. There are also family ties and religious ties.

However, there was a very strong message conveyed to us in our meetings, including by the finance minister who is part of the overall Islamic alliance, that they understand very well the need for them to be independent and they're striving to achieve that. It is like any nascent democracy. There are going to be bumps along the road. But I don't believe there is, by any means, a large body of opinion that wants to cede independence and control over Iraq's future to Iran.
